

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

Aach, the name of a river in Switzerland, and of two others in Suabia, and also of a town in Suabia, about 30 miles N. of Constance.

Aachen, the chief town of a small district of the same name, in the government of Munster, one of the Prussian states, in the province of Westphalia.

Ain-Cherise, a village near Jerusalem, said to be the place where Zacharius lived. It is frequented by pilgrims; and near it there is a convent, a large elegant building, with a handsome cupola, and under it an extraordinary fine mosaic pavement; the altar, which is a very splendid one, encompassed with marble steps, is said to be built on the very spot where John the Baptist was born.

Aalborg, one of the four bishoprics of the Peninsular province of Jutland, being the most northerly part, and about 120 square miles in extent, containing about 90,000 inhabitants. The chief town, of the same name, is situate on the south coast of the Gulf of Lyngby, in N. lat. 57. 3. E. long. 7. 56. Next to Copenhagen it is the most considerable town in Denmark. It has an exchange for merchants; the episcopal palace, two churches, two poor-houses, a hospital, convent and cathedral school-house, are all respectable edifices; and it has a considerable trade in corn, herrings, fire-arms, saddles, gloves, &c. It was taken by the Swedes in 1643 and 1658.

Aar, a large river in Switzerland, which rises in a lake, near Mount Seelberg, in the S. of the canton of Bern, and running N. W. through the whole extent of the lake of Brienz and Thun to Bern, takes a circuitous course to Soleure; whence it flows E. to Arburg, and N. E. to Brugg; below which, being joined by the Renes and Limmatt, it falls into the Rhine opposite Waldshut; also the name of two other rivers, one rising in the Grand Duchy of the lower Rhine, falling into the Rhine, the other rising in Nassau, falling into the Lahn.

Aargau, formerly a district, but formed into a canton of Switzerland; about 650 sq. m. in extent. Pop. in 1798 about 130,000.

Aarhus, the second of the four bishoprics of Jutland; it is a very fruitful district, on the E. side of the Peninsula, extending for about 60 m. along the shore of the Cattegat, bounded on the W. by the bishopric of Viborg, intersected by numerous streams, abounding with fish, and is richly adorned with forests. It contains the residences of a great portion of the nobility of Denmark. The chief town of the same name is situate on the coast, in 56. 10. N. lat. 10. 13. E. long. The town is divided into two unequal parts, by water conveyed from a lake about 15 m. in the interior. It is large and populous; and has six gates, two principal churches, two market-places; a university, a free-school, and a well-endowed hospital, and has a considerable trade in grain, timber, &c.

Aaron's Island. See St. Malo.

Aaronsburg, t. Northumberland Co. Pa. It is situated a little more than a mile E. of Elk creek, which unites with Penn's creek, falling into the Susquehanna, 5 m. below Sunbury.

Aaronsburg, p.t. Centre Co. Pa. 15 m. E. Bellefonte.

Aach or Wittenburg, a market town in Lower Bavaria, seated on the Danube, 7 m. from Ratisbon. It is defended by a citadel, and is remarkable for Roman antiquities, as well as for its mineral waters, which are celebrated for curing various diseases. Long. 11. 56. E. lat. 48. 53. N.

Akade, or Sheik Akade, a village of Egypt, on the left bank of the Nile, 80 m. S. of Cairo; immense architectural ruins testify its having been the site of a great and populous city.

Akadeh, a considerable town at the mouth of the Tigris, province of Fars, Persia.

Akansk, a town situate on a branch of the river Yenisei, in the province of Kolhyvane, government of Tobolsk, Asiatic Russia. It was founded in 1707, and rebuilt in 1725, and since fortified: some ancient tombs with fine inscriptions, bespeak it to have been a place of importance, prior to the conquest of Siberia by Russia. N. lat. 54. E. long. 91. 14.

Akatak, a town in the vicinity of Siberia, celebrated for an image of the Virgin, which is visit ed by many pilgrims, and carried in procession annually to Tobolski.

Abana, a river of Syria, called in Scripture, together with Pharpar, rivers of Damascus.—See 2 Kings v. 12.

Abancay, a province of Peru, S. America; the chief town thereof, of the same name, is situate about 60 m. N. W. of Cuzco. There is also a river of the same name flowing through the province, and another town in Cuenca, province of Quito.

Abano, a considerable town of Italy, in the vicinity of Padua, distinguished for its hot sulphureous baths.

Abascia, or Abgak, a country of Asiatic Russia, lying between the Caspian and Black Seas. The inhab. are estimated at about 150,000, subsisting chiefly by hunting and plunder, and speaking a language peculiar to themselves.

Abaujevar, a palatinate of Upper Hungary, about 700 sq. m. in extent, divided into 102 parishes. Pop. about 120,000.

Abb, a town in Yemen, Arabia.

Abbenhall, a village, 12 m. from Gloucester, 3 from Newnham, Eng. noted for a mineral spring, very efficacious in the cure of cutaneous eruptions.

Alberbury or Alberbury, a large parish, divided into 5 townships, in Shropshire, and 4 others in Montgomeryshire, containing together 1,946 inhabitants. The village of Alberbury is 7 m. W. of Shrewsbury. Pop. 332. It was formerly the site of an alien priory and castle.

Abbeville, a considerable town of France, in the department of Somme, and late province of Picardy, seated in a pleasant valley, where the river Somme divides into several branches, and separates the town into two parts. It is pretty well peopled; has a woollen manufactory, besides manufactories of sail-cloth. It lies 15 m. E. from the British Channel, 20 N. W. from Amiens, 52 S. of Calais, and 80 N. W. of Paris. Long. 1. 5. lat. 50. 7. N.

Abberton, a village near Pershore, noted for a bitter aperient mineral spring; also another village, 6 m. S. of Colchester.

Abbeville, a district of S. Carolina, about 700 sq. m. in extent. The lands are agreeably diversified with hill and dale, well watered and productive. Pop. 28,134. The chief town of the same name is situate on Savannah river, 118 m. W. by N. of Columbia.

Abbeysdale, a parish in Connello, Upper Barony, co. of Limerick, Ireland, containing, in 1821, 3,070 inhab. The village contains 437 of the inhab. It had formerly a monastery, and in the vicinity are the ruins of Purt Castle.

Abbey-Green, a village, in the parish of Lesmahgow, co. of Lanark; 6 m. S. W. of the town of Lanark. It had formerly an abbey, and also a priory. The entire parish of Lesmahgow contained 5,592 inhab. in 1821.

Abbey-Holme, a quarter of the parish of Holm Cultram, co. of Cumberland. Pop. of the entire parish in 1821, 2,772, and of the Abbey quarter, 768, which is pleasantly situate on the river Waver, 27 m. N. of Penrith.

Abbeyleix, a parish in Cullinagh Barony, Queen's Co. Ireland. Pop. in 1821, 5,485. The town is sometimes called Clonkyne, and contains about 2,000 of the inhab. 48 m. S. W. of Dublin.

Abbeville, p.t. Mecklenburg Co. Va. 143 m. from Richmond.

Abb's Head, St. a promontory, forming the southern extremity of the Frith of Forth, lying in the parish of Coldingham and the co. of Berwick, Scotland, about 10 miles N. of Berwick, and the same distance S. from Dunbar. W. long. 2. 8. lat. 55. 55. N.

Abda, a small but fertile prov. of Morocco.

Abenrade, or Apenrade, a town of Denmark, in Sleswick, now very flourishing, being double the extent it was formerly, and built in a better taste. It is seated on a spacious open bay in the Little Belt, surrounded on three sides by high mountains, which render the harbour safe. Pop. about 3,000. Long. 9. 26. E. lat. 55. 3. N.

Abensperg or Abensberg, a town in the circle of Regen, Bavaria, seated on the Abens, near the Danube, 15 m. S. W. of Ratisbon.

Aber, a village in Caernarvonshire, N. Wales. 6 m. E. from Bangor, on the direct road from London to Holyhead. Pop. 625.

* * There are 15 towns and villages in Wales, to which the word Aber is prefixed, which signifies the fall of a lesser water into a greater, and usually refers to a place situate at the mouth of a river.

Aberbrothock, or Arbroath, an ancient royal burgh and sea-port, situate at the estuary of the river Brothock, partly in a parish of the same name, and partly in that of St. Vigean, in the co. of Forfar, Scotland, 56 m. N. N. E. of Edinburgh, in 56. 34. N. lat. and 2. 35. W. long. William I. surnamed the Lion, king of Scotland, founded a magnificent abbey at Arbroath, in 1178, and conferred upon it very extensive immunities. Some vestiges of the building still remain to attest its former grandeur. A harbor was formed in 1194, to the eastward of the present one; the importance of the town declined with the devastation of the abbey, during the ruthless period of the reformation. The commerce of the town revived about the year 1738, when the linen manufacture was introduced, which progressively extended up to the commencement of the war in 1793, when it was vastly promoted by the increased demand for sail-cloth. 4,000 to 5,000 tons of shipping belong to the town, part of which is employed in the importation of flax, deals, &c. from the Baltic. A public library was established in 1727; a new town-hall has been more recently erected, and the town at large has undergone considerable improvement. The harbour at spring tides will only admit vessels of about 200 tons burthen, but being exceedingly well sheltered and commodious, and easily made, it affords security to vessels of easy draught of water. Arbroath is, however, a manufacturing rather than a commercial town. It has 3 fairs annually, 31st of Jan. 3rd Wed. of June, and 18th of July. Pop. in 1821 8,972.

Abercorn, a village and parish, in the co. of Linlithgow, Scotland, on the S. bank of the Frith of Forth, 12 m. W. of Edinburgh. A monastery existed here in the 7th century; and the castle of Abercorn was a place of great strength in the family of the Douglasses. It was dismantled in 1445, and no trace of either monastery or castle now remains. Abercorn still gives the British title of Marquis, and the Scottish title of Earl to a branch of the family of Hamilton. The Roman wall is said to have begun in this parish. The village has increased in importance since 1810, by its contiguity to the Union Canal. Pop. in 1821, 1,044.

Abercorn, v. Effingham Co. Geo. 18 m. N. Savannah

Aberdeen, the principal city in the North of Scotland, situated on the coast of the German ocean, at the efflux of the rivers Dee and Don, 127 m. N. E. from Edinburgh. It has an observatory; in lon. 2. 29. W. lat. 57. 9. N. Under the denomination of Aberdeen are comprehended two towns, distinguished as the Old and New, which, however, are almost united by their respective suburbs.

Aberdeen, Old, formerly Aberdon, in the parish of Old Machar, or St. Machar, is pleasantly situated on an eminence near the mouth of the river Don, about a mile north of the New Town. It is of great antiquity, and was of some importance so long ago as 893, when, according to tradition, king Gregory the Great conferred on it some peculiar privileges, but no authentic records are extant prior to 1154. By charter, the free burgesses of the town are vested with the power of choosing their own magistracy, who are a provost, 3 bailies, a treasurer, and council, with the deacons of 6 incorporated trades. The town consists chiefly of one long street. There is a neat town-house, a new building, and a Trades Hospital for decayed freemen and their widows, and a hospital for 12 poor men, founded by Bishop William Dunbar, in 1532. But the chief ornament of Old Aberdeen is the large and stately fabric of King's College, founded by Bishop Elphinstone, in 1494, situated on the S. side of the town. It is built round a square, with cloisters on the south side. The structure contains a chapel, library, museum, common hall, and lecture-rooms, with a long range of modern houses, for the accommodation of the professors and students. The library and museum are well furnished. The old town, being formerly the seat of a bishop, had a most magnificent cathedral, first founded in 1154, but the present edifice was begun by Bishop Kinninmonth, in 1357, and was 80 years in building; it was dedicated to St. Machar, but like many others it fell a sacrifice to the religious frenzy of the reformers. Two very antique spires, and one aisle, which is used as a church, are all that is now left. In this cathedral there was a fine library, which was also destroyed. Over the Don at Old Aberdeen, there is a noble Gothic bridge, built by Bishop Cheyne, in 1281, of one arch, 67 feet span and 34 1-2 high from the surface of the river. On both sides it rests on a solid ledge of rock. The population of Old Aberdeen and parish was 3,901 in 1801, and 18,312 in 1821.

Aberdeen, New, is the capital of the shire of Aberdeen. For extent, trade and beauty, it far exceeds any town in the north of Scotland. It is built on a gentle eminence, rising from a small bay, formed by the river Dee, over which there is an elegant bridge of 7 arches, rebuilt in 1794, the first having been built by Bishop Dunbar, in 1532. The streets are numerous, spacious, and well paved; the houses are built of granite, (from adjoining quarries) generally four stories high, remarkably neat and elegant, having almost universally, gardens in their rear. The whole town is about two miles in circumference, and in 1821 contained a population of 21,484. The municipal government is vested in a provost, 4 bailies, a dean of guild, treasurer, town-clerk, a town council, and 7 deacons of incorporated trades. The town is a royal burgh, and uniting with Aberbrothock, Brechin, Inverberrie, and Montrose, sends a member to parliament. New Aberdeen is graced with an elegant college, founded by George Keith, the Earl Marischal of Scotland, in 1693. Its other public buildings are the town-hall, market-house, the house of the Aberdeen Banking Company, a cross, an octagon building of curious workmanship, a dispensary, infirmary, and lunatic asylum, a poor-house, bridewell, gaol, and extensive barracks. An elegant street from the S. is continued over an arch of cut granite, 132 ft. span, 29 in height, and 40 wide between the parapets. Aberdeen had formerly several religious houses; besides the university, there is a respectable grammar school and several almshouses, and upwards of 90 places for religious worship. The harbour was formerly dangerous, but has been rendered safe and commodious, by a pier 1,900 ft. in length, and 38 in perpendicular height; and the construction of wet docks, authorised by an act of parliament, in 1810. Aberdeen was formerly celebrated for the manufacture of knit stockings, and woollen fabrics generally, which, although still carried on to some extent, are now superseded in importance by the linen and cotton manufactures, which, in all their branches, are carried on to a great extent. There is a valuable salmon fishery in the Dee; a considerable number of vessels are built at Aberdeen, and about 40,000 tons belong to it. It has several public breweries, rope works, iron foundries, &c. and three fairs annually on the 31st Jan. 3rd Wed. in June, and 13th of July; a canal 19 m. in length to Inverary, contributes not a little to the advantage of both places.

Aberdeen, a county of Scotland, bounded on the N. W. by Banffshire, and the Deveron; on the N. and N. E. by the German Ocean; on the S. by the co. of Kincardine, Forfar, and Perth; and on the W. by Elgin, and Inverness-shire. It is divided into 8 districts; the S. part is wild, rugged and mountainous, some of the hills rising to the height of 4,000 ft. above the level of the sea, covered in some parts, with extensive natural forests; the N. part is bleak and barren; but the midland parts of the co. are more fertile; and since the period of 1786, have undergone improvements equal to any part of Scotland. Its rivers are the Dee, Don, Ythan, Bogie, Urie, Ugie, Cruden; and the Deveron, for many miles forms its boundary with the co. of Banff; all of which abound more or less, with salmon, and on the Ythan some valuable pearls have been found. Its mineral productions are various, but none of much note, except the granite, the exportation of which constantly employs several 100 tons of shipping.

Aberdeen, p.t. Brown Co. Ohio, on the river Ohio, opposite Maysville.

Aberdour, a parish in the N. of Aberdeenshire, on the S. coast of Murray Frith. Pop. in 1821, 1,495 also another parish and village 2 m. W. of Burnt-Island, in the co. of Fife, Scotland. Pop. in 1821, 1,489.

Aberford, a town in the W. riding of Yorkshire, 9 m. N. of Ferrybridge, on the direct road to Durham; it has a market on Wed. and 4 fairs annually. Pop. of the parish 900, of the town 579.

Aberfrow, a village pleasantly situated near the coast of Carnarvon bay, on the isle of Anglesea, 9 m. W. of Llangefni, on the direct road from Bangor to Holyhead; it had formerly a palace, at which 11 Princes of Wales are said to have resided. It has 4 fairs annually, 7th March, Wed. after Trinity, 23rd Oct. and 11th Dec. Pop. in 1821, 1,204.

Abergavenny, a town of Monmouthshire, situated at the confluence of the river Gavenny with the Usk, over the latter is a fine bridge of 15 arches: 14 m. W. of Mounmouth; it has the advantage of a collateral cut from the canal, from Brecon to the British channel: there are some considerable iron works in the vicinity, and it also participates in the flannel manufacture. It has a considerable market on Tues. and 3 fairs annually, on May 1st, Tues. after Trinity, and Sep. 25th. Pop. in 1801, 2,573, and in 1831, 3,368.

Abergale, a town in Denbighshire, Wales, pleasantly situated on the coast of the Irish sea, on the direct road from Chester to Holyhead, 7 m. W. of St. Asaph, and 294 from London; it is much frequented in the summer season for bathing, has a market on Sat. and 3 fairs annually. Pop. in 1801, 1,748, in 1831, 2,317.

Abergavilly, a village near Carmarthen, S. Wales, situated at the confluence of the river Gwily with the Towy. It contains the only episcopal palace, belonging to the see of St. David's. Pop. in 1831, 2,183.

Abernethy, a town in Perthshire, Scotland, seated near the junction of the Erns, with the Tay, 7 m. from Perth. It is said to have been the seat of the Pictish kings, as well as the see of an archbishop. In the town church-yard is a round tower 74 feet high and 48 in circumference, the only one besides that of Brechin in Scotland. It participates in the manufactures of Perth, and has three fairs annually. Pop. of the parish in 1821, 1,701. Also the name of another parish, from 150 to 180 sq. m. in extent, partly in Elgin and partly in Inverness-shire, abounding with natural forests of fir, which form an extensive traffic. Pop. in 1821, 1,968.

Aberystwith, a town of S. Wales, in Cardigan-shire, seated on the Ystwith near its confluence with the Rydiol, where they fall into the bay of Cardigan, over the Rydiol is a handsome stone bridge. It lies 307 m. W. N. W. from London, and 39 N. E. from Cardigan. It was formerly fortified with a castle, and defended with walls; but both are now in ruins. It is, however, a flourishing town, having a great trade in lead, a considerable fishery of herrings, cod, and whittings, and a good weekly market on Monday; about 8,000 tons of shipping belong to this town. In the bathing season, it is much frequented as a fashionable watering place. Long. 3. 58. W. lat. 52. 25. N. Pop. in 1831, 3,556.

Abez, a country of Africa, on the Red Sea, which bounds it on the east; on the west it is bounded by Abyssinia and Nubia, on the north by Egypt, and on the south by the coast of Ajan. The chief towns are Arkeko, or Erocco, and Suquam; which last is the capital, and the seat of the governor. It is subject to the Turks; and is very sandy and barren, being destitute of water. The heat is excessive, and the air unhealthy to Europeans. In the mountains are forests of ebony trees, abounding with wild beasts. It is 500 miles in length, and 100 in breadth. The inhabitants are Mahometans.

Abingdon, a market and borough town in Berkshire, England, and, with the exception of Reading, the chief town in the co. It is situated on the S. bank of the river Thames, 6 m. N. W. of Oxford, and 56 m. S. W. from London. It is a place of great antiquity, and has frequently been the abode of royalty. The market-place is spacious, in the centre of which is a respectable edifice, a spacious hall, supported by lofty pillars, in which the summer assizes for the co. are held, the space beneath serving for a market-house. The market for grain and malt, on Mon. and Fri. is very great, and it has a considerable manufacture of coarse linen, sacking, &c. It is divided into two parishes, each having a church, and sends one member to parliament. Pop. in 1831, 5,137.

Abingdon, t. Harford Co. Md. 26 m. N. E. Baltimore.

Abington, p.t. Plymouth Co. Mass. 29 m. S. E. Boston. Pop. 2,493.

Abo, a sea-port, and chief town of what was formerly Swedish Finland, but which was wrested from that power, by Russia, in 1808. The port and town of Abo are finely located in N. lat. 60. 27. W. long. 22. 18. at the southern extremity of the Promontory of Finland, on the E. shore of the Gulf of Bothnia, where it forms its junction with the Gulf of Finland. Under the Swedish government, Abo was the see of a bishop, suffragan of Upsal, and had a university, founded by Queen Christina, in 1640, endowed with the same privileges as that of Upsal; and also a school, founded by Gustavus Adolphus, for 300 scholars. It was the seat of the conference where the treaty of peace was concluded between Russia and Sweden, in 1743. The town has flourished considerably since its transfer to Russia; its chief trade is in timber, deals, and grain. Pop. about 12,000.

Abomey, a populous town, the capital of the kingdom of Dahomey, on the Gold Coast of Africa. N. lat. 7. 50. E. long. 0. 55. Pop. about 25,000.

Aboukir, a town of Egypt, in N. lat. 31. 18. E. long. 30. 38, about 6 leagues E. of Alexandria. A British army of 12,000 men, commanded by Sir Ralph Abercrombie, landed here in 1801. The bay, formed on the W. by a neck of land, on which the town is situated, and on the E. by another neck of land which bounds the Rosetta branch of the Nile, is very spacious, and will forever be memorable in history, as the scene of one of the most splendid and decisive naval battles on record, in which 9 French ships of the line were taken, and 2 others destroyed, by Lord Nelson, on the 1st Aug. 1798.

Abrantes, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, seated on the Tagus, 45 miles E. by N. of Lisbon, and belonging to a marquis of that title. It is situated on high ground, surrounded with gardens and olive-trees, and contains about 35,000 inhabitants, and has 4 convents, an hospital, and an alma-house.

Abrolhos Islands, dangerous shoals on the coast of Brazil, S. lat. 17. 58. W. long. 38. 26.

Abruzzo, one of the four great provinces of Naples, bounded on the E. by the gulf of Venice, on the N. and W. by Ancona, Umbria, and the Campagna di Roma, and on the S. by the Terra di Lavoro and Molise. It is divided into two parts by the river Pescara, called Ulteriore and Citeriore. The former has Aquila, and the latter Sulmona, for its capital. It is fertile in corn, rice, fruits, saffron, vines, and olives. Pop. about 500,000.

Abs, a town in France, in the department of Ardeche, formerly the chief town of Vivares, and a bishop's see, now in a very ruinous state.

Abouage, a town in Upper Egypt, on the site of the ancient Abotis, near the Nile, where great quantities of poppies grow, of which the natives make the best opium in the Levant. Long. 33. E. lat. 26. 30. N.

Abercrombie, p.t. Gloucester Co. N. J.

Abo or Abuyo, one of the Philippine islands, in the East Indies between Mindanao and Luzon. Long. 122. 15. E. lat. 10. 0 N.

Abyssinia, a kingdom on the E. side of Africa, extending, in length, from about the 9th to the 17th deg. of N. lat. and at its southern base, from about the 35th to the 43rd deg. of E. long. and at the N. from about the 36th to the 38th of do. forming an area of about 140,000 sq. m. bounded on the N. by Sennaar, on the E. by the Arabian Gulf, or Red Sea, and on the S. and W. by very undefined limits, and countries very little known. A range of rugged mountains of considerable altitude, extending along the whole line of coast of the Red Sea, shut in Abyssinia, and nearly exclude it from all advantages of maritime intercourse. Some fine and fruitful plains pervade the southern part of the territory, but the prevailing characteristic of Abyssinia is mountainous and wild, and its inhabitants are as rude and ferocious as their country is wild and rugged. Its climate is various, but on the whole fine; it is exceedingly rich in vegetable productions, both of utility and beauty. The elephant, rhinoceros, buffaloes, leopards of various species, zebra, and especially the hyaena, abound; the latter is particularly ferocious and destructive; there are no tigers, and the lion is not common; there are various other wild animals, as well as the domestic ones common to Europe; the horses are strong and handsome, and there is a species of oxen with horns 4 ft. in length, and 20 inches in circumference at the root; the hippopotami and crocodile are common to the swamps and rivers which flow into the Nile. Amongst the numerous feathered tribes common to the country is the golden and black eagle, and some owls of extraordinary size and beauty; bees abound to such a degree, that honey, in the southern parts of the country, forms the staple article of production, and standard of value in exchange for all other commodities, and constitutes the principal article of food; locusts commit great devastation, and there is a species of fly extremely annoying and even destructive to the cattle in the rainy season. The whole of the external traffic of Abyssinia is carried on at Massowah, a small island on the coast of the Red Sea, in N. lat. 15. 34. E. long. 39. 37. where elephants' teeth, rhinoceros' horns, gold-dust, honey, wax, and slaves are exchanged for spices, iron, lead, copper, tin, and manufactured goods generally. The country is formed into three great divisions. 1st. Tigre, N. of which the chief towns are Adowa, Antalo, Dixan, and Axum; 2nd. Amhara, W. of the Taccaxe river, of which Gondar and Embras are the chief towns, and the former the capital of the whole kingdom; 3rd. Shoa Efat, S. of which Ankoher and Tegulet are the chief towns. The Abyssinians profess to be Christians, and some of their churches are spacious edifices, but their religious ceremonies are made up of the crude formalities of the Jewish worship, and of the Greek Christians. Their language is a dialect of the Arabic; of the extent of the pop. it is difficult to form even a conjecture.

Acapulco, a town of Mexico, on the shores of the Pacific Ocean, in lat. 16. 55. N. and 100. 54. W. long. During the domination of Spanish rule in South America, Acapulco was the principal trading town of all New Spain; one, and sometimes two ships, annually, of several 100 tons burthen, used to arrive from the Philippine Islands, laden with all the choicest productions of Asia, to be exchanged for the gold and silver of Mexico; but this intercourse ceased with the wars which followed the French revolution in 1792, since which period to the present time (1832) the commerce of all S. America has been exposed to numerous vicissitudes, and Acapulco has sunk into the utmost insignificance. Its harbour is capacious and secure, being formed into a basin by the small island of Rogneta, and defended by a fort on the N. W. The town contains only about 4,000 inhabitants, and is exceedingly unhealthy, the temperature prevailing as high as 96, and hardly ever below 86 of Fahrenheit.

Acasabastlan, a river of Mexico, in the province of Vera Paz, which runs into the Gulf of Dulce. There is also a village of the same name, in the province of Chiapa.

Accomack, a Co. of Virginia, forming the N. part of a promontory, bounded on the W. by Chesapeake Bay, and on the E. by the Atlantic Ocean, extending from the S. E. corner of the State of Maryland. Pop. 19,656. Drummond-town, 207. m. E. by N. of Richmond, is the chief town.

Acheen, a kingdom, forming the N. W. part of the island of Sumatra, the head of Point Pedro, the most northerly part being in 5. 42. N. lat. and 95. 35. E. long. and extending about 50 m. E. by S. During the early period of the intercourse of Europe with Asia, by the Cape of Good Hope, Acheen was a powerful state and carried on an extensive trade with the Malay and Coromandel coasts, and other parts of Asia; and on the Portuguese successively attempting to form a settlement upon the Island of Sumatra, in the early part of the 16th century, they were completely expelled by the Achenese, and although considerably declined in power and importance, the Achenese are still an active, and when compared with other Asiatics, an efficient and industrious people. The chief town of the same name, is situate on a river about 2 m. from the bay formed by King's Point, in N. lat. 5. 33. and 95. 17. E. long. and Point Pedro above mentioned.

Achill, an island, forming part of the Co. of Mayo, on the western coast of Ireland, in 54. 7. N. lat. 10. 31. W. long.

Achmim, a town of Egypt, the residence of an emir, or prince of the country. It has manufactures of coarse cottons, and stands on a small eminence, on the right bank of the Nile, 200 m. S. of Cairo. Long. 31. 56. E. lat. 26. 40. N.

Achnory, a populous parish, in Leney Barony, co. of Sligo, Ireland. Pop. in 1821, 12,990.

Achortown, p. village in Middletown, Columbia Co. Ohio, 160 m. N. E. Columbus.

Achen, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Magdeburg, with a citadel, on the Elbe, 5 m. N. W. of Dessau.

Acklam, a village 12 m. from York, where the body of the Emperor Severus, who died at York, was burnt to ashes, agreeably to the custom of those times.

Acoma, or St. Estevan de Acoma, a town of New Mexico, seated on a hill, with a good castle. The town is ascended by a flight of steps cut out of the rock. It was formerly the capital of that province. Long. 104. 15. W. lat. 35. 0. N.

Aconcagua, one of the provinces of Chile, intersected by the 32d degree of S. lat. and 70th of W. long. It is inconsiderable both in extent and population. There is a town of the same name, and also a river running through the province and that of Quillota into the sea.

Acqua, a town of Tuscany, noted for its warm baths, 15 m. E. of Leghorn.

Aequi, a town of Italy, in the Duchy of Montferrat, on the river Bormia; it has considerable manufactures of silk. Pop. about 7,000.

Aera, a territory of Guinea, on the Gold coast, where some European states have forts, and each fort its village. Lat. 5. 25. N. 0. 10. W. long.

Acre, or St. John d'Acre, a seaport of Syria, in Palestine, and a bishop's see. It is called Ptolemais by the Greeks, and stands on a plain at the N. point of a bay, which extends in a semicircle of nine m. to the point of Mount Carmel, near the mouth of the Kardanah, or ancient Belus. In the time of the crusades, it underwent several sieges; and nothing is now to be seen of this ancient city, but the remains of monuments erected by the christians, and some ruins of a church dedicated to St. Andrew. The new city is distant one m. from the ancient walls, and the fortifications are of little importance. The palace of the grand master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem is the residence of the chief of Acre. Here are three mosques, four churches, and a synagogue. The chief articles of commerce are corn and cotton. In 1759 great damage was done by an earthquake; and the year following 5,000 persons, near one third of the inhab. died by the plague. In 1799, aided by the British, under Sir Sidney Smith, it withstood a severe siege by the French under Buonaparte, who retreated after failing in the twelfth assault. It is 27 m. S. of Tyre, and 23 m. N. N. W. of Jerusalem. N. lat. 33. 0. E. long. 35. 10. Pop. about 20,000.

Acron, a district of the Fantee territory, on the Gold coast of Africa, about 50 m. E. N. E. of Cape Coast Castle.

Acton, the name of 6 villages, and a prefix to 10 others in different parts of England signifying places originally situate among oaks; ac being the Saxon word for oak. Also the name of a village in the parish of Ballymore, co. of Armagh, Ireland.

Acton, t. Windham Co. Vt. 18 m. N. W. Brattleboro. Pop. 176.

Acton, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. Pop. 1,128.

Acton-Burnel, a village in Shropshire, 8 m. S. of Shrewsbury. Here are considerable remains of a castle, in which a parliament was held in the reign of Edward I.

Actopan, the capital of a district of the same name in the Intendencia de Mexico, about 70 m. N. N. E. of the city of Mexico.

Acworth, p.t. Sullivan Co. N. Hampshire, 87 m. from Portsmouth, and 93 from Boston. Pop. 1,401.

Adamstown, t. Lancaster Co. Pa. 20 m. N. E. Lancaster.

Adams, t. Coos Co. N. Hampshire, 90 m. from Portsmouth. Pop. 515.

Adams, p.t. Berkshire Co. Mass. Pop. 2,648. Saddle Mountain lies partly in this town. Here are extensive manufactures of cotton, woollen and linen.

Adams, p.t. Jefferson Co. N. Y. 160 m. N. W. Albany. Pop. 2,995.

Adams, p.t. Dauphin Co. Pa. 133 m. Washington.

Adams, a County of Pennsylvania. Pop. 21, 378. Gettysburg is the capital.

Adams, a County of Ohio, on the Ohio river, 20 m. in extent and containing 550 sq. m. West Union in Tiffin township is the seat of justice. Pop. 12,278.

Adams, a County of Mississippi. Pop. 12,120. Natchez is the capital.

Adams, p.y. Hyde Co. N. C. 339 m. Wash Adamsburg, p.v. Westmoreland Co. Pa. 145 m W. Harrisburgh.

Adamsville, p.v. Washington Co. N. Y. 57 m. Albany.

Adair, a County of Kentucky. Pop. 8,230 Columbia is the capital.

Adana, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Carmania, and a bishop's see, with a strong castle. It has a trade in corn, wine, and fruits; and is seated on a river of the same name, 12 m. from the Mediterranean, in N. lat. 36. 48. E. long. 35. 6.

Adda, a river of Switzerland, which rises in the Grisons, passes through the lake Como, the Vatteline, and the N. part of the Milanese, falls into the Po, 5m. above Cremona.

Addison, a County of Vermont, on the W. side of the Green Mountains near the centre of the State. It contains about 700 sq. m. Middlebury is the shire town. Pop. 24,940.

Addison, p.t. Addison Co. Vt. on L. Champlain Pop. 1,306. Magnetic oxide of iron is found here.

Addison, t. Washington Co. Me. Pop. 741.

Addison, t. Steuben Co. N. Y. Pop. 944.

Addison, t. Somerset Co. Pa.

Adel, a kingdom of Africa, called also Zaila, from a rich trading town of that name, situated near its coast by the Red Sea. It seldom rains here; but the country is well watered by rivers, and abounds with wheat, millet, frankincense, and pepper. The inhab. are Mahometans. It was formerly a part of Abyssinia. The capital is Aucagurel.

Adelfors, a town of Sweden, in Smaland, noted for its gold mines, about 70 m. N. W. of Calmar.

Adelphi, p.t. Colerain township, Ross Co. Ohio, 40 m. S. E. Columbus.

Adige, a river of Lombardy, which rises S. of the Lake of Glace, and passing by Tyrol, Brixen, Trent, and Verona, falls into the gulf of Venice, a little N. of the mouth of the Po.

Adirbeitzen, a province of Persia (part of the ancient Media,) bounded on the N. by Armenia, E. by Ghilan, S. by Irac Agemai, and W. by Kurdistan. Tauris is the capital.

Admiralty-Islands, a cluster of islands in the S. Pacific ocean, to the N. W. of New Ireland. They were discovered in 1767, and are between 20 and 30 in number; some of them appear of considerable extent; and the W. end of the principal island is in 2. 6. S. lat. and 146. 57. E. long.

Adour, a river of France, which rises in the department of Upper Pyrenees, flows by Tarbes and Dax, and enters the Bay of Biscay, below Bayonne. The Duke of Wellington effected a passage across this river, with the allied English and Spanish army, in the middle of February 1814, after considerable difficulty, in the presence of the French army, commanded by Marshal Soult.

Adowa, the capital and residence of the sovereign of Abyssinia, and the place through which the commerce of the inland parts of Abyssinia is maintained with Massowah in the Red Sea.

Adra, a seaport of Spain, in Granada, 47 m. S. E. of Granada. Long. 3. 7. W. lat. 36. 45. N.

Adramiti, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in N. lat. 39. 26. N. by W. of Smyrna. Long. 26. 50. E. lat. 39. 26. N.

Adrai, a town of Italy, in Polesino di Rovigo which gives name to the Adriatic sea, and was formerly of great note, but has been much reduced by frequent inundations. It is seated on the Turtaro. 26 m. S. S. W. of Venice.

Adrianople, a city of European Turkey, in Rumania, the see of a Greek archbishop, and formerly the European seat of the Turkish dominion. It is eight m. in circumference, situate in a plain, on the river Marissa, which here receives two tributary streams. Several of the mosques are very splendid, and many of the houses neat, but the streets are narrow and devius. The seraglio is separated from the city by the river Arda, and commands an extensive view of the country, which is fertile, and famous for excellent vines. The commerce of the city by the river is considerable, and celebrated for its beautiful red dye. The Turks took this city from the Greeks in 1362. It is 135 m. N. W. of Constantinople. Long. 22. 30. E. lat. 41. N.

Adriatic Sea. See Venice, Gulf of.

Adventure Bay, at the S. E. end of Van Diemen's land, so called from the ship in which Captain Furnear sailed. Long. 147. 30. E. lat. 43. 23. S.

Egades or Egates, three small islands on the W. side of Sicily, between Marsella and Trapani; their names are Levenzo, Favignana, and Maretime.

Etna or Etna, a celebrated burning mountain of Sicily, now called by the natives Monts Gibello. It is situated in the Eastern part of the island, in long. 15. 0. E. lat. 38. 0. N. Pindar, who lived 435 years before Christ, calls it the Pillar of Hesperus, on account of its great height, which is generally reckoned to be about 11,000 feet; and its circumference at the base 70 m. It affords an epitome of all the differences of climate. The summit is a league in circumference, and within formed like a vast amphitheatre, from whence flames, ashes, and smoke, issue in divers places. Eruptions of this mountain are mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, as happening 1,693 years before Christ; and Thucydides speaks of three eruptions, which happened in 734, 477, and 425, B. C. From this period till 1447, there were about 18 different eruptions, the most destructive of which were in 1169 and 1399; there have been other eruptions since, which have done immense damage, particularly those in 1669, 1755, 1780, and 1787. In 1809 eruptions took place in 12 different parts of the mountain, and covered the adjacent land with lava to the depth of 40 feet, and another eruption occurred in 1822.

Afghanistan, a country of Asia, stretching from the mountains of Tartary to the Arabian sea, and from the Indus to the confines of Persia. The inhab. of this wide domain have no written character, and speak a language peculiar to themselves. They are a robust hardy race of men; and being generally addicted to a state of predatory warfare, their manners partake of a barbarous insolence. They avow a fixed contempt for the occupations of civil life; and are esteemed the most negligent of religious observances, of all the Mahometans. Their common dress consists of a shirt, which falls over the upper part of long and narrow trousers; a woollen vest, fitted closely to the body, and reaching to the midleg; and a high turned-up cap of broadcloth or cotton, usually of one colour, and of a conic form, with two small parallel slits in the upper edge of its facing. The principal cities of Afghanistan are Candahar and Cabul, the former of which was the capital; but the late and present sultans have kept their court at Cabul. About the year 1730 an army of Afghans invaded Persia, took Ispahan, and made the sultan Humayn prisoner. They kept possession of Ispahan and the southern provinces for ten years, when they were defeated in several battles, and driven out of the country by Nadir Kuli, commonly known in Europe by the name of Kouli Khan. After Nadir has deposed his sovereign, Shah Thamee, he laid seige to and took Candahar; but afterward received a considerable body of Afghans into his army, who became his favourite foreign troops. On his assassination, in 1747, the general of the Afghan troops, though furiously attacked by the whole Persian army, effected a safe retreat into his own country, where he caused himself to be acknowledged sovereign of the Afghan kingdom. In 1808 the English E. India company deputed the Hon. Mount Stuart Elphinstone on a mission to Cabul, accompanied by a large military retinue. The mission left Delhi on the 13th Oct. the result of their observations and enquiries on the then circumstances and condition of Cabul, (by which name the Afghan territory is generally called,) as well as the countries through which the mission passed, have been since published.

Africa, one of the four great divisions of the world, forming a peninsula to Asia, to which it is connected by a neck of land at the N. E. extremity, about 60 m. across, called the isthmus of Suez. In its extreme length it extends from Cape Negro, in lat. 37. 21. N. to False Cape in lat. 34. 25. S. being about 4,300 m. and in its extreme breadth from Cape Verd in 17. 34. W. to Cape Guardafui in 51. 32. E. long. being about 4,100 m. It will however in the first place be well to consider Africa as divided by nature into two great parts, N. and S., by a chain of mountains, commonly called the Mountains of the Moon, supposed to extend across the entire continent between the 7th to the 11th degrees of N. lat. North Africa will then on its other sides be bounded, on the E. by the Arabian gulf or Red sea, on the N. by the Mediterranean, and on the W. by the Atlantic ocean, approximating in form to a parallelogram; the mean length of which from W. to E. is about fifty degrees of long. and the mean breadth from N. to S. about 27 degrees of lat. forming an area of about 4,550,000 sq. m. of which the great deserts of Sahara, Tuariak, and Lybia constitute about one third of the extent. N. Africa is subdivided into a great number of kingdoms, states and territories; the most prominent of which are, Galla, Abyssinia, Sennaar, and Nubia on the E. bordering on the Red sea, Egypt, at the N. E. extremity, Lybia, Fessan, and Barbary, (comprising, Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, and Fex;) on the N. bordering on the Mediterranean, and Morocco at the N. W. extremity, bounded by the Atlantic ocean; a large extent of coast S. of Morocco, is called Azanago, and S. of the river Senegal in lat. 16. N. to Sierra Leone in lat. 8. 30. the coast is occupied by several Negro tribes, the limits of whose territories are very imperfectly defined. Inland, S. of the great desert, are the kingdoms of Tombuctoo, Houssa, Cassina, and Wangara; and E. of the desert, are Ashber, Bornou, Begherm, Bergoo, Darfur, &c. &c. With the exception of the deserts and the more mountainous districts, this part of Africa is well watered, and exceedingly fertile. The most celebrated river is the Nile, which, rising from various sources on the N. side of the great chain of mountains, and flowing through Abyssinia, Sennar, Nubia, and Egypt, falls into the Mediterranean sea by several channels between the lat. of 30. 16. and 31. 50. E. The river Niger has long furnished a subject of considerable interest to the learned. It is now known to run into the Atlantic ocean at the Bight of Benin. See Niger.

Numerous streams and lakes intersect all the interior part of the country situate between the desert of Sahara and the chain of mountains which divide the continent into two parts. Several rivers fall into the Atlantic ocean S. of the Great desert; the first of these is the Senegal, the entrance of which from the sea is in lat. 15. 53. N. 2nd. the Gambia, in lat. 13. 8. N., and further S. the Pongos, Rio Grande, Noonex, and Sierra Leone, in lat. 8. 30. N.

Independently of the great chain of mountains which divides Africa into two parts, a ridge of considerable altitude extends along the whole extent of the shores of the Red sea; and the states of Barbary are bounded on the S. by another chain called the Atlas, which at the greatest elevation rise to the height of 13,000 feet above the level of the sea.

The middle portion of the western coast of Africa is denominated the Coast of Guinea, on which several of the European states have forts and settlements; it is occupied by several powerful tribes of negroes, with whom the Europeans carry on a very extensive traffic, with the manufactured productions of Europe in general, in exchange for gold dust, ivory, skins, bees wax, palm oil, barwood, &c.; S. of the Coast of Guinea, for about 15 degrees of lat., the coast is also occupied with several Negro tribes, who live in constant collision with each other, and from amongst whom about 100,000 annually, at the period of 1820—1828, were transported as slaves by the ships of France, Portugal, and Spain, for working the plantations of those countries in S. America and the W. Indies; the remaining portion of the W. coast, as well as all the interior, and the E. coast of this part of Africa, is very little known; but as far as knowledge has been obtained the inhab. appear more rude and unsocial than even those of N. Africa. A very rude and uncivilised people, the Hottentots, occupy the more S. extremity of the continent extending to the Cape of Good Hope.

If the climate of America is distinguished by superabundant moisture and cold, that of Africa is not less remarkable for its general want of humidity, and its warmth. Of this fact the immense extent of arid and burning deserts already mentioned, affords incontrovertible proof. The most northern and the most southern districts are equally without a winter; and the greater part of the continent is situated within the tropics.

The ancients indeed supposed the torrid zone to be so parched by the perpendicular rays of the sun as to be uninhabitable; but modern discoveries have assured us that the theory of the ancients is not altogether true. The sun, when vertical, universally brings with him an immense train of clouds, which pour down upon the subjacent country an incessant deluge. When the sun is in the N. the rainy season begins in the countries lying northward from the equator; when in the S., the rainy season is to the S. of the equator. This quantity of rain cools the atmosphere, so as to produce a temperature much more moderate than that which prevails when the sun removes to a greater distance; and the sun produces within the tropics in Africa the same effects as within the same degrees of latitude in other parts of the world. The prevalent drought is here in some measure checked by the tropical rains; and, so far as has been ascertained, the tropical regions are perhaps that part of this continent which is best watered. The greater part of the immense deserts—that of Sahara for instance—lie in general too far N. ever to be under the influence of a vertical sun. The torrid zone may therefore be considered as having only two seasons—the dry and the wet, which are likewise distinguished, in some places, as the summer and winter. In some districts, indeed, there are two dry and two wet seasons in the year; and these are called the short and the long seasons. In all the countries within 20. of the equator the difference in the amount of temperature is scarcely perceptible, at least in the countries lying near the coast, for the interior here is almost entirely unknown to us. In the countries from Cape Blanco up to the Senegal, the mean temperature from November to the end of March is at 6 A. M. about 73. Fahr., and at noon, in the shade, 87. Fahr. Farther into the interior of the country—at Bambouk, for instance—the heat is much more intense. At the Gambia, in the same months, the mean temperature at 6 A. M. is 77., and at noon in the shade, 91. In the months of April, May, and June, at the Senegal, the thermometer 6 A. M. indicates 83., and at noon, in the shade, 95. From the month of July to the end of October, the mean temperature at 6 A. M. is 95.; and at noon 107. In the more southern countries the heat is still greater, and also in the sandy plains; in those districts which are situated farther towards the E., and even in those farther to the N., the heat is frequently rendered insupportable by peculiar localities. Thus at Ombos and Syene, in the S. of Egypt, the sand absolutely scorches the feet of the traveller, and eggs may be dressed by burying them in the sand. At Algiers the mean temperature is 72.; at the Cape of Good Hope the thermometer frequently rises to 86. or 98., and often much higher; but change of temperature is very quickly effected here, and a burning day is frequently followed by a chilly night. During eight months of the year constant fine weather is prevalent throughout a great part of Africa. The sun rises every morning in a clear atmosphere, and spreads a glaring light over the whole country, too brilliant almost for the eye to sustain; no cloud casts a passing shadow over the landscape; and, in the evening, the orb of day sinks magnificently into the ocean. But the excessive heat diminishes the pleasure man might feel in contemplating the glorious sky; and the first clouds which foretell the approach of rain are hailed with delight by the European resident, overwhelmed by the oppressive heat.

The physical peculiarities which distinguish Africa, seem to depend chiefly on the circumstance that almost her whole territory is situated within the tropics. The other portions of the earth's surface which lie directly beneath the solar influence consist generally either of sea, or of narrow and insular lands, refreshed by breezes from the ocean. But the greatest breadth of Africa is under the immediate power and dominion of the sun; and most of her people see that great planet, in its annual progress from tropic to tropic, pass twice over their heads, and thus experience a repetition of its most intense and perpendicular rays. The highest blessings of this sublu-nary world, when carried beyond a certain limit, become its deadliest bane. That parent orb, which cheers and illumines the rest of the earth, glares on Africa with oppressive and malignant beam, blasting the face of nature, and covering her with barrenness and desolation. Sometimes it converts the soil into a naked desert; sometimes overspreads it with a noxious excess of animal and vegetable life. The soil, when not watered by copious rains or river inundations, is scorched and dried up till it is converted into a dreary waste. Hence it is, that in Africa, plains of sand form a feature so truly alarming. The Great Desert, with the exception of the narrow valley of the Nile, reaches across the entire continent, exhibiting an expanse of burning surface, where for many days the traveller finds not a drop of water, nor sees the least vestige of animal or vegetable nature. He pursues his dreary route amid loose hills continually shifting, and leaving no marks to guide his course. Every breeze is filled with dust, which enters the mouth and nostrils, and penetrates between the clothes and skin. Sometimes it drives along in clouds and whirlwinds, beneath which it was once thought that caravans and even armies had been buried; but it is now ascertained that the numerous bones which whiten the desert are merely those of travellers who have sunk under famine, thirst and fatigue; and that the sand, which continually blows, has accumulated above them. Travellers over these tracts of shingle have been impressed with the idea of their being the bed of an ancient ocean. This is not the place to enter into a speculation on the formation of the earth. That every part of its surface lay once beneath the waters is sufficiently apparent; but there is at least no historical proof that Africa emerged later than other continents. The earliest records represent her deserts to have been as extensive as they are in our days, and to have pressed equally close upon the cultivated belt along the northern coast. In general, all regions between the tropics, when not copiously watered, moulder into sand, alternating with a hard and impenetrable stratum of clay. The central wastes of Asia, those of Arabia and of Sindetic Hindostan, though inferior to those of Africa, are yet of similar character and of immense extent. In order to obviate the extreme effects of the tropical sun, which produces a desolation so dreadful, Nature has provided suitable remedies. Every country under this latitude has its rainy season, when, amid the blaze of lightnings and the noise of thunders rending the sky, heaven seems to open all her windows to pour an unbroken flood upon the earth. The ground is covered as with a deluge, and the dry beds of the rivulets are converted into torrents; yet so intense are the sun's rays, that the moisture thus lavished upon the surface is quickly dried up. Great rivers, which, swollen by the rains, overflow their banks and lay the surrounding country under water, or at least afford the means of artificial inundation, are the principal source of that luxuriant fertility, that mighty growth of vegetable forms, which singularly characterize the tropical climates. It is to the waters which descend from the lofty precipices and eternal snows of the Himalah, that the plains of Hindoostan and China owe their amazing fruitfulness. Africa, too, has elevated mountain-chains, which give rise to several rivers of great magnitude and most fertilizing influence. Atlas, along its northern border, presents even in so hot a climate, pinnacles wrapped in everlasting snow. Still more extensive is that central range, which, amid its various local names, is most generally known under the poetical appellation of "The Mountains of the Moon." Yet these chains, besides being not altogether so gigantic as those of the other continents, labour under the peculiar disadvantages of extending across the breadth only of Africa. The Andes and the Himalah, those stupendous heights of America and Asia, as they traverse these continents in the direction of their length, cover a much greater surface, and thus create fertility in the more limited plains which intervene between the mountains and the ocean. But the largest of the African rivers, directing their course through a vast extent of low land, reach the sea only by a circuitous course. Several of them, too, diffusing their waters into lakes or marshes, expire in the very heart of the continent. The result is, that the enormous breadth of the Sahara, or Great Desert, is scarcely irrigated even by a streamlet. It depends entirely on the periodical rains; and these sink into the sandy and porous surface, till being arrested at the depth of eight or ten feet, they form that "sea under ground" which has been traced over a large portion of the waste.

Vegetable life, in consequence of this absence of moisture, is scantily diffused over a great extent of the continent. In the heart of the mountains, however, and in the kingdoms along their border, the soil is most profusely watered, and, under the influence of a tropical sun, produces, perhaps, beyond any other part of the world, that luxuriant growth and those gigantic vegetable forms, which distinguish the equatorial regions. The baobab, or great calabash, appears to be the most enormous tree on the face of the earth. Adanson assures us, that the circumference in some cases is equal to thirteen fathoms, as measured by his arms clasped round the trunk, that is varying from seventy-four to seventy-seven feet. Branches extending horizontally from the trunk, each equal to a large tree, make the baobab a forest as it were by itself. The mangrove, too, which rises on the borders of rivers or inundated spots, diffuses itself in a manner truly remarkable. The branches, dropping down upon the watery bank, strike root and grow; hence the original plant, spreading farther and farther, forms over the stream a species of natural arcade. These mighty trees do not stand alone, but have their interstices filled up by numberless shrubs, canes, creeping and parasitical plants, which intersect and entwine with each other till they form a thick and impenetrable mass of underwood. To cut even a narrow pass through these dense forests is a laborious process; and as shoots are continually protruding inwards on each side, the track, without constant travelling, and the diligent use of the axe, soon becomes impassable.

As we approach the confines of the Desert, these giants of the wood disappear, and vegetation presents a different and more pleasing aspect. It exhibits now the light and gay form of the acacia, whole forests of which rise amid the sand, distilling those rich gums that afford an important material of African commerce. The lotus, a celebrated and classical shrub, the tamarisk, and other small and elegant trees, afford agreeable and nutritive berries, which constitute the food of several nations. Various flowering shrubs of the most delicate tints, rising in wild and spontaneous beauty, embellish the precincts of the waste. Thus the Desert, in its first approaches, and before vegetable life begins to expire, does not assume its sternest character, but wears even a peculiarly pleasing and smiling aspect.

The animal world in Africa changes equally its nature as it passes from one to another of these opposite regions. In those plains which are inundated by the great rivers, it multiplies at an extraordinary rate, and often assumes huge and repulsive forms. Throughout all this continent the wild tribes exist in large and formidable numbers, and there is scarcely a tract which they do not either hold in full possession, or fiercely dispute with man. Even the most densely-peopled countries border on wide forests and wastes, whose savage tenants find their prey occasionally in man himself, as well as in the domestic animals which surround him; and when the scent of human slaughter is wafted on the breeze, bands of hungry monsters hasten from every side to the feast of blood. These ferocious creatures hold, indeed, so commanding a position, that the colonist scarcely makes any attempt to extirpate them, or even to keep down their numbers. He wages against them only a defensive war, and employs his courage and skill chiefly in hunting the elephant, the antelope, and other peaceful species, by whose spoil he may be enriched.

The lion, that king of the desert, that mightiest among the tribes which have the wilderness for their abode, abounds in Africa, and causes all her forests to re-echo his midnight roar. Yet both his courage and fierceness have, it is said, been overrated; and the man who can undauntedly face him, or evade his first dreadful spring, rarely falls his victim. Wider ravages are committed by the hyena, not the strongest, but the most ferocious and untameable of all the beasts of prey. These creatures, by moving in numerous bands, achieve what is beyond the single strength of the greater animals; they burst with mighty inroad into the cities, and have even carried by storm fortified enclosures. The elephant roams in vast herds through the densely-wooded tracts of the interior, disputing with the lion the rank of king of the lower creation; matchless in bulk and strength, yet tranquil, majestic, peaceful, led in troops under the guidance of the most ancient of the number, having a social and almost moral existence. He attacks neither man nor beast. The human being is more frequently the aggressor, not only with the view of protecting the fruits of the earth, but also in order to obtain the bony substance composing his tusks, which, under the name of ivory, forms one of the most valued articles of African trade. The prodigious strength of the elephant, his almost impenetrable hide, his rapid though unwieldy movements, render him a most perilous object of attack, even to the boldest hunters; so that pits and snares of various kinds are the usual modes by which his capture is effected. Instead of the tiger, Africa has the leopard and the panther; belonging, however, only to certain of its districts.

In the large and broad rivers of Africa, and through the immense forests which overshadow them, a race of amphibious animals of monstrous form and size display their unwieldy figures. The rhinoceros, though not strictly amphibious, slowly traverses marshes and swampy grounds, and almost equals the elephant in strength and defensive powers, but wants his stature, his dignity, and his wisdom. The single or double horn with which he defends himself is an article of commerce in the East, though not valued in Europe. A still huger shape is that of the hippopotamus, or river-horse, fitted alike to stalk on land, to march along the bottom of the waters, or to swim on their surface. He is slow, ponderous, gentle; yet when annoyed either by design or accident, his wrath is terrible; he rushes up from his watery retreat, and by merely striking with his enormous tusks, can overturn or sink a loaded canoe. But the most dreaded of the inhabitants of the African rivers is the crocodile, the largest and fiercest of the lizard tribe. He lies like a log upon the waters watching for his prey, attacking men, and even the strongest of animals, which, however, engage with him in obstinate and deadly encounters.

We have not yet done with all the monstrous and prodigious forms which Africa generates. She swarms with the serpent brood, which spread terror, some by their deadly poison, others by their mere bulk and strength. In this last respect the African serpents have struck the world with amazement; ancient history records that whole provinces were overrun by them, and that one, after disputing the passage of a river with a Roman army, was destroyed only by the use of a battering engine.

Emerging from these dark regions, where the earth, under the united influence of heat and moisture, teems with such a noxious superabundance of life, we approach the Desert. Here a change takes place equally singular and pleasing as in the vegetable world. Only light, airy, and fantastic forms trip along the sandy border; creatures innocent, gentle, and beautiful,—the antelope of twenty different species, all swift, with bright eyes, erect, and usually elegant figures, preying neither on men nor animals, but pursued by all on account of the delicate food which they afford Here also the camelopard, the tallest and most remarkable of animal forms, with its long fore-legs and high-stretching neck of singular and fantastic beauty, crops the leaves of the African forest. Though a rare species, he is seen occasionally straying over a great proportion of that continent. Here, too, roams the zebra, with its finely-striped skin wrapped around it like a robe of rich cloth.

Nature, sporting as it would seem in the production of extraordinary objects, has filled Africa with a wonderful multitude of those animals which bear the closest alliance to "the human form divine." The orang-outang appears to constitute the link between man and the lower orders of living things. Standing erect, without a tail, with flat face, and arms of not greatly disproportioned length, it displays in every particular a deformed resemblance to the lord of the creation. It seems even to make a nearer approach than any other animal to the exercise of reason. It has been taught to make its own bed, to sit at table, to eat with a knife and fork, and to pour out tea. M. Degrandpre mentions one kept on board a French vessel, which lighted and kept the oven at a due temperature, put in the bread at a given signal, and even assisted in drawing the ropes. There was a strong suspicion among the sailors that it would have spoken, but for the fear of being put to harder work. The baboons, again, are a large, shapeless, brutal species, ugly and disgusting in their appearance, yet not without some kind of union and polity. The monkey tribe, now familiar in Europe, and attracting attention by their playful movements, fill with sportive cries all the forests of tropical Africa.

The insect race, which in our climate is generally harmless, presents here many singular and even formidable characteristics. The flying tribes, in particular, through the action of the sun on the swampy forests, rise up in terrible and destructive numbers. They fill the air and darken the sky; they annihilate the labour of nations; they drive even armies before them. The locust, when its bands issue in close and dark array from the depths of the Desert, commits ravages surpassing those of the most ferocious wild beasts, or even the more desolating career of human warfare. In vain do the despairing inhabitants seek with fire and other means to arrest their progress; the dense and irresistible mass continues to move onward, and soon baffles every attempt to check its course. Whole provinces, which at their entrance are covered with rich harvests and brilliant verdure, are left without a leaf or a blade. Even when destroyed by famine or tempests, they cover immense tracts, exhaling the most noxious stench. Yet they may be used as food, and are even relished by certain native tribes. The mos-cheto and its allies do not spread such a fearful desolation; yet by their poisoned and tormenting stings, they render life miserable, and not very unfrequently lead to its extinction. Even a swarm of wild bees, in the solitary woods of Western Africa, has put a whole caravan to flight, wounding severely some of its members. But perhaps the most extraordinary of all the insect races are the termites, or white ants, which display on a greater scale the arts and social organization for which their species have been so famed in Europe. They cover the plains with their conical huts from ten to twelve feet in height; they are regularly distributed into labourers and soldiers, with others holding the rank of king and queen. This latter personage, when she is about to add to the numbers of the tribe, presents a most extraordinary spectacle, being then swelled to many times the amount of her natural dimensions; and when the critical period arrives, instead of a progeny of two or three, she produces as many thousands. These ants are far from being of the same harmless description as the corresponding insects of this quarter of the world. On finding their way into a house, they devour every thing, clothes, furniture, food, not even it is said sparing the inmates, who are compelled to make a speedy retreat.

Such are the evils to which the people of this continent are perpetually exposed from the lower creation; and yet they experience in full force the truth of the pathetic lamentation of the poet, that "man is to man the surest, deadliest foe." Africa from the earliest ages has been the most conspicuous theatre of crime and of wrong; where social life has lost the traces of primitive simplicity, without rising to order, principle, or refinement; where fraud and violence are formed into national systems, and man trembles at the sight of his fellow-man. For centuries this continent has seen thousands of her unfortunate children dragged in chains over its deserts and across the ocean, to spend their lives in foreign and distant bondage. Superstition, tyranny, anarchy, and the opposing interests of numberless petty states, maintain a constant and destructive warfare in this suffering portion of the earth.

Fever is much less common among native Africans than among European settlers. Africans are seldom affected with enlargement of the spleen. A dangerous species of lethargy is very frequent in the Foola country. Venereal complaints occur in various forms in Africa, but mostly in that of gonorrhœa. The coup de soleil (sun-stroke) is unknown in this country, although the natives are in the habit of exposing the head to the perpendicular rays of the sun during the greatest bodily exertions, and Europeans, under such circumstances, seldom have more than a thin handkerchief folded round the head. Dysentery is a frequent complaint on shore. Gout is wholly unknown. The diseases of children are few; and those of women, as may be readily imagined, are greatly fewer than in more polished countries.

The limits of the changeable winds of Africa are about the 30th degree on each side of the equator. Within this region are the passage winds. These blow more or less N. E. in the northern hemisphere, and S. E. in the southern. The monsoons, which are strong and regular in the open Arabian sea become changeable on approaching the land. In the Arabian sea they generally blow from the E. during the months and intervening months of October and May; and during the rest of the year they blow from the W. In the Red sea the S. E. wind prevails in the southern parts from October to June, when the N. wind begins to blow, and lasts during the remainder of the year. In the northern parts of this sea violent N. winds prevail for nine months of the year. The transition from one season to another is generally accompanied by violent hurricanes and thunderstorms. Some districts are more exposed to these visitations than others; as, for instance, the countries between Cape Verga and Cape Monte, which are often visited betwixt the months of June and October by dreadful tornadoes, the effects of which seldom extend to the neighbouring coasts.—In the deserts the wind is often very troublesome to the traveller, by raising the sand, and filling the air with dust, so as to render it impossible to keep one's eyes open, and difficult even to breathe.—Mr. Buckingham, while travelling betwixt the Red sea and the Mediterranean in 1814, encountered one of these sand-tempests, which he has described with great beauty and effect. "On leaving," says he, "the site of these now evaporated lakes, (the Bitter lakes,) we entered upon a loose and shifting sand again, like that which Pliny describes when speaking of the roads from Pelusium, across the sands of the desert; in which, he says, unless there be reeds stuck in the ground to point out the line of direction, the way could not be found, because the wind blows up the sand, and covers the footsteps.—The morning was delightful on our setting out, and promised us a fine day; but the light airs from the south soon increased to a gale, the sun became obscure, and as every hour brought us into a looser sand, it flew around us in such whirlwinds, with the sudden gusts that blew, that it was impossible to proceed. We halted, therefore, for an hour, and took shelter under the lee of our beasts, who were themselves so terrified as to need fastening by the knees, and uttered in their wailings but a melancholy symphony. I know not whether it was the novelty of the situation that gave it additional horrors, or whether the habit of magnifying evils to which we are unaccustomed, had increased its effect; but certain it is, that fifty gales of wind at sea appeared to me more easy to be encountered than one amongst those sands. It is impossible to imagine desolation more complete; we could see neither sun, earth, nor sky: the plain at ten paces distance was absolutely imperceptible: our beasts, as well as ourselves, were so covered as to render breathing difficult; they hid their faces in the ground, and we could only uncover our own for a moment, to behold this chaos of mid-day darkness, and wait impatiently for its abatement. Alexander's journey to the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and the destruction of the Persian armies of Cambyses in the Lybian desert, rose to my recollection with new impressions, made by the horror of the scene before me; while Addison's admirable lines, which I also remembered with peculiar force on this occasion, seemed to possess as much truth as beauty:

'Lo! where our wide Numidian wastes extend,
Sudden the impetuous hurricanes descend,
Which through the air in circling eddies play.
Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away.
The helpless traveller, with wild surprise,
Sees the dry desert all around him rise:
And, smothered in the dusty whirlwind, dies.'

"The few hours we remained in this situation were passed in unbroken silence: every one was occupied with his own reflections, as if the reign of terror forbade communication. Its fury spent itself, like the storms of ocean, in sudden lulls and squalls; but it was not until the third or fourth interval that our fears were sufficiently conquered to address each other; nor shall I soon lose the recollection of the impressive manner in which that was done. 'Allah kereem!' exclaimed the poor Bedouin, although habit had familiarised him with these resistless blasts. 'Allah kereem!' repeated the Egyptians, with terrified solemnity; and both my servant and myself, as if by instinct, joined in the general exclamation. The bold imagery of the Eastern poets, describing the Deity as avenging in his anger, and terrible in his wrath, riding upon the wings of the wind and breathing his fury in the storm, must have been inspired by scenes like these."

In Egypt a S. wind prevails in summer, which raises immense quantities of sand, and is often so hot as to stop respiration. Another called samiel by the natives is still hotter and more terrible.—But the most dreadful of all these burning winds is the simoon, which seems to be a concentrated column of the positive electric fluid, moving northwards, from the S. or S. E., and carrying sure destruction to all who breathe the baleful atmosphere which accompanies it. The only chance of escaping destruction when the simoon glides across the desert is, for the traveller to throw himself flat on his face, which he has not always time to do, for it moves with amazing rapidity. Bruce, whose ardent mind was not easily deterred from the attainment of knowledge by the presence of danger, has described this fearful phenomenon. On the attendants calling out that the simoon was coming, he immediately turned for a moment to the quarter whence it came. It resembled a haze, in colour like the purple part of the rainbow, but not so compressed or thick. It was a kind of blush upon the air, and was about 20 yards in breadth, and about 4 from the ground. Its motion was so rapid, that before he could turn and fall upon the ground, he felt its violent heat upon his face. It passed like a gentle rustling wind, but was succeeded by a slight breeze, which for two or three hours was of such intensity of heat, as nearly to suffocate them. Bruce unfortunately inhaled a little of the purple haze, which nearly deprived him of his voice, and caused an asthma of two years' continuance. They saw it twice afterwards as they journeyed across the desert. The second time, it was more southerly—its edges were less defined, resembling a thin smoke—and it had about a yard in the middle tinged with purple and blue. The third time, it had the same purple and blue appearance, but was preceded by the largest sand pillar they had seen.—One of the most striking phenomena on the Gold Coast is the N. E. wind called harmattan. It comes on indiscriminately at any hour of the day, at any time of the tide, or at any period of the moon; and continues sometimes only a day or two, sometimes five or six days, and has been occasionally known to last fifteen or sixteen days. There are generally three or four returns of it every season; it blows with a moderate force, not so strongly as the sea-breeze, but somewhat more so than the land-wind. A fog or haze is one of the peculiarities which always accompany a harmattan; extreme dryness is another property of it: no dew falls during its continuance, nor is there the least appearance of moisture in the atmosphere, vegetables of every kind are much injured by it, and the grass withers under its influence. The process of evaporation during this wind proceeds with astonishing rapidity.

Agakly, a province in the centre of N. Africa, the chief town of the same name is situated in about 20. N. lat. and 13. E. long.

Agallela or Gallela, an island of Africa, near Madagascar. Long. 24. 8. E. lat. 10. 12. N.

Agamenticus, a mountain in the State of Maine, about 8 m. from York harbour. It affords pasture up to its summit, and is a sea-mark for the entry of Piscataqua river. Long. 70. 30. W. lat. 43. 16. N.

Agawam, r. Mass. flows into the sea at Wareham.

Agde, a town of France, in the department of Hérault, on the river Hérault, not far from its mouth, in the Gulf of Lions, where there is a fort to defend the entrance. It is 17 m. N. E. of Narbonne. Long. 3. 28. E. lat. 43. 19. N.

Agen, a city of France, capital of the department of Lot and Garonne, and a bishop's see. Prunes form here a considerable object of commerce; and it has manufactures of camblets, serges, and canvas. It is seated in a fertile country, on the banks of the Garonne, 80 m. E. S. E. of Bordeaux. Long. 0. 38. E. lat. 44. 12. N.

Agga, Aggona, or Aconah, a town and district on the coast of Guinea, in which is a very high hill, called the Devil's Mount. The English have a fort here. Long. 0. 5. E. lat. 6. 0. N.

Aggerkuus, a fortress of Norway, in the government of the same name, which is full of mountains. See Christiania.

Agha, there are 16 townships or parishes in Ireland, the names of which commence with Agha; as, Agha-boe, bog, bolloge, da, derg, doe, down, gallen, gower, lee, lurcher, lo, macart, more, vallagh, vea, most of them contain from 4 to 6,000 inhab. and Aghalurcher in Fermanagh Co. upwards of 12,000.

Aghramullin, a parish in the Co. of Monaghan, Ireland. Pop. in 1821, 15,827.

Aghrim, properly Aughrim. See Augh.

Agimere, or Ajmeer, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a province of the same name. It stands at the foot of a high mountain, on the top of which is a fortress of great strength. It was at Ajmeer, that Sir Wm. Rowe, as English ambassador, was introduced to the Great Mogul in 1716. It is 150 m. W. by S. of Agra. Long. 75. 20. E. lat. 26. 35. N.

Agincourt, a village of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, famous in history for the battle fought here in 1405, wherein Henry V. of England, with an army of 10,000 men, defeated the French army of 60,000, leaving near 10,000 dead on the field. It is 7 m. N. of Hesdin.

Aglish, the name of 4 parishes in Ireland, viz. 1st, in the Co. of Kilkenny. Pop. 1,665, 2nd, in Kerry, pop. 2,298. 3rd, in Cork, pop. 2,446. 4th, in Waterford, pop. 3,268.

Agmat, a town of Morocco, on a river of the same name, and on the W. side of one of the mountains of Atlas, 16 m. S. of Morocco.

Agmondesham. See Amerham.

Agnano, a circular lake in the kingdom of Naples, 7 m. from Puzzuoli. It is about half a m. in diameter, surrounded by mountains. On its margin is the famous Grotta del Cane, where many dogs have been tortured and suffocated, to show the effect of a vapour which rises a foot above the bottom of the cave, and is destructive to animal life.

Agnes, St. one of the Scilly Islands. off the Lands End, Cornwall; there is a light house upon it in lat. 42. 54. N. 6. 19. W. long. Also the name of a parish in the Co. of Cornwall, England, rich in mines. Pop. 5,762.

Agon, Agou, or Agoen, an island of Sweden, in the gulf of Bothnia, with a good harbour, long. 18. 10. E. lat. 42. 55. N.

Agosta, an island in the Adriatic sea, near the coast of Dalmatia, 18 m. in circumference, and 18, S. W. of the island of Gurezola. Long. 17. 0 E. lat. 42. 55. N.

Agosta, a town of Sicily, in Val di Noto, with an excellent harbour, on the E. coast, 18 miles north of Syracuse. Long. 15. 10. E. lat. 37. 20. N.

Agra, a city of Hindoostan Proper, capital of a province of the same name, with a strong fort. It was once the most splendid of all the Indian cities, and now exhibits the most magnificent ruins. About the year 1566, the emperor Acbar made it his capital, and gave his name to it; since which time it is often named Acbarabad. In the 17th century, the great Mogul frequently resided here; his palace was prodigiously large; the palaces of the omrahs and others are very numerous; and there are above 60 caravanseras, 800 baths, 700 mosques, and two magnificent mausoleums. It has since rapidly declined. In the war with the Mahrattas, in 1803, it was taken by the British. It stands on the right bank of the Jumna, a branch of the Ganges, 100 m. S. by E. of Dehli. Long. 78. 30. E. lat. 27. 16. N.

Agram or Zagrab, a strong town of Croatia, capital of the county of Zagrab, and a bishop's see; seated on the Save, 27. m. N. E. of Carlstadt. Long. 16. 18. E. lat. 45. 48. N.

Agria, a town of Upper Hungary, and a bishop's see, with a citadel. It was besieged by the Turks, in 1552, with 70,000 men; they lost 8,000 men in one day, and were obliged to raise the siege, though the garrison consisted only of 2,000 Hungarians, assisted by the women, who performed wonders on this occasion. It is seated on the Agra, 47 m. N. E. of Buda. Long. 20. 10. E. lat. 48. 10. N.

Agrikan, or Island of Xavier, one of the Ladrone islands, 43 m. in compass, and has several volcanic mountains. Long. 146. 0. E. lat. 19. 40. N.

Agua Calientes, a city in the province of Guadalupe, Mexico, it is situated about 250 m. N. N. W. of the city of Mexico on the direct route to Santa Fe, and is noted for its warm springs.

Agulhas Cape, the most southern point of Africa, 13 leagues E. S. E. of the Cape of Good Hope. Long. 20. 18. E. lat. 34. 55. S.

Ahanta, a district on the Gold Coast, Africa. Axim, the chief town, is on the coast in 4. 57. N lat. 2. 55. W. long. Dixcove and Secondee are other stations on the coast through which considerable traffic is carried on with the inland parts.

Ahascragh, a town in the Co. of Galway, Ireland, containing 600 inhab. and the parish 4,240.

Ahmedabad. See Amedabad.

Ahmednagar. See Amednagar.

Ahmedpore, a town in the province of Orissa, Hindoostan. 34 miles S. from Cuttack.

Ahoghill, a populous parish in the Co. of Antrim, Ireland. Pop. in 1821, 18,120; there is a town of the same name. Pop. only 370. Portglanone town with 618 inhab. Ballykennedy, Culley-backy, and Galgorim, villages; total pop. 726 are all included in the parish.

Ajaccio, a seaport of Corsica, capital of the department of Liamone, and a bishop's see. This is the birth-place of Napoleon Bonaparte. It stands on the west side of the island, on a point of land that juts into the gulf, 160 m. S. E. of Toulon. Long. 8. 43. E. lat. 41. 56. N.

Ajan or Ajen, a country on the eastern coast of Africa, extending from Magadoxa to Cape Guardafui, 1,500 leagues. It is divided into several states or kingdoms; the principal of which are Adel and Magadoxa. The south coast of Ajan is sandy and barren, but to the N. it is more fertile. The kings of Ajan are frequently at war with the emperor of Abyssinia, and sell the prisoners which they take. Ivory, gold, and horses of an excellent breed, are the articles of trade.

Ajazzo, Aias or Ajasso, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, in Syria, seated on the Mediterranean on the site of the ancient Issus, where Alexander fought his second battle with Darius. It is 30 m. S. of Antioch, and 40 W. Aleppo. Long. 36. 10. E. lat. 36. 0. N.

Aich or Aichach, a town of Bavaria, with a castle, seated on the Par, 18 m. S. of Neuburg.

Aichstadt, a town of Franconia in Bavaria. In the church is a piece of curious workmanship, called the Sun of the Holy Sacrament, which is of massy gold, enriched with diamonds, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones. It is seated on the Altmühl, 40 m. S. by E. of Nuremberg. Long. 11. 10. E. lat. 48. 50. N.

Aid, t. Lawrence Co. Ohio.

Aidal, the principal seaport of Nubia, seated on a mountain, on the coast of the Red sea. It has a trade in ebony, and aromatic plants. Long. 35. 57. E. lat. 22. 20. N.

Aigen, a town of Austria, on the confines of Bohemia. 24 m. N. W. of Steyre.

Aigle, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Vaud. All the houses, even the meanest, are built of white marble, found in the neighbourhood. It is seated near the Rhone, 6 m. from its entrance into the lake of Geneva.

Aigle, a town of France, in the department of Orne, 47 m. S. W. of Rouen.

Aignan, St. a town of France, in the department of Loire and Cher, on the river Cher, 24 m. S. by E. of Blois.

Ailah, a town of Arabia Petrea, at the head of an inlet of the Red sea, 108 m. E. S. E. of Suez. Long. 34. 10. E. lat. 29. 10. N.

Ailly, a town of France, in the department of Somme, 9 m. S. S. E. of Amiens.

Ailse, an insulated rock, in the frith of Clyde, off the coast of Ayreshire, Scotland, its base is 2 m. in circumference. It consists of a stupendous assemblage of precipitous cliffs, rising in a pyramidal series, 900 ft. high, accessible on the N. E. It affords refuge to an immense number of sea-fowl, and is well stocked with rabbits. The ruins of a chapel and of a castle, are still seen; and near the latter is a spring of fresh water. It gives the title of Baron of the United Kingdom, to the family of Kennedy, Earls of Cassillis, in Scotland.

Ain, a department of France, which takes its name from the river, bounded on the N. E. and S. by the departments of Jura, Mont Blanc, and Isere, and on the W. by those of the Rhone and the Loire, and Saone and Loire. Bourg is the capital.

Airdrie, a town in the parish of New Monkland, Co. of Lanark, Scotland. It has an iron foundry, and a considerable trade in the distillation of malt spirits. It is 10 m. E. of Glasgow, on the direct road to Edinburgh. Pop. in 1821, 4,860, and of the parish, 7,362.

Aire, a town of France, in the department of Landes, seated on the side of a mountain, on the river Adour, 65 m. S. of Bourdeaux. Long. 0. 10. E. lat. 43. 42. N.

Aire, a river in Yorkshire, which issues from a lake on Malham moor, near Settle, flows by Skipton, Keighley, Leeds, and Snaith, and enters the Ouse, below Howden.

Aisme, a department of France, including the territories of Soissonnois and Vermandois. It takes its name from a river which runs by Soissons, and enters the Oise, above Compiègne. It was overrun by the allied armies in 1814, and was the scene of several obstinate and bloody battles fought between the allies and French, in the months of February and March, of the same year. Laon is the capital.

Aiz, an ancient city of France, capital of the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, and an archbishop's see. It was founded by C. S. Calvinus, a Roman General, 120 B. C. and was formerly the capital of Provence, when it had a parliament. It is seated in a plain, where there are hot baths near the river Arc, accidentally discovered in 1704, but several medals and other antiques, dug up at that time, confirm the baths being known to the Romans. It is 75 m. E. of Montpellier. Long. 5. 27. E. lat. 43. 32. N.

Aiz, a town of Savoy, on the lake Bourget. Here are mineral waters, much frequented. It is 12 m. N. by E. of Chambery.

Aiz, a small island of France, between the isle of Oleron and the Continent. It is 12 m. N. W. of Rochfort. Long. 1. 10. W. lat. 46. 5. N.

Aiz-la-Chapelle, a city of Prussia in the grand duchy of the lower Rhine, lately an imperial city of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers. Charlemagne was so delighted with the beauty of the place, that he chose it for his residence; he is interred in the church of Notre Dame, where they keep his sword and belt. It is seated in a bottom, surrounded by mountains, 22 m. N. E. of Leige. Long. 5. 54. E. lat. 50. 52. N. Pop. 33, 000.

The population of the town, during the period of its prosperity, was estimated at upwards of 100,000, mostly supported by their native manufactures, which were carried on to a considerable extent; being chiefly in woolen cloths, needle-works, Prussian blue, white soap, needles, and pins. The impolitic selfishness of the trading guilds or corporations has been a great check upon manufacturing industry, and the population has proportionally decreased. The two last-named branches of manufacture are, however, still carried on with much spirit.

The town consists of two parts: the inner, about three quarters of a league in circumference, and flanked with ten towers, of which Charlemagne is said to be, if not the founder, the great improver; and the outer, by which the former has been surrounded. The latter has eight gates, is about two leagues in circuit, and is built partly of brick and partly of a blue stone raised from a quarry at some distance. There are upwards of seventy streets; some handsome, and adorned with fine houses. Though no large river approaches the town, it is abundantly supplied from three streams which flow through it, the Pau, the Paunelle, and the Johannis, whose waters are found fully sufficient for the manufacturing and domestic demands of the inhabitants.

The town hall is chiefly remarkable for two ancient towers, the erection of one of which is attributed to the Romans; and for a spacious hall measuring 162 feet by 60, in which the emperor dined on the day of his coronation. A picture representing the congress of 1748 is to be seen in this building; the portraits of all the members of the congress having been painted at the request of the town magistrates. It contains also several portraits of Charlemagne, and statues of all the emperors since his time. Opposite to this building is an antique fountain, on the top of which is a statue of the same emperor, in copper gilt, holding in his right hand a sceptre and in his left a globe.

The choir of the great church, in which the ceremonial of the coronation took place, is a highly admired piece of Gothic architecture, enriched with some exquisitely wrought pieces of tapestry. In it is also the tomb of the emperor Otho. The pulpit is richly ornamented with gold and precious stones. The remains of the great benefactor of the town, so often mentioned already, were deposited in a tomb covered with a plain black slab, under the centre of the dome, and marked with the simple inscription "CAROLO MAGNO." On the tomb being opened by Otho III., the body of the monarch was found seated in a chair of marble, dressed in his robes and adorned with the insignia of royalty. These were taken away, to be used in subsequent coronations. The tomb was again opened by Frederick I., and placed in an antique sarcophagus, which was carried off by the French on account of its singular beauty, and lodged in the Louvre at Paris; but it has since been restored. The church is also much frequented on account of the numerous relics deposited in it. The person in whose custody they are, furnishes the curious visitant with a long list of the particulars connected with each: they are carefully preserved; and many of them richly embellished with precious stones, and enclosed in costly cabinets. On the advance of the French army, after the Revolution, all the relics were removed into the interior of Germany, and placed under the special custody of the emperor. They have since been restored to their ancient abode, with the exception of the sword of Charlemagne, some earth steeped with the blood of Stephen the first martyr, and a copy of the gospels in golden letters, which the emperor retained as a recompense for his trouble in taking care of the others. The church of St. Nicholas has some fine paintings.

Near the town is the hill of Louisburg, which commands a fine view of it and of the adjacent country. On its summit was an obelisk, erected in honour of Napoleon. After his flight from Russia it was thrown down by the Cossacks, in hopes of coming at the coins buried beneath. It has been restored by the king of Prussia; the inscriptions in praise of Napoleon being changed to others commemorating his reverses and downfall.

But the peculiar characteristics of Aix, which chiefly attract strangers and secure its prosperity, are its warm baths, which have been long in the highest repute for scrofulous and cutaneous diseases, and also for the removal of visceral obstructions and diseases arising from a derangement in the organs of digestion. Their analysis shows that they contain carbonate and muriate of soda and carbonate of lime: they are extremely nauseous; though habit, arising from a conviction of their utility, renders them at length somewhat palatable. These waters near the sources are clear and pellucid, with a strong sulphureous smell resembling the washings of a foul gun; but they lose this smell by exposure to the air. Their taste is saline and bitter. They do not contain iron. They are also neutral near the fountain; but afterwards are manifestly and pretty strongly alkaline, inasmuch that clothes are washed in them without soap. The accounts of different writers as to the height of their temperature are various; ranging, however, from 136. to 146. of Fahrenheit. The baths are seven in number, arising from five springs, called the Imperial, the Cornelius, the Quirinus, the Small, and the Rose: the two first named are deemed the most efficacious. Besides these, there is a cold spring called Campasbad: though weaker, and therefore less efficacious, it is frequented by many, on account of its lower temperature and its less disagreeable taste. The poorer classes also use it. The revenues of the town arise in part from the farming of these springs.

Like other watering places, Aix is resorted to for pleasure as well as for health. A suite of apartments called the Redoubte is laid out as a place of promenade and refreshment, together with a saloon for balls and evening entertainments.

The charitable institutions are, an hospital for the diseased, another for orphans, another for incurables, an institution for the maintenance of the poor who come to the waters, and a school for the education of the poor, with a house of refuge for the indigent: both these last were founded by the empress Josephine.

Alabama, one of the United States of America, lying between 30. 12. and 35. N. lat. and 85. and 88. 30. W. long.; bounded N. by Tennessee, E. by Georgia, S. by Florida and the Gulf of Mexico, and W. by Mississippi; having a length of 360 and a breadth of 160 m. and containing an area of 46,000 sq. m. It is divided into 36 counties, and is watered by the Tennessee, the Chatahoochee, the Alabama and Tombecbee, and has in the south the seaports of Mobile and Blakeley. Population 308,997, of whom 117,294 are slaves. Tuscaloosa is the seat of government. Alabama was originally a part of the Mississippi Territory, but was erected into a separate territorial government in 1817, and into a State in 1819. The Cherokees and Creeks occupy the northern parts.

The soil, with the exception of the alluvial tracts on Mobile river, is generally a pine barren. The surface is mostly hilly and broken. In the north it is mountainous, and in this region begins the great Apalachian chain. The central part is undulating. Toward the south, within 50 or 60 miles of Florida, the swamps are for the most part covered with cypress and gum trees, and the uplands with long leaved pine. These pine swells and levels have a very thin soil, with a substratum of clay. They produce without the aid of manure, two or three crops of maize and one or two of cotton. Among the pine grows a rank grass furnishing a fine and inexhaustible summer feed. The alluvions on the Alabama and Tombecbee rivers are generally wide and first rate lands, and this species of soil on all the streams is generally productive. The hammock lands constitute an intermediate belt between the bottoms and pine ridges. They generally have a slope like a glacis. In the best lands, no pines are to be seen. In second rate land, they are intermixed with dogwood, hickory and oak. Along the southern limit the soil is thin, and the unvarying verdure of the pine, beautiful as it is in itself, tires by its uniformity. On the head waters of the Escambia and Conecuh, are groves of orange trees. On approaching Florida, the swamps become more and more extensive. Cypress lands are abundant. On the alluvial ground which is not inundated, is large and rank cane. In these drowned regions the mosquitoes are very annoying. In going toward the central part of the State, the lands become high and broken, and the pines less frequent; oak, hickory and poplar succeed.

The climate generally is favourable to health compared with the southern country in the same parallels. The lower part of the State is constantly fanned during the summer heats, by the trade wind. There is hardly such a season as winter, yet the summers are not hotter than many degrees farther N. In the northern parts, the stagnant waters often freeze. In the S. snow or ice is seldom seen. Cattle require no shelter during winter, and maize is planted early in March.

Cotton is the staple production of Alabama. Sugar, rice and tobacco are also cultivated. Many of the people about Mobile are shepherds, and have large droves of cattle. Swine are raised with great ease where they can be guarded from the wolves, cougars and alligators. The small breed of Indian horses are ugly, but hardy and strong. Alabama exported in 1828, 1,174,737 dollars value of domestic produce; and imported merchandize to the amount of 171,909 dollars.

This State in 1800, had only 2,000 inhabitants. No part of the southern or western country has had a more rapid increase of population. The people began to pay attention to the business of schools and education, though seminaries of learning and literary institutions are rare. The university of Alabama is at Tuscaloosa.

Alabama, r. is the eastern branch of the Mobile, and is formed by the junction of the Coosa and Tallapoosa. It is navigable by large vessels 100 m. above Mobile Bay. Beyond this it affords a good boat navigation 150 m. further. This river gives its name to the State.

Alachua, a prairie in E. Florida, about 70 m. W. of St. Augustine. It is level and grassy, but barren of trees and shrubs. It is 16 m. in length and consists of a sandy soil surrounded with high hills covered with orange trees.

Albanopolis, a town of European Turkey, formerly the capital of Albania, but now a poor place, seated on the Drino, 43 m. E. of Alessio.

Albans, St., a borough town in Hertfordshire, distinguished in every period of English history. It was once the metropolis of Britain, and on the invasion of the country by the Romans, became one of their most important stations, they gave it the name of Verulam, and by the privileges conferred upon it, so attached the native inhabitants to their interest, as to excite the vengeance of Queen Boadicea, who massacred 70,000 of them, after which she was completely defeated by Suetonius Paulinus, the then Roman governor of Britain. St. Albans again became tranquil, and flourished till the Diocletian persecution, about the commencement of the 4th century, when it became distinguished for the martyrdom of its saint, whose name the town at present bears. After this period, St. Albans declined, till in the 9th century Offa, king of the Mercians, in expiation for his unprovoked murder of St. Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, whom he had invited to his court to be his son-in-law, erected and endowed a most magnificent abbey and monastery for Benedictine monks. After this period, St. Albans experienced various alternations of fortune till the final dissolution of its monastery in the marauding and rapacious age of Henry VIII. which led to the demolition of this magnificent establishment, of which the gateway only remains, now used as the borough prison; except the abbey church, which was rescued from impending destruction by the inhabitants, who purchased it of the succeeding monarch, Edward VI. for £400. when it was made parochial; but was again doomed to a reverse, in being exposed to the plunder and fanaticism of Cromwell, during the period of his predominance. It has since been repaired, and many vestiges of its former grandeur still remain. It is one of the largest ecclesiastical edifices in Europe. There are three other churches, in one of which (St. Michael) is a monument to the memory of the illustrious Francis Bacon, whose analysis and organization of the laws of nature will immortalize his name. St. Albans is governed by a mayor and 12 aldermen, and returns two members to parliament. Its market on Saturdays is considerable in grain, &c. and especially for straw-plait, which is brought in by the country people, and bought up for manufacturing into bonnets in London. The town is situated on the banks of the little river Ver, on which there are two mills for throwing silk. It is 21 m. N. of London.

Albany, capital of the state of New York, stands on the W. bank of the Hudson, at nearly the head of tide water, 160 m. above New York city, and 164 W. of Boston. It is a place of much business and wealth, being situated at the point where the great Erie canal joins the Hudson, and commanding in a manner the whole interior trade of the State. The prosperity of the city has been wonderful since the opening of this great channel of internal navigation, and its population has increased one half within six years. Its first appearance is not prepossessing to a stranger, but the bustle and activity of its business give it an air of great liveliness; while many public and private buildings with which it is adorned, display much taste and elegance. There are many good specimens of the old Dutch architecture in various parts of the city, but its general appearance has been greatly modernized within a few years. The capital is a fine stone edifice upon the brow of a hill overlooking the city, and immediately at the head of State street, a wide and handsome avenue. It is 115 feet long and has in front an Ionic portico of 4 magnificent columns, 33 feet in height. The public square adjoining the capitol, is laid out into walks and avenues. North of this building stands the Academy, the most elegant structure in the city. It is built of freestone and has a front of 90 feet. The State Hall is an ancient building. The Albany, Farmers and Mechanics Banks are handsome edifices of white marble. The City Hall has a gilded dome. The Museum is one of the most splendid structures in the State, and contains a large and valuable collection of curiosities. The basin where the canal joins the river is formed by a pier 4,300 f. in length and includes an area of 32 acres. Here are stored immense quantities of goods of every description. The city has a library of 8,000 vols., a theatre and 16 churches. A mineral spring has been recently discovered here. The neighbourhood is pleasant and the facilities for travelling in every direction very great. Steamboats constantly pass between Albany and New-York. A railroad extends 15 m. to Schenectady; the Northern Canal brings the waters of Lake Champlain with those of Erie into the bosom of the city, and lines of stages pass to Boston, Saratoga, Utica and many other parts. Albany was founded in 1612, and next to Jamestown is the oldest settlement in the United States. It is governed by a Mayor and a Board of Aldermen and Assistants. Pop. 24,238.

Alby or Albi, an ancient city of France, in the department of Tarn, seated on the river of that name. It is the chief city of the Albigeois, and was formerly the see of an archbishop. The cathedral was dedicated to St. Cecilia, and before the revolution, was ornamented with a valuable silver shrine, of exquisite workmanship, of the Mosaic kind, and contained the relics of St. Clair, the first bishop of this city. The chapel of this saint is a magnificent building, adorned with paintings. Alby has manufactures of both linens and woollens, and four gates, which open into beautiful and fruitful plains.

Alcala de Henares, a beautiful and extensive city of Spain, in New Castile, seated upon the river Henares. The university, which had gone to decay, was re-established in 1494, by Cardinal Francis Ximenes; at whose charge and under whose direction, the first polyglot bible was printed in this town. Without the walls is a spring, the water of which is so pure and well tasted, that it is inclosed for the king of Spain's own use, from whence it is carried to Madrid. It is 11 miles S. W. of Guadalaxara, and 15 N. E. of Madrid.

Alcala la Real, a city of Spain, with a fine abbey, situate on the summit of the Sierra de Granada, on the high road from Madrid to Granada, from which it is distant 18 m. and 190 from Madrid.

wickshire. Many Roman coins, bricks, &c. have been found near it, and the Icknild street passes through the town. It has a manufacture of needles, and is situate at the confluence of the Alne with the Arrow, 14 m. W. S. W. of Warwick, and 103 N. W. of London. Market on Tuesday.

Alcmaer or Alkmaer, a city of North Holland. It is a handsome city and one of the cleanest in Holland. The streets and houses are extremely neat and regular, and the public buildings very beautiful. The Spaniards, under Frederick of Toledo, besieged it after they had taken Haerlem, in 1578; but were forced to raise the siege, after lying before it three months. It opened its gates to the British troops in 1799, after the second battle near Bergen; and here the treaty for the evacuation of Holland by the invaders, was afterwards concluded. It is recorded in the register of this city, that in the year 1639, 120 tulips, with the off-sets, sold for 90,000 florins; and in particular, that one of them called the Viceroy sold for 4,203 guilders! The States at last put a stop to this extravagant and ruinous passion for flowers. The town has a good trade in butter and cheese, which is esteemed the best in Holland. It is about 4 m. from the sea, 15 from Haerlem, and 20 N. from Amsterdam.

Alcoutim, a town of Portugal, in Algarves, with a strong castle, seated on an island in the Guadiana, opposite to San Lucar, 16 m. from the entrance of the Guadiana into the Gulf of Cadiz, 22 N. N. E. of Tavira.

Alegre, a town of France, in the department of Upper Loire, 15 m. S. E. of Brioude.

Alentejo, the largest, in its superficies, of the 6 provinces of Portugal, bounded on the north by the Tagus, and south by the ancient kingdom of Algarva. Its superficial extent is 883 French leagues, and the population, in 1800, was 380,480. Evora is the capital.

Alescon, a city of France, capital of the department of Orne. Its manufacture of lace is considerable. Near it are stone quarries in which are found a sort of crystal like Bristol stones. It is seated on the Sarte, which divides the departments of L'Orne and La Sarthe, 30 m. N. by W. of Lemans, and 87 W. S. W. of Paris.

Aleppo, the capital of Syria, and next to Constantinople and Cairo, the most considerable city in the Turkish empire. It stands on 8 hills, in the middle of a fruitful plain, and is of an oval figure. The castle is on the highest hill, in the centre of the city; and the houses are better than in other places in Turkey. As usual in the East, they consist of a large court, with a dead wall to the street, an arcade running round it, paved with marble, and a marble fountain in the middle. The streets are narrow, but well paved with large square stones, and kept very clean. Here are many stately mosques and caravanseras, fountains and reservoirs of water, and vineyards and gardens. The water in the wells is brackish, but good water is brought from some springs about five miles off, by an aqueduct, said to have been built by the empress Helena. The Christians have their houses and churches in the suburbs and carry on a considerable trade in silks, camlets, and leather. Large caravans frequently arrive from Bagdad and Bassorah, charged with the products of Persia and India.

Several European nations have factories here, and the merchants live in greater splendour and safety than in any other city in the Turkish empire. Coaches are not used here, but persons of quality ride on horseback, with a number of servants before them, according to their rank. Aleppo and its suburbs are 7 m. in compass. An old wall, and a broad ditch, now in many places turned into gardens, surround the city, which was estimated by Dr. Russel to contain 230,000 inhab., of whom 34,000 were Christians, and 5,000 Jews; but at present according to Mr. Eton, it does not contain more than 50,000, which depopulation, occasioned chiefly by the plague, has taken place since 1770; whole streets being uninhabited and bazars abandoned. All the inhabitants of both sexes smoke tobacco to great excess; even the very servants have almost constantly a pipe in their mouths. Eighteen miles S. E. of Aleppo is a large plain, bounded by low rocky hills, called the Valley of Salt: this is overflowed in winter, and in April, the water being soon evaporated by the sun, leaves a cake of salt, in some places half an inch thick, which is sufficient to supply all this part of the country. Aleppo is seated on a rivulet, 70 miles S. E. of Alexandretta, or Scanderoon, and 150 N. of Damascus. Long. 37. 16. E. lat. 35. 40. N. It suffered greatly by a succession of earthquakes in 1822.

Alexandria, or Alessandria, a considerable and strong city of Italy, in the Milanese, with a good castle, built in 1178, in honour of Pope Alexander III. It was taken in 1706, by prince Eugene; in 1746, by the French, but retaken in 1749, by the king of Sardinia. The French again took it in 1798, but were driven out by the Austro-Russian army in 1799; it was delivered up to the French after the celebrated battle of Marengo, in 1800, but reverted to the dominion of Austria, after the peace of Paris in 1815. It is 15 m. S. E. of Casal, 35. N. W. of Genoa, and 40. S. by W. of Milan.

Alexandria, a celebrated city of Egypt, now much decayed, though there are still some remains of its ancient splendor, particularly an obelisk full of hieroglyphics, called Cleopatra's Needle; and Pompey's Pillar, which is one entire piece of granite, 70 ft. high, and 25 in circumference. The ancient Pharos, so famous in antiquity, that it was numbered among the seven wonders of the world, is now a castle called Pharillon, and still used to direct vessels into the harbour. From the harbour is a canal to the west branch of the Nile, at Rhamanie. This city was built by Alexander the Great, and now consists chiefly of one long street, facing the harbour, the rest being a heap of ruins: part of the walls are standing, with great square towers, 200 paces distant; and the gates are of Thebaic and granite marble. It was formerly a place of great trade, all the treasures of the East Indies being deposited there, before the discovery of the route by the Cape of Good Hope. It is subject to the grand seignior who, however, has but a limited authority. Alexandria was taken by the French, under Bonaparte, in 1798; and taken from them by the English in 1801. It surrendered to the English in 1807, but was soon after evacuated. It is seated on the Mediterranean, 125 m. N. W. of Cairo. Long. 30. 16. E. 31. 11. N.

Alexandria, a city and port of entry in the District of Columbia, on the W. bank of the Potomac, 6 miles below Washington. It is a place of some business and fashionable resort during the session of Congress, and contains some fine buildings, but the neighbourhood has a poor soil, and is thinly inhabited. The river here is a mile wide and the water in the channel 30 feet in depth, but notwithstanding the commercial advantages within her reach, Alexandria has not increased much of late. The city is regularly built, and the streets are clean and well paved. The trade is chiefly in flour. The shipping in 1821 amounted to 25,287 tons. Here is a Theological Seminary. Pop. 8,263.

Algagliola, a small fortified sea-port on the N. W. coast of Corsica, at the mouth of the Aregno, 28 m. W. by S. of Bastia.

Algarva, or Algarves, a province of Portugal. Its superficies is 232 sq. leagues, and in 1800 contained 127,600 inhabitants. It forms the S. extremity of Portugal. Lagos, Faro, and Tavira, all on the S. coast are the chief towns. It is fertile in figs, oranges, almonds, dates, olives, and excellent wine.

Algesiras, a fortified town of Andalusia, Spain, situate on the coast W. of the Bay of Gibraltar.

Algiers, a country of Barbary, comprehending the ancient Numidia, and part of Mauritania. It is 600 m. from E. to W. and 170 in breadth, bounded on the E. by Tunis, N. by the Mediterranean, S. by Mount Atlas, and W. by Morocco. Mineral springs and waters are met with in many places, and several of the chains of mountains contain lead and copper. In the interior of the country commence the dreary deserts. The principal rivers are the Shellif, Mazafran, Malva, and Zaine. The land toward the north is fertile in corn and the valleys are full of fruit. The melons have an exquisite taste, some of which are ripe in summer, and others in winter. The stems of the vines are very large, and the bunches of grapes are a foot and a half long. It is divided into the territory of the city of Algiers, and the provinces of Mascara, Titeri, and Constantina. The Turks, who had the government in their hands before the French conquest, were not above 7,000 in number; and yet the Moors, or natives of Africa, had no share in it. It was a kind of republic under the protection of the grand seignor, and governed by a sovereign called the Dey, who, however, could do nothing of consequence without the council of the Janissaries. The Arabs, who live in tents, are a distinct people, governed by their own laws and magistrates, though the Turks interpose as often as they please. The Dey was an absolute monarch, but elected by the Turkish soldiers and frequently deposed and put to death by them. The revenues of the government arose from the tribute paid by the Moors and Arabs, a detachment of the army being sent into each province every year to collect it; and the prizes they took at sea sometimes equalled the taxes they laid upon the natives. The Dey had several thousand Moors in his service, both horse and foot; and the beys or viceroys of the provinces had each an army under his command. Their religion is Mahometanism and their language a dialect of the Arabic. They have likewise a jargon, composed of Italian, French and Spanish, called Lingua Franca, which is understood by the common people and merchants. The complexion of the natives is tawny, and they are strong and well made.

The dress of the Moors consists of a piece of woolen cloth, 5 ells in length and an ell and a half in breadth, thrown over the shoulders and fastened round the body. This is called a haïque and serves also for a covering by night when asleep on their mattresses. To this are added an upper garment called a caftan, with a red cap, a hood and slippers. The women in the country wear haïques like those of the men. Their ornaments are ear-rings, bracelets upon their arms, and rings upon their ankles. They tatoo their skins with representations of flowers &c. and dye their hair, feet, and the ends of the fingers of a saffron color with henna.

The ladies of the city differ little in the fashion, but considerably in the costliness of their ornaments. The caftan is of fine cloth or velvet, embroidered with gold and fastened with buckles of gold and silver. The head is surrounded with folds of gauze, wrought of gold and silk. The ear-rings, bracelets, &c. for the legs, are of gold and silver. Paint is sometimes used, and the eyebrows and eyelashes are frequently darkened. The Moors esteem corpulence a prime constituent of beauty.

Algiers, a strong city, capital of the whole country of Algiers. It is built on the side of a mountain, in the form of an amphitheatre, next the harbour; and the houses appearing one above another, of a resplendent whiteness, make a fine appearance from the sea. The tops of the houses are flat, covered with earth, and form a sort of gardens. The streets are narrow, and serve to keep off the extreme heat of the sun. There are five gates, but no public places or squares of considerable extent. The larger mosques are ten, but there is nothing remarkable in their architecture, except the one begun to be built about the year 1796, which is beautiful; and the Dey's palace is far from being spacious and extensive. The harbour is small, shallow, and insecure, and its entrance is incommoded with numerous rocks. The mole of the harbour is 500 paces in length, extending from the continent to a small island, where there is a castle and a large battery of guns. The Turkish soldiers here were formerly great tyrants; and would go to the farm-houses in the country for 20 days together, live at free quarters, and make use of every thing, not excepting the women. There were about 100,000 Mahometans, 15,000 Jews, besides 2,000 Christian slaves in this city before its recent capture by the French. Their chief subsistence was derived from their piracies, for they made prizes of all Christian ships not at peace with them. The country about Algiers is adorned with gardens and fine villas, watered by fountains and rivulets; and thither the inhabitants resort in the hot seasons. Algiers had for ages braved the resentment of the most powerful states in Christendom. The Emperor Charles V. lost a fine fleet and army, in an expedition against it, in 1541. The English burnt their vessels in the harbour in 1635, and 1670; and it was bombarded by the French in 1688. In 1775, the Spaniards attacked it by sea and land, but were repulsed with great loss, though they had near 20,000 foot, 2,000 horse, and 47 royal ships of different rates, and 346 transports. In 1783 and 1784, they renewed their attacks by sea to destroy the city and galleys; but were forced to retire without effecting either its capture or destruction. In 1816, a British squadron, under the command of Lord Exmouth, bombarded the town, and fleet in the harbour. But the year 1830 finally witnessed the fall of Algiers before the arms of a Christian power. On the 14th of June, the French landed an army of 40,000 men in the bay of Sidi Feruch near the city, and after several battles, closely invested the place. The siege lasted six days. On the 5th of July, Algiers surrendered, and the French immediately took possession of the city. The Dey went into exile at Naples, and a great treasure in gold and silver found in his palace, indemnified the captors for the cost of the enterprise. The French still hold Algiers, and appear determined to establish themselves permanently in the country. The external commerce, before the conquest, was principally with Gibraltar, from whence the Algerines drew considerable supplies of European manufactures, spices, and India piece-goods, in exchange for cattle, fruits, &c. for the supply of the town and garrison.

Alambia, a town of Spain, in Arragon, near a river of its name, 7 m. N. of Tereul.

Alicant, a sea-port of Spain, in Valencia, famous for excellent wine and fruits. It has also a great trade in barilla, and the Americans, English, Dutch, French, and Italians, have consuls here. The castle, on a high rock, was reckoned impregnable, but it was taken by the English, in 1706. It was likewise taken by the French and Spaniards, after a siege of almost two years, when part of the rock was blown up. It is seated on the Mediterranean, on a bay of the same name, 64 French leagues S. E. of Madeira, 23 S. of Valencia, and 21 N. of Carthage. Long. 0. 29. W. lat. 38. 20. N.

Alnwick, a considerable town of Northumberland, on the road to Scotland; a place peculiarly fatal to some of the ancient Scottish monarchs. Here Malcolm III. making an inroad into Northumberland, was killed, with Edward his son, and his army defeated, by Robert Mowbray, earl of this county, in 1093. And here too his great grandson, William I. invading England with an army of 80,000 men, was encountered, his army routed, and himself made prisoner, in 1174. The town appears to have been formerly fortified, from the vestiges of a wall still to be seen in several parts, and 3 gates, which remain almost entire. Alnwick is a well-built town; and is ornamented by a stately old gothic castle, the seat of the duke of Northumberland. It is seated on the Alne, 310 m. N. by W. from London, 33 N. of Newcastle, and 26 S. of Berwick. Pop. in 1821, 5,927.

Alpnach, a town of Switzerland, in Unterwalden, seated on an arm of the lake of the Four Cantons, 6 m. S. of Lucern.

Alps, a chain of mountains, in Europe, which begins at the Gulf of Genoa, to the E. of Nice, passes into Switzerland, crosses that country and Tyrol, separates Germany from Italy, and terminates at the north part of the gulf of Venice. This grand chain is sometimes divided into two or more ridges, ranging one by another, with only narrow valleys between; and the different portions have distinct appellations, as the Maritime, Pennine, Lepontine, Helvetian, Rhetian, Julian, &c. They are composed of stupendous rocky masses, two, four, and even six being piled upon each other, and from 4,000 to above 15,600 ft. high. There are few passes over them, and those of difficult access. Switzerland has the central part of these mountains, and the valleys between them. These mountains are frequented by the chamois, an animal about the size of a goat, and of wonderful agility. They will leap down precipices 30 feet in height, and indeed appear rather to fly than run. The hunting of the chamois, is full of labour and danger, but is pursued with the highest enthusiasm and most unconquerable perseverance by the mountaineers. The famous Hannibal attempted to cross the Alps on the side of Piedmont, in the winter season, when he invaded Italy, and lost most of his elephants among them. They were passed successfully by a numerous French army under Bonaparte in 1800.

Alston-moor or Aldestone, a town in Cumberland, with a market on Sat. Here is an iron foundry, and a shot manufacture; and in its vicinity are numerous lead-mines. It is seated on the side of a hill, on the S. branch of the Tyne, 20 m. E. by

S. of Carlisle, and 271 N. by W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,410.

Altai Mountains, a range of mountains intersecting Asia from south to north, commencing west of the Indus, in W. long. about 68. and diverging northward by several ridges towards East Cape, in E. long. 170.

Altamura, a town of Naples at the foot of the Apennines, 10 m. N. E. of Gravina. Pop. about 16,000.

Alttau, a town of Lower Saxony, in the territory of Brunswick, 8 m. S. of Goslar.

Alttenburg, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, celebrated for its tin mine, 20 m. S. of Dresden.

Alttenberg, a town of Upper Saxony, in Thuringia, with a castle on a rock. It is seated on the Pleisse, 20 m. S. of Leipsic.

Alttenburg, a town of Lower Hungary, on the river Leitha, at its entrance into the Danube. Here are 2 churches and a college; and its ancient castle is now principally used for a corn magazine. It is 17 m. S. S. E. of Presburg.

Alttenkirchen, a town of Germany, in the Westerwald, chief of the county of Sayn, with a castle, 15 m. N. N. E. of Coblenz.

Altteson, a town of Piedmont, between the rivers Doire and Stura, 3 m. N. of Turin.

Altkirch, a town of France in the department of Upper Rhine, on an eminence, near the source of the river Ill, 25 m. S. of Colmar.

Alton, p.t. Stafford Co. N. Hampshire, 33 m. fr. Portsmouth. Pop. 1,993.

Alton, a town in Hampshire Eng. with a market on Saturday. It has manufactures of worsted stuffs, and round the town are plantations of hops. It is seated on the Wey, 28 m. E. N. E. of Southampton, and 47 W. S. W. of London.

Alton, t. Madison Co. Illinois, on the Mississippi, 3 m. above the Missouri.

Altona, a city and sea-port of Lower Saxony, in Holstein, seated on the Elbe, contiguous to Hamburg. The Danes built it in this situation, that it might rival Hamburg in commerce. It was burnt by the Swedes in 1712, but has been beautifully rebuilt, and is estimated to contain 25,000 inhab. Long. 9. 58. E. lat. 53. 34. N.

Altorf, a town of Franconia, in the territory of Nuremberg, with a university, 16 m. S. E. of Nuremberg.

Altorf, a town of Suabia, 20 m. N. E. of Constance.

Altorf, a town of Switzerland, capital of the canton of Uri. Here are two stone pillars, 130 paces from each other, at which distance Tell is said to have shot the apple from his son's head. This deliverer of his country lived at Burgli, near this place, and his cottage is changed into a chapel, where mass is solemnly said. Altorf stands on the lake of Lucern, near the influx of the river Russ, 20 m. S. E. of Lucern.

Altringham, a town in Cheshire, Eng. governed by a mayor, with a market on Tuesday. Here are several manufactures of worsted and cotton; and much fruit and vegetables are sent hence to Manchester. It is seated near the duke of Bridgewater's canal, 30 m. N. E. of Chester, and 180 N. W. of London.

Altunkupri, a town of Asiatic Turkey, the capital of Curdistan, and the residence of a pacha. It is situate on the river Altun, which flows into the Tigris, 50 m. S. E. of Mosul. Long. 44. 30. E. lat. 35. 45. N.

Alum Creek, r. Ohio, is a branch of the Big Walnut River

Alca de Tormes, a town of Spain, in Leon, with a castle, once the residence of the celebrated duke of Alva, seated on the Tormes, 16 m. S. E. of Salamanca.

Alvarado, a river of Mexico, in the province of Vera Cruz, which rises 40 miles above the town of Cordova, and flows N. E. till it enters the gulf of Mexico, at a town of the same name, 40 m. S. E. of Vera Cruz.

Alvaston, a village in Gloucestershire, Eng., 8 m. N. by E. of Bristol. On the top of a hill, near the Severn, is a round camp, called Oldbury, where several antiquities have been dug up.

Alzira, or Alcira, a populous town of Spain, which has a great trade in silk. It is surrounded by the Xucar, 17 m. S. of Valencia.

Amadan, or Hamadan, a town of Persia, in Irac Ajami. Here are many Jews, who allege that the tombs of Mordecai and Esther are in the place which serves them for a synagogue. Amadan is a very ancient city; on its site, or near it, the ancient Ecbatana is supposed to have stood. It is said to have been destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and rebuilt by Darius, who brought hither all his riches. It is situate to the north of the upper road from Bagdad to Ispahan, about 15 miles from Kenghey. It has considerable manufactures of leather, and contains about 40,000 inhabitants.

Amadia, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Curdistan, governed by a Bey, seated on a high mountain, 40 miles S. E. of Gezira. Long. 41. 35. lat. 37. 20. N.

Amak, or Amager, an island of Denmark, on which part of Copenhagen, called Christianshavn, is built. It is eight miles long and four broad, and separated from Zealand by a narrow channel, over which are two bridges that communicate with Copenhagen. It is laid out in gardens and pastures, and supplies Copenhagen with milk, butter, and vegetables.

Amal, a town of Sweden, in Gothland, with a good harbour on the lake Wener. It has a great trade in timber, deals, and tar; and is 175 m. S. W. of Upsal. Long. 12. 40. E. lat. 59. 0. N.

Amalagano, one of the Ladrone islands, about 6 leagues in circumference. Lon. 145. 38. E. lat. 18. 0. N.

Amalfi, a sea-port of Naples, in Principato Citeriore, and an archbishop's see. Flavio Gioia, who is said to have invented the mariners compass, was a native of this town. It is seated on the N. W. side of the gulf of Salerno, 13 m. S. W. of Salerno. Long. 14. 45. E. lat. 40. 28. N.

Amand, St. a town of France, in the department of Cher, near the river Cher, 21 m. S. of Bourges.

Amand, St. a town of France, in the department of Nord, with an abbey; seated on the Scarp, 7. m. N. of Valenciennes.

Amanda, p.t. Fairfield Co. Ohio.

Amandasville, p.v. Elbert Co. Geo.

Amantea, a sea-port of Naples, near the bay of Eufemia, 20 m. S. W. of Cosenza. Long. 16. 10. E. lat. 39. 12. N.

Amapalla, a sea-port of Mexico, in Nicaragua, seated on an island on the west side of the entrance of a gulf of the same name. Long. 88. 30. W. lat. 13. 10. N.

Amasia, or Amasieh, a town of Asiatic Turkey in Natolia, the birth-place of Strabo, the geographer. It is the capital of a province which produces excellent wines and fruits. It was devastated by an earthquake, in 1794. It is seated on the Casalmack, which falls into the Black Sea, 36 m. N. of Tocat. Long. 36. 0. E. lat. 40. 31. N.

Amathus, an ancient town in the isle of Cyprus, so called from Amathus the founder, or from Amath in Phenicia. It had a very ancient temple of Venus and Adonis; and according to Ovid, was rich in copper ore. It is now called Limisso.

Amazon, or Maranon, a river of South America, and the greatest in the world. Its source is in Peru, not far from the Pacific ocean, and running east, it enters the Atlantic Ocean, directly under the equinoctial line. Its course is 3,200 miles, its mouth is 150 miles broad, and 1,506 miles from its mouth, it is 30 fathoms deep. It receives, in its progress, near 200 rivers, many of which have a course of 1,500 miles, and some of them not inferior to the Danube, or the Nile. In the rainy season it overflows its banks, and fertilizes the adjacent country.

Amazonia, a country of South America, 1,400 m. long and 960 broad; bounded on the N. by Terra Firma and Guiana, E. by the Atlantic Ocean and Brasil, S. by the Paraguay, and W. by Peru. It was discovered in 1580 by Francesco Orellana, who, coming from Peru, sailed down the river Amazon to the Atlantic. Observing companies of women in arms on its banks, he called the country Amazonia, and gave the name of Amazon to the river, which had formerly been called Maranon. The air in this country is cooler than might be expected, considering its situation in the torrid zone; this is owing partly to the heavy rains, which cause the inundations of the rivers for one half of the year; and partly to the cloudiness of the atmosphere, by which the sun is obscured the greatest part of the day. The fair season is about the time of the solstices, and the rainy seasons about the equinoxes. The soil is very rich and fertile; the trees and plants are verdant all the year. The woods abound with game of various kinds. The rivers and lakes abound with fish, but are infested by alligators and water serpents. Their banks are inhabited by different tribes of Indians, governed by petty sovereigns, distinguished from their subjects by a coronet of feathers, a belt of tigers' teeth or claws, and a wooden sword. The natives are of a good stature and copper colour, with handsome features and long black hair. They make cotton cloth, and their houses are built of wood and clay, thatched with reeds. Their arms are darts, javelins, bows and arrows, and targets of cane or fish-skin. The Spaniards have made many unsuccessful attempts to settle in this country; but on the coast, between Cape North and the mouth of the Amazon, the Portuguese have some small settlements.

Amba-Gashen, a rock in Abyssinia, of a most prodigious steepness, in the form a castle, built of free-stone, and almost impregnable. The Ethiopic princes were formerly banished hither by their fathers, the emperors, that they might not attempt any thing against the state, and that their residence might be as noted for its height as their birth.

Amber, p.v. Onondaga Co. N. Y. 145 m. W. Albany.

Amberg, a fortified town of Bavaria, with a strong castle. The magnificent church of St. Martin contains many beautiful paintings and curiosities; and the mint is esteemed one of the finest buildings of the kind in Germany. In 1743 it was taken by the Austrians, and in 1796 by the French. It is seated on the river Ills, or Wills, on the confines of the principality of Sultzbach, 49 m. E. of Nurenberg. Long. 11. 48. E. lat. 40. 27. N.

Ambert, a town of France, in the department of Puy de Dome. There are numerous papermakers in its vicinity, and it has a trade in coarse laces, camlets, ferrets, &c. It is seated in a beautiful valley, on the river Dore, 21 m. E. of Issoire.

Ambleside, a town in Westmoreland, standing on the site of a Roman city, called Dictus, with a market on Wednesday. Here is a manufacture of woolen cloth. It is seated on the Rotha, near the head of Windermere, 13 m. N. W. of Kendal, and 276 N. N. W. of London.

Ambletouse, a seaport of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, defended by a battery. At this port Cæsar embarked his cavalry when he passed over into England; and here James II. landed on his departure from England, in 1688. It is seated on the English channel, 8 m. N. of Boulogne. Long. 1. 36. E. lat. 50. 49. N.

Amboise, a town of France, in the department of the Indre and Loire. The town is mean and ill-built; but has been rendered famous in history, by the conspiracy of the Huguenots, in 1560, which opened the fatal religious wars in France. Here Louis XI. instituted the order of St. Michael; it was also the birth-place of the poet Jesuit Commune, and the spot where Charles VIII. died. It is seated at the confluence of the Mamee with the Loire, 12 m. E. by N. of Tours, and 115 S. by W. of Paris.

Ambory, or Perth Ambory, city, Middlesex Co. N. J. upon a bay at the South end of Staten Island, communicating with N. York harbour by Arthur Kill Sound and with the ocean below the narrows. This harbour is safe and easy of access and the town has considerable commerce.

Amboryna, an island of the Moluccas, in the Indian Ocean. It is 56 m. in length from N. to S. and divided on the west side by a large bay in two parts; the largest of which is called Hiten, and the other Leytimor. The face of this island is beautiful; woody mountains and verdant plains being interspersed with hamlets, and enriched by cultivation. The chief products are nutmeg, sugar, coffee, and many delicious fruits, but more especially cloves. The principal animals are deer and wild hogs. The English and Dutch had factories here at the beginning of the 17th century; but the Dutch expelled the English, and tortured and put to death many of them. The natives wear large whiskers, and their dress is only a slight piece of stuff wrapped round their middle. The men buy their wives of their parents, and if they prove barren, the marriage is void. They are generally Mahometans; but there are some Christians among them. This island was taken by the English in 1796, and restored by the treaty of Amiens in 1802, recaptured in 1810, and again restored to the Dutch, by the treaty at Paris in 1814, and confirmed in 1824. The chief town is of the same name, neatly built, and stands near the S. W. extremity. Fort Victoria is in long. 126. 15. E. lat. 3. 40. S.

Ambrose St., an island on the coast of Chile, 15 m. W. from St. Felix Island. The crew of captain Roberts, in 1792, killed and cured here 13,000 seal skins, in seven weeks. Long. 80. 55. W. lat. 26. 13. S.

Ambrye, one of the New Hebrides, in the Pacific Ocean, 50 m. in circumference. Long. 168. 12. E. lat. 16. 10. N.

Amedabad, a city of Hindoostan, the capital of Guzerat. The walls are 6 m. in circumference, and contain 12 gates; but now not a quarter of the area is inhabited. The mosque and tomb of the founder, Tetay Ahmed, are built of stone and marble, the last of exquisite workmanship. It was taken by general Goddard in 1780, from the Poonah Mahrattas, to whom it was restored in 1783. It is seated in a level country, on a navigable river that enters the gulf of Cambay, 320 m. N. of Bombay. Long. 72. 27. E. lat. 23. 18. N.

Amednagar, a city and fort of Hindoostan, once the capital of the soubah of its name, which is now better known by that of Dowlatabad. This city was the residence of the emperor Aurungzebe, during his conquest of the Deccan and the Carnatic. In 1803 it was taken by the British army under general Wellesley (now Duke of Wellington.) It is 73 m. N. E. of Poona. Long. 75. 0. E. lat. 19. 10. N.

Ameenabad, a town of Hindoostan, in Lahore, 35 m. N. by W. of Lahore.

Amelia, a town of Italy, seated on a mountain between the Tiber and Nira, 20 m. S. W. of Spolito, and 45 N. of Rome.

Amelia, an inland county of Virginia. Pop. 11,831. The court-house of the county is 58 m. W. S. W. of Richmond.

Amelia, or Amilla Island, on the coast of E. Florida, the north end of it is nearly opposite St. Mary's in Georgia. It is about 14 m. long and a mile and a half wide, with a good soil and an excellent harbour, called Fernandina.

Ameliaburg, p.t. Prince Edward Co. U. C. on L. Ontario.

America, in its most comprehensive sense and present acceptance, may be considered as comprising half of the terrestrial globe, or the whole of the western hemisphere. It has been usual to speak of America as constituting one of the four quarters, or four grand divisions of the globe; but it is equally matter for surprise as well as for regret, that the western hemisphere should so long have remained subject to a misnomer so obvious, and a designation so inappropriate and indefinite. This hemisphere first became known to Europe, in the year 1493 of the Christian era, when Christopher Columbus, a native of Genoa, who, from a long and close application to the study of geography and navigation, had obtained a knowledge of the figure of the earth, much superior to the general notions of the age in which he lived, was led to conceive that another continent existed. Having fully satisfied himself of the truth of this system, he became impatient to reduce it to practice, and accordingly laid his scheme before the senate of Genoa, making his native country the first offer of his services. They, however, rejected his proposal, as the dream of a chimerical projector. It met with the same fate at the courts of Portugal, Spain, and England, and some of the other European powers of less note; but, still undiscouraged, he applied again to the court of Spain, who were at length induced to fit out a squadron of three small vessels, of which Columbus was made admiral; and with these he set out on his voyage of discovery, in 1492, in which voyage he discovered several of the Bahama islands, with those of Cuba and Hispaniola, and returned to Spain in the following:

year. In a second voyage he discovered many more of the West India islands; and in a third he attained the great object of his ambition, by discovering the southern division of the continent, near the mouth of the Orinoco. Amongst the crowd of new adventurers who now followed from all parts of Europe, was one Americus Vesputius, a Florentine, who, with much art, and some degree of elegance, drew up an amusing history of his voyage, in which he insinuated that he first discovered what is commonly called the continent of the New World. This being published and read with admiration, the country was from him called America, though it is now well understood that Columbus was the first discoverer. The celebrity of Columbus and Americus Vesputius soon resounded throughout all Europe, inspiring numbers of adventurers to witness the fruits of their discoveries. Among the rest, Giovanni Gaboto (Anglicised Cabot) a Venetian, and his three sons, under the auspices of Henry VII. of England, sailed from Bristol, in 1497, and discovered the coast of Labrador as the 57th deg. of N. lat.

On a second voyage, in the following year, in a ship, furnished by the king, accompanied by four small barques provisioned by the merchants of Bristol, under the direction of Giovanni's second son, Sebastian, (who had been born in Bristol, hence the claim of the northern division of the western hemisphere having been discovered by an Englishman,) they discovered the island of Newfoundland in N. lat. about 47, and coasted southward as far as Florida. Cabot made a third voyage to Newfoundland in 1502. In 1519 a body of Spaniards, under the command of Cortez, landed at Vera Cruz, and discovered the populous district of Mexico. In 1524 the French sent an expedition, which traversed the coast from the lat. of 28. to 50. N. France, Spain, and England each sent successive expeditions to North America, and made attempts to establish settlements; but so unsuccessfully, it is believed, that at the commencement of the 17th century, not a single European remained north of Mexico. In 1606 renewed efforts were made by England; since when, the extent, features, population, and productions of the whole of the W. hemisphere have progressively been developed to Europe. America, or the western hemisphere, is subdivided by nature into two grand divisions, north and south; very distinct in character and feature.

America, North, extends from the polar regions to the 15th deg. of N. lat., the more northern part, as far as lat. 50., extending from about the 56th to the 130th deg. of W. long. and at lat. 65. as far west as 165. of long. From the 50th to the 30th deg. of lat. the country assumes a very compact form, extending at the north from about the 62nd to the 124th deg. of long. gradually converging southerly, and at lat. 30. extending only from about the 81st to the 115 deg. of long. at about the 30th deg. of N. lat. The great gulf of Mexico bounds the land, from about the 80th to the 97th deg. of long. the land converging into a promontory of about 10 deg. at the north, extending S. to the chain which unites the northern with the grand southern division, gradually converging in long. to about 1 deg. only, in N. lat. 15. and in W. long. 95. The superficies of the first of these three divisions of the N. W. hemisphere, cannot be stated with any degree of accuracy, owing to the unknown boundaries on the side of the polar regions. The central part contains a superficies of about 2,700,000 sq. miles, and the promontory about 110,000 sq. miles. The extreme length of the grand northern division, in a straight, unbroken line, from the mouth of the Copper-mine River which runs S. to N. into the Icy Sea, in lat. 70, to Acapulco, in lat. 17, is about 3,200 miles, and the extreme breadth, from the mouth of the Penobscot river which falls into the Atlantic Ocean in N. lat. 44. 24. W. long. 68. 45. to the mouth of Columbia river which falls into the North Pacific Ocean in N. lat. 46. W. long. 124. the distance is about 2,500. The northern part of this grand division of the western hemisphere is indented by Hudson's Bay, which extends from the line of the Arctic circle, to the 51st deg. of N. lat. and in its extreme breadth, from the 78th to the 95th deg. of W. long. It is also intersected by a chain of fresh water lakes of vast extent. Athapescow, and the Slave Lake, (the latter of great extent,) discharging their waters into the Icy Sea, Winnipeg, and several of lesser extent and note discharge their waters into Hudson's Bay, whilst Superior, Michigan, Huron, Erie, Ontario, and Champlain, between the latitudes of 42. and 48. N. discharge their waters by the great river St. Lawrence into the gulf of St. Lawrence, in the lat. of 50. N. and W. long. about 65. the western extremity of lake Superior being in long. about 92. Innumerable streams of water intersect the country in all directions, and form themselves into noble rivers, several of which run into Hudson's Bay, whilst those south of the great chain of lakes and the St. Lawrence, run a course from N. to S. or S. E. falling into the Atlantic Ocean. Taking them in order from N. to S. the most prominent are St. John's, the Penobscot, Kennebec, Androscoggin, Piscataqua, Merrimack, Connecticut, the Hudson, or North river, Delaware, Susquehannah, Potomac, Rappahanock, James river, Roanoke, Santee, and Savannah. All these rivers have their source E. of a chain of mountains, called the Apalachian, running parallel with the Atlantic coast, from about the 34th to the 43rd deg. of N. lat. and 2 to 300 miles from the ocean. South of the 34th deg. of lat. the Apalachicola, Alabama, Tombigbee, and some other rivers of less note, run a course due S. falling into the Gulf of Mexico. West of the Apalachian mountains, innumerable other streams have their source, forming another collection of noble rivers, the most important of which are the Ohio, and Tennessee, running from E. to W. the Missouri, Kansas, and Arkansas, and the Red river, running from W. to E. all of which fall into one grand channel, called the Mississippi, which has its source about the 47th deg. of N. lat. running a course nearly due S. falling into the Gulf of Mexico in lat. 29. 5. N. and 89. 8. W. long. The Rio del Norte, or Rio Bravo, another noble river, has its source westward of the Arkansas and Red rivers, in N. lat. about 42. and falls into the Gulf of Mexico in N. lat. 26. W. long. 97. 25. On the western coast, the Columbia, and Colorado, are the only rivers of importance, and they are not considerable; the first falls into the Pacific Ocean in N. lat. about 45. and the other into the Gulf of California in N. lat. about 32. A ridge of mountains runs parallel with the western coast, the whole extent of the north division, from the point of the promontory S. in lat. of 70. N. bearing west from the 95th to the 122nd or 123rd of long. and about 10 deg. from the western coast or shore of the Pacific Ocean; this ridge which seems to be a continuation of the Andes of the southern division, from the 15th to about the 40th deg. of N. lat. is called the Cordilleras, and more northerly the Rocky Mountains, the greatest altitude is in N. lat. about 19. where Popocatepetl issues forth volcanic eruptions at a height of 17,720 ft. above the level of the sea. Another range of mountains runs parallel with the eastern or Atlantic coast, from about the 35th to the 45th deg. of N. lat. diverging into several distinct and parallel ridges designated as the White, Green, Catskill, Blue, Alleghany, Laurel and Cumberland mountains, and collectively they are called the Apalachian Mountains. Their altitude does not exceed 6,500 ft. above the level of the sea.

On the discovery of this vast territory, at the periods previously stated, it was found, to the N. of the 30th deg. of lat. to be thinly populated with inhabitants, and except the Esquimaux at the more northern part, possessing one common character, and speaking one common language, though somewhat varied in dialect. In person, tall and well-proportioned; complexion coppery, with long, straight, and somewhat coarse, black hair, localized into various tribes or communities, none of whom were found to have made any, or very little progress in the arts which contribute to the comfort of life; spears and arrows being their only instruments of defence, of attack, and subsistence, whilst skins, mats, and the coarsest cloth of reeds, grass, or hemp, constituted their chief clothing and protection from the inclemency of the weather. They were nevertheless found possessing many manly qualities, and social virtues, until corrupted and debased by the vicious refinements of their invaders, before whom they have receded as from a pestilence.

In America, as in all other regions of the world, the animal tribes bear a proportion both in number and size, to the extent of the country which has given them birth. The musk, or the North American bison, and the Magellanic ostrich of South America, equal in size their corresponding species of the old world. The elk or stag of New California, attains a gigantic magnitude. The moose is found from the Rocky Mountains to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and is sometimes 12 feet high. The elk and red deer are inhabitants of the United States. The white, black, and grizzly bear are common in various parts. The wolf and the cougar, or catamount, are widely distributed. Foxes and squirrels are abundant. The hare of America, improperly called rabbit, is found as far North as Hudson's Bay. In many parts of the United States they exist in great abundance and are taken in vast numbers for their flesh and fur; they do great mischief to the farmers. The beavers are still numerous in the North and West. Most of the animals of America form particular species, or at least distinct races from those of Europe, and are evidently aboriginal in the country which they inhabit.

In the plains between the Apalachian and Rocky Mountains, fossil bones of animals have been found far exceeding in size those of any known animal now existing, or ever known. Neither the elephant, lion, tiger, leopard, nor hyena have ever been found in America.

The birds of America are not, as absurdly stated by Buffon, inferior to their kindred species of the old world. The Washington or great sea eagle, a native of the United States, is the noblest of his tribe. The bald eagle is distributed over nearly the whole continent. Vultures and hawks of many species are common. The passenger pigeons in countless millions obscure the heavens with their flocks, and wherever they direct their flight it may be said to 'snow of meat.' The wild geese and ducks pass along the whole extent of the continent in their periodical migrations. The robin and blue bird court the society of man, and in the colder districts are the earliest harbingers of spring. The oriole, the woodpecker, the blue jay, the cardinal and the tanager, adorn the woods with their brilliant plumage; while the unrivalled mocking-bird makes the forest echo with his thousand melodious and varied notes. The deep woods and swamps of the West still afford a retreat to the wild turkey, once common all over the United States.

Insects and reptiles are of course larger and more abundant in the southern than in the northern part of this country. Little incommodity is suffered from insects in the temperate portions. In the south the mosquitoes are very annoying. Bees are numerous in the woods of the west, and the people who go into the forests to collect honey return with waggon loads. Locusts are unknown, and the insect most troublesome to agriculturists, the Hessian fly, was imported from Europe. The rivers in the South swarm with alligators. But the most terrible of American reptiles is the rat-lesnake, who is found in nearly all parts of the hot and temperate regions of this country.

The northern portion of the western hemisphere is at present divided into three great parts; viz. 1st. North, under the dominion of Great Britain, which part extends S. from the Icy Sea, and polar regions, to about the 48th deg. of N. lat. subdivided into seven provinces or territories: viz. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Lower and Upper Canada, Labrador, New South Wales, and the N. W. territory; 2nd, the Central part, from the boundary of the British territories on the North, to the Gulf of Mexico S. and W. from the Atlantic Ocean to about the 100th deg. of W. long. and from the 42nd to the 49th deg. of N. lat. extending W. to the Pacific Ocean under the rule of the federal government of the U. S. of America and 3rd. the part extending from the United States territory S. to the isthmus which unites the northern with the grand southern division. This part, for three centuries, continued under the dominion of Spain; but from the period of 1820 or 1821, it may be considered as forming a separate and independent territory.

South America extends through 68 deg. of lat. from Cape la Vela in 12. 12. N. to Cape Horn in 55. 58. S. being about 4,100 miles, and under the lat. of 5. S. extends through 45 deg. of long. from Cape St. Roque in 35. 40. to Cape Blanco in 81. 10. W. From the equator N. to the 7th deg. of lat. it extends only through about 27 deg. of long. and from the 7th to its northern extremity, only through about 20 deg. and S. from about the 10th deg. of lat. it assumes a form approximating to a right angled triangle, of which the western shore on the Pacific Ocean is the perpendicular, and the eastern on the South Atlantic Ocean is the hypothenuse, so that whilst the extreme breadth is about 2,700 miles, the mean will not exceed more than about 1,500, giving a superficies of about 6,150,000 sq. miles. This division of the western hemisphere, as previously stated, was first discovered by Columbus (on his third voyage from Spain) on the first of August, 1498; but it was not till the year 1531 that any knowledge was obtained, of its extent and productions, in which year three low and unprincipled adventurers, Pizarro, Almagro, and the priest Lucques, landed at the Isthmus of Panama, and proceeding south, discovered the rich and then populous districts of Quito and Peru. In the year 1500, the Portuguese admiral, Alvarez de Cabral, commanding a squadron of 13 sail, with 1,200 men on board, destined for the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, accidentally discovered on the 24th of April the southern division of the western hemisphere, about 4 deg. S. of the equator, and on the following day landed and took possession of the country, since called Brazil; and although near half a century elapsed before any effectual efforts were made by the Portuguese to form a permanent settlement, the whole of the southern division of the western hemisphere (with the exception of a comparatively trifling extent of territory, between the 3rd and 7th deg. of N. lat. settled by the Dutch, and the southern extremity continuing in possession of the natives) fell under the dominion of Spain and Portugal; the Spanish portion being divided into five departments: viz. New Granada, Venezuela, Peru, Buenos Ayres, and Chile, each sub-divided into several provinces; the whole of the Portuguese portion continuing under one general government. Since the period of 1825, the domination and rule of both Spain and Portugal has entirely ceased over every part of the great southern division of the western hemisphere; new and distinct governments having established themselves, giving rise to new boundaries and subdivisions of territory, which will be found detailed under the several heads of Colombia, Peru, United Provinces of La Plata, or South America, Chile, and Brazil, and the remaining portion under the heads of Amazonia, Guiana, and Patagonia.

The natural features of this division of the western hemisphere are in the highest degree grand and imposing; extensive fertile plains yield a variety and abundance of every thing calculated for the comfort of man; whilst the mountains display the majesty of creation, affording abundance of malleable and indestructible metals, and innumerable streams, forming themselves into noble rivers, yielding their proportion of supply, affording facility of conveyance, and eminently contributing to promote the sociality, enjoyment, and happiness of society. The range of mountains called the Andes, extends from the utmost extremity of this division south, to the chain which unites it with the north, running parallel with the shores of the Pacific Ocean, at the distance of 100 to 200 miles from the sea, and occasionally in parallel ridges, the main ridge maintaining an average altitude of 12,000 to 15,000 ft. above the level of the sea, nearly the whole extent of the continent. In 1802 the travellers, Humboldt and Bonpland, ascended the peak of the Andes called Chimborazo, in the province of Quito, to the height of 19,400 ft. its extreme altitude being 21,440. The peak of Cotopaxi, 40 m. S. E. of the ancient city of Quito, is volcanic, and frequently emits fire with terrific violence, from its summit, 18,898 ft. above the level of the sea. Various mountain ridges intersect the more eastern parts of the continent, all running from south to north, similar in diversity and altitude to the Apalachian of the northern division. The rivers run in every direction: taking them from north to south, the first demanding notice is the Magdalena; 2nd Orinoco; 3d. the Yapura, Tunguragua, Ucayale, Madeira, and Tapajos, branches which form the Amazon; 4th. the Araguay; 5th. Parai-ba, or Maranham; 6th. the Francisco, and 7th. the Uruguay, Parana, Paraguay, Pilcomayo, Vermejo, and Salado branches, which form the Rio de la Plata, all of which will be found under their respective heads. The inhabitants of this division of the western hemisphere, on the first inroads of the Spaniards, at the commencement of the 16th century appeared to be of the same stock; and possessing the same common character of feature and colour as those of the north; but on the western side were much further advanced in the arts of social life. Of their origin no credible as-count either of history or tradition could be obtained. Instead of an Adam, formed of the dust of the earth, and an Eve, formed of Adam's rib, the Peruvians had a Manco-Capac, who came from an island on a great lake south, to instruct their men in agriculture and other useful employments, and a Mama-Ocillo, to instruct the women in spinning and weaving. Of the precise era, however, of their appearance, their chronology was too imperfect to define; they enumerated 14 reigns of Incas or sovereigns since their time, which would carry the epoch back to about the end of the 12th, or beginning of the 13th century. In the face of evidence so imperfect, it would be absurd to hazard even a conjecture, much more an assertion, upon the subject of the first peopling of the south. It may, however, be fairly inferred that the north division was first peopled by emigrants from the south, rather than from any part of the eastern hemisphere. This seems probable, as well from the similarity of general feature and character, as from the regular gradation of the athletic power and energy which seemed to prevail amongst them from south to north. The most healthy and robust of the race would doubtless be most likely to advance onward.

In the animal creation we here meet with the jaguar, or South American tiger, an animal superior in size to the leopard, with a spotted hide, and ferocious in habits. He is found from Paraguay to Guiana. The cougar, or puma, sometimes called the South American lion, inhabits the southern as well as the northern part of the American continent. The tapir dwells in the rivers of every part of South America and lives upon sugar cane, grass, shrubs and fruits. The tiger cat is a beautiful spotted animal not much larger than the common cat, and is mischievous and untameable. Here are three species of anteaters with a long snout, no teeth and a long tongue, perpetually occupied in destroying the ant-hills. The llama of Peru is a very useful beast of burthen; the vicuna and alpaca furnish a valuable wool. Wild horses and oxen cover the plains with their immense droves. The armadillo is a very curious little animal clad in a natural coat of mail, without hair. They burrow in the ground like a rabbit and are generally innocent in their manners. Monkeys of various species swarm in the forests; one of these, the coaita, has a remarkable resemblance to an Indian old woman. The beaver of this region does not build his habitation after the manner of the common beaver. The chinchilla is prized for its valuable skin. The sloth is peculiar to this country: he is unfurnished with teeth, and crawls slowly, from tree to tree devouring their leaves. The peccary exists in abundance here as well as in Mexico. The cavy frequents the marshes, and the coati prowls among the woods devouring small animals, poultry and eggs. The agouti is about the size of a hare, and burrows in hollow trees; feeding upon potatoes, yams and such fruits as fall from the trees. It uses its paws in the manner of hands, like a squirrel, and is exceedingly voracious.

Birds are various in species, and numerous; the condor of the Andes is considered superior in majesty to the ostrich of the deserts of Africa; in the plains is another large bird of a species between the ostrich and cassowary of New Holland; there are eagles of various kinds, and an endless variety of smaller birds of exquisitely beautiful plumage. The winged tribe and insects are various and infinite, some surpassing in beauty, and others in noxiousness; but next to the volcanic eruptions and natural convulsions of the earth, the greatest terror of S. America are the reptiles, which exceed in variety, number, and voracity those of any other part of the world. Of the inhabitants of the waters, the electric eel and ink-fish are peculiar to the eastern coast of the equatorial latitudes of this hemisphere; in addition to which, nearly all the species common to other seas and rivers are also abundant. Indestructible metals and gems are more abundant in this division of the western hemisphere than any other part of the world; and gold and silver seem to abound to such a degree as is likely soon to satiate the mania for their possession. Copper, in several parts, is also abundant. The vegetable productions exceed in variety, beauty, and utility, those of Asia, or any other part of the globe, whether considered in reference to sustenance, or to luxury, taste, and adornment in art. Vegetation presents a great number of gradations. From the shores of the sea to the height of 1,083 ft. we meet with magnificent palms, the most odoriferous lilies, and the balsam of Tolu. The large flowered jessamine and the datura arborea exhale at night their delicious perfume, and ornament the head dress of the ladies with their beautiful flowers. On the arid shores of the ocean as well as in the depth of the interior forests, grows spontaneously the cocoa tree, whose fruit is applied to so many useful purposes. The trunk is composed of hard, strong fibres crossing each other like net work, and there are properly no branches. The husk of the cocoa nut is twisted into cordage, and of the pulp a species of butter is made. Above the region of the palm commences that of the arboreous fern and the cinchona which bears the febrifuge bark. Above this, a broad zone of 6,000 to 12,000 ft. contains the region of alpine plants. The sugar cane, the orange, coffee and cotton have been introduced by the Europeans, and flourish in great luxuriance. The climate, though noxious in certain confined and local situations, is on the whole delightful; in short, nothing is wanting but judicious and well-directed means, on the part of man, to render the whole southern division of the western hemisphere the abode of enjoyment and prosperity.

America, p.t. capital of Alexander Co. Illinois, on the Ohio, 7 m. above the Mississippi.

Amerpore, a town of Nepaul, 10 m. W of Moowanpoor.

Amerkate, a fort of Hindoostan, in the extensive sandy desert between the Indus and the Pindar. This place is celebrated as the retreat of the emperor Humaioo, during his troubles; and here was born his son, the illustrious Acbar. It is 160 m. E. N. E. of Tatta.

Amersfort, a town of Holland, in the state of Utrecht. A considerable quantity of tobacco is raised in the neighbourhood. It has a trade in beer, and goods from Germany are shipped here for Amsterdam. It is seated in a fertile country, on the river Ems, 10 m. E. N. E. of Utrecht.

Amersham or Agmondesham, a borough in Buckinghamshire, returning 2 members to parliament, with a market on Tuesday. It has a considerable manufacture of black lace. The town-hall is the handsomest in the country. It is seated in a vale between woody hills, 26 m. N. W. of London. Pop. 2,612.

Ames, p.t. Athens Co. Ohio, 77 m. S. E. Columbus.

Amesbury, p.t. Essex Co. Mass. 40 m. N. E. Boston: on the Merrimack 4 m. above Newburyport, is a thriving manufacturing town. Pop. 2,445. In the iron factories 1,000 tons of iron were formerly wrought in a year. The nail machine invented by Jacob Perkins, was first put in motion here. The flannel factory has 5,000 spindles, and turns out 200 pieces in a week. There are several other factories, bleacheries, &c.

Amesbury, or Ambresbury, a town in Wiltshire, with a market on Friday. It is seated on the lower Avon, at the place where a number of Britons were treacherously murdered, and near that famous monument of antiquity, Stonehenge. Here are the ruins of a venerable abbey. This place gave birth to Addison. It is 6 m. N. of Salisbury, and 77 W. of London. Pop. 810.

Amhara, a district of Abyssinia, between the Deuder and Tacazze branches of the Nile.

Amherst, a town, recently established by the English, at the bottom of the gulf of Martaban, in the Birman empire. Here is a Baptist Missionary.

Amherst, p.t. Hampshire Co. Mass. 91 m. W Boston and 7 E. of Conn. river. Pop. 2,631: has a college incorporated in 1825. This Seminary has 7 Professors and 4 tutors. The number of Students is 188. The libraries contains about 7,000 volumes. Here are also an academy, and an institution called the Mount Pleasant Institution, containing 9 instructors.

Amherst, p.t. one of the seats of justice in Hillsborough, N. H., on Souhegan river, a branch of the Merrimack, 47 m. fr. Boston; it is a pleasant town, and contains a mineral spring. Pop. 1,657.

Amherst, t. Erie Co. N. Y. 12 m. N. Buffalo. Pop. 2,489.

Amherst, an inland county of Virginia, on the north bank of James River. The court house of the county is 130 m. W. of Richmond. Pop. 12,072.

Amiens, a large and populous town of France, in the department of Somme. It is a place of great antiquity; being mentioned by Cæsar (by whom it was called Samarobriva) as a town that had made a vigorous resistance against the Romans, and where he convened a general assembly of the Gauls. The town is encompassed with a wall and other fortifications; and the ramparts are planted with trees, which form a delightful walk. The city has five gates. At the gate of Noyon there is a suburb, remarkable for the abbey of St. Achen. The cathedral is one of the largest and most magnificent churches in France. Three branches of the river Somme pass through this city, and afterwards unite. Amiens was taken by the Spaniards in 1597, but retaken by Henry IV. who built a citadel in it. A treaty of peace was concluded here, March 27, 1802, between Spain, Holland, France, and England. It has manufactures of linen and woollen cloth, which employ in the city and adjacent country, 30,000 people. It is 20 m. S. E. of Abbeville, and 75 N. of Paris. Amite, a county of Mississippi. Pop. 7,943. Liberty is the chief town.

Amtwiech, a town of Wales, on the N. coast of Anglesey with a harbour for small vessels. In 1768, when the Parys copper mines were opened, it did not contain above 6 houses; but in 1821, 1,006, and 7,292 inhab. It is 25 m. W. of Beaurmaris, and 266 N. W. of London. See Parys.

Amman, a town of Syria, anciently the capital of the Ammonites, called Rabbah Ammon, and by the Greeks Philadelphia, and now the principal place of a district. It is 30 m. S. W. of Bosra, and 52 N. of Jerusalem.

Amol, a town of Usbec Tartary, in Bucharia, and a place of considerable trade. It is seated on the Amu, which falls into the sea of Aral, 60 m. W. of Bucharia. Long. 60. 40. E. lat. 39. 20. N.

Amol, a town of Persia, in Mazanderan, with the remains of an ancient fortress and palace. It has manufactures of cotton, and in the neighbourhood are iron mines and cannon foundries. It stands in a plain, at the foot of Mount Taurus, and on the borders of the Caspian sea, 30 m. N. W. of Ferabad. Long. 52. 38. E. lat. 37. 30. N.

Amoneosuck, Upper and Lower; two rivers rising among the White Mountains and flowing into the Connecticut; each about 50 m. long.

Amorgo, an island of the Archipelago, fertile in wine, oil, and corn. The best cultivated parts belong to a monastery. It is 30 miles in circumference, and 67 north of Candia. Long. 26. 15. E. lat. 36. 20. N.

Amoskeag falls, on the Merrimack, in N. Hampshire, 15 m. below Concord, consist of 3 pitches within half a mile, descending about 50 feet. A canal passes round them.

Amour, or Amur, river of Chinese Tartary. See Saghalien.

Amoy, an island on the S. E. coast of China, 15 miles in circumference. The English had a factory here, but abandoned it on account of the impositions of the inhabitants. Its port, on the west side, is capable of receiving 1,000 ships. Long. 118. 45. E. lat. 24. 20. N.

Amplepuis, a town of France, in the department of Rhone, celebrated for its wines. It is 16 m. W. of Villefranche, and 26 N. W. of Lyons.

Amptill, a town in Bedfordshire, with a market on Thursday. It was the residence of Catharine, queen of Henry VIII. during the time that her unjust divorce was in agitation. This event is commemorated by a poetical inscription on a column where the old castle stood. It is situate between 2 hills, 6 m. S. of Bedford, and 45 N. W. of London. Pop. 1,527.

Ampurias, a sea-port of Spain, in Catalonia, at the mouth of the Fluvià, 70 m. N. E. of Barcelona. Long. 3. 0. E. lat. 42. 9. N.

Amrus, a castle or palace of Germany, in Tyrol, at the foot of a mountain, 2 m. S. E. of Inspruck.

Amsterdam, the principal city of Holland Proper, the capital of the northern division of the Netherlands, and formerly of the republic of the Seven United Provinces, is situated at the confluence of the rivers Amstel and Y, or Wye, near the south-western extremity of the Zuyder Zee. 90 m. N. by E. from Antwerp, in lat. 52. 25. N. long. 4. 40. E. Pop. 180,000. This city was unknown in history before the latter end of the thirteenth century, and was then noticed only as a collection of fishermen's huts in the middle of a morass. It first acquired a commercial character about the year 1370, but was not fortified till the end of the succeeding century; after which period it gradually increased in magnitude and mercantile celebrity, yet not without experiencing some severe check. In 1512 it was besieged by the people of Guelderland, who, on failure of their attempt to take the city, set fire to the shipping in the harbour. During the same century its tranquillity was disturbed by tumults and insurrections occasioned by the anabaptists; in one of which Van Geelen, the leader of these enthusiasts, led his followers openly in military array, with drums beating and colours flying to the town house, where he fixed his head quarters. He was however, soon dispossessed. The magistrates assembled the burghers, who showed no disposition to take part with the insurgents, and being aided by some regular troops, surrounded the place; and after an obstinate resistance, he and the whole of his surviving band were taken prisoners, and put to death under circumstances of extreme cruelty. The city was taken possession of by the Hollanders in 1578, on condition that the religious rights of the Roman Catholic citizens should be respected. The condition was but ill observed; for all the ecclesiastics of both sexes were driven out of the city, the images broken, and the altars demolished. From this period its opulence and splendour increased with an almost uninterrupted rapidity till its connection with the revolutionary government of France, which caused a total annihilation of its commerce during the continuation of the union of the countries.

One cause of the advancement of Amsterdam was the decay of Antwerp, occasioned chiefly by the closing of the navigation of the Scheldt; another, which also concurred in securing the stability of its commerce, was the erection of the public bank. This establishment was instituted in 1609, in order to obviate the inconveniences arising from the very debased state of the currency of Holland, which was made up of coins brought from every part of the world. Merchants often found it difficult to procure standard coin to pay their bills; but as the bank received the light and worn out coin at its intrinsic value, an invariable standard was thus formed which tended greatly to simplify the operations of trade. The amount of the capital of the bank was never correctly ascertained, though it is said to have increased in the period of its prosperity to upwards of forty millions sterling of actual deposits. These originally consisted of coined money, but afterwards large quantities of gold and silver bullion were received. After the French invasion in 1795 it was ascertained, however, that its boasted treasures were imaginary: the precious metals had been lent out by the directors to different public bodies, whose bonds were deposited in their stead.

In consequence of its extensive commercial credit, Amsterdam was long the centre of exchange for Europe; but from the time that a want of confidence in the bank began to be felt, a great part of the exchange transactions have been carried on in London and Hamburg.

In the year 1757 this city suffered considerably from the explosion of a powder magazine, by which many buildings were destroyed. During the internal troubles that agitated the republic in 1797, it was occupied by the Prussians, who maintained possession of it for a year; afterwards, in 1805, it submitted to the French; and when the United Provinces were incorporated into the body of the French empire under Napoleon, Amsterdam was considered the third city in rank, being deemed inferior only to Paris and Rome.

The government is vested in a council called Vroedschap, of thirty-six members, in whom the supreme power is lodged. The office is held during life, and vacancies are filled by the survivors. This body elects the chief magistrates, named burgomasters or echevins, a rank somewhat similar to that of alderman: the number of these is twelve; they have the direction of all public works, and hold the keys of the city bank. The military protection of the town is in the charge of the militia, consisting of sixty companies of from 200 to 300 men each. Jews and anabaptists are excluded from this body, as they are not allowed to bear arms: they are, however, obliged to contribute to the support of the city guard, consisting of 1,400 soldiers, and to the night watch, which patrols the streets and calls the hours. In addition to this night patrol, trumpeters are stationed in every church steeple, who sound every half hour, and, in case of fire, ring the alarm bells, and direct enquirers to the place.

The city extends in the form of a semicircle on the southern bank of the Y, which is its diameter; on the land side it was surrounded by a wall and bastions, with a broad and deep fosse: the wall is dismantled; but the bastions still remain, and are used as sites for corn-mills. The Amstel, on entering the city, divides into two branches, from each of which issue numerous canals, forming a collection of islands, connected with each other by 290 bridges; of which, that over the Amstel, commanding a panoramic view of the city and its environs, is the only one worthy of notice. That part of the river Y which forms the port of Amsterdam, is guarded by a double row of piles, with openings at intervals for the admission of vessels: these openings are always closed at night. The deeply laden ships lie outside the piles, in a place called the Laag. During the period of Dutch prosperity, an hundred vessels have entered the port in one tide, and six or seven hundred were to be seen there at anchor together. On the opposite side of the Y are the locks by which ships enter the great canal, which is carried thence, in a straight line, northwards to the Texel; thus preventing the risk and delay of a voyage through the Zuyder Zee. This canal, which has been recently finished, is 120 feet wide at the surface, and twenty-five deep. It was constructed at an expense of 1,000,000*l.* sterling. It terminates at the Helder, which was nothing more than a fishing village, until it was fortified by Bonaparte for the defence of a naval arsenal he formed there, and which is now called Willems-oord. The island of the Texel is principally devoted to the breeding of sheep. The cheese made from their milk is much prized by the inhabitants. The canals with which the city is intersected, though extremely convenient and ornamental, are attended with one very disagreeable consequence: from the stagnation of the water, and the collection of offal of every kind discharged into them, they send forth effluvia equally offensive and unwholesome, which all the characteristic cleanliness of the inhabitants has not been able wholly to remove. Mills have been erected on their banks, to promote a circulation of air by ventilation; others, called mud-mills, from the purpose to which they are applied, are also used to raise and remove the slime which the river deposits largely.

In consequence of the badness of the foundation, the whole city is built on piles driven endways into the mud; a circumstance which occasioned the witty remark of Erasmus, on visiting it, "that he was in a town where the inhabitants lived, like rooks, on the tops of trees." This circumstance also occasioned the restriction of coaches to men of consequence and physicians, who paid a tax for the privilege of using them; the magistrates conceiving that the rolling of the wheels produced a dangerous concussion of the piles. Goods are conveyed through the town on sledges; and the common conveyance for those who do not wish to walk is a kind of sleigh or traineau, consisting of the body of a carriage fixed on a hurdle, drawn by a single horse, and guided by the driver, who walks by its side. The streets in general are narrow, with the exception of a few which present a fine appearance, and are adorned with spacious mansions. The principal square is the Dam, in front of the palace; besides which there are three others, where markets and an annual fair are held. The palace, formerly the stadthouse, or town hall, is considered to be the most magnificent building in Holland. It forms an oblong square, 232 feet in length, 235 in breadth, and 116 in height, besides the tower, which is 67 feet high. Within is a spacious hall, 150 feet long, 60 broad, and 100 high. This hall, and the other apartments of the palace, are adorned with some fine paintings. Strangers are admitted daily to view it, under the sole restriction of writing down their names on entering. The front entrance has seven doors, which were intended for the representatives of the Seven United Provinces, but are now reserved exclusively for the royal family. All other persons obtain admission through the back entrance. The basement story was formerly used to hold the immense treasures of the bank.

The royal museum contains, besides other curiosities, a fine collection of paintings, chiefly of the Flemish school. It is said that the emperor Alexander offered the sum of 30,000*l.* for one alone. Visitors are admissible to the museum on terms of equal liberality as to the palace.

The exchange is a large but plain building, 230 feet in length and 130 in breadth: it is capable of containing 4,500 persons; and is divided into thirty-six compartments, for the transaction of the various kinds of commercial business carried on there.

The deficiency of architectural elegance in the places of public worship is very striking, particularly to travellers coming from the Netherlands, where much attention is paid to their embellishment. The old church of St. Nicholas has some fine painted windows, and contains the tombs of several of the celebrated Dutch admirals. The burial ground of one of the sixteen chapels attached to it was appropriated, by the catholic magistracy of Amsterdam, during the period of religious persecution, for the interment of the protestant merchants of Hamburgh who died here. The new church of St. Catherine contains a splendid monument of white marble, erected to the memory of admiral de Ruyter. The Portuguese synagogue is said to have been built in imitation of the temple of Solomon. The churches of the established religion, which is the reformed or Calvinistic, are distinguished by being the only places of worship which are allowed the use of bells. The total number of churches is, ten Dutch reformed, twenty-two catholic, one French reformed, one English presbyterian, three Lutheran, one anabaptist, one Walloon, one Greek, and seven synagogues. The number of resident Jews is estimated at 17,000.

The management of the penitentiaries is peculiarly worthy of notice. The number of convicts is great, not because crime is more common, but because the punishment of death is seldom inflicted.

ed: imprisonment for various periods, in most cases, supplies its place. The principal prison is the house of correction, called also the Rasp-house, because the chief employment of its inmates is the cutting and rasping of Brazil wood. In this place of confinement, no one is suffered to be idle: and thus the government is indemnified for much of the expenditure incurred; and the prisoners, on their part, are frequently reclaimed, by its wholesome and rigid discipline, from the dissolute and vicious habits which led them to become its inmates. In the yard of the prison is one cell, and one only, for the treatment of the incorrigibly idle. A stream of water constantly flows into it, which can only be discharged through a pump set up within. The only means, therefore, by which the inmate can avoid being overwhelmed by the ingress of the water is by working incessantly at the pump: if he persists in his idleness, he is inevitably drowned. It is said that it is now never used.

The workhouse is intended for minor offences; some of which are not recognised by our laws. Husbands may send their wives thither on a charge of drunkenness or extravagance; and they are themselves liable to punishment for the same offences. Young women, also, even of good families, are sometimes sent thither as to a school of rigorous reformation. The charitable institutions are numerous, and generally well conducted.

Amsterdam can boast of a fair proportion of literary and scientific societies. The principal, named Felix Meritis, comprehends among its members most of the literature of the kingdom. Its business is distributed among five classes or committees: one for agriculture, manufactures, and commerce; the second for mathematics and its kindred sciences; the third for the polite arts; the fourth for music; and the fifth for general or miscellaneous literature. The building contains a theatre for the delivery of lectures, a museum, a gallery of sculpture, a drawing school, and an observatory commanding a fine view of the city and its environs. The public botanic garden, though plentifully stocked, does not contain any plants of extraordinary value. In the Royal Academy of Liberal Arts, a late institution for communicating instructions in painting, sculpture, and architecture, pensions for four years are granted to the most deserving pupils, which are appropriated to a journey to Italy. In the naval schools, children of common seamen, when properly recommended, are educated gratuitously; as are the sons of officers, on the payment of a small pension. All are treated alike; and almost every officer who has elevated the naval character of his country has received his education here.

Amsterdam and St. Paul, two islands in the Indian Ocean, lying in the same longitude, at 40 m. distance. Their names are reversed by navigators, but most of them call the northern one St. Paul, and the southern Amsterdam. The latter is high land, and upward of 4 m. long, and 2 broad. It has evident marks of volcanic eruption in every part, and is almost wholly covered with a deep fertile soil, but is destitute of trees. On the east side is a great crater, into which the sea has made a narrow and shallow entrance; its shelving sides are 700 feet in perpendicular height, in which, and in the causeway dividing it from the sea, are several hot springs of fresh water. St. Paul, or the northern island, presents no very high land, or any rise in a conic form. It is covered with shrubs and low trees, but has no convenient landing-place. Long. 77. 48. E. lat. 37. 51. S.

Ancenis, a town of France, in the department of Lower Loire, seated on the Loire, 20 m. E. of Nantes.

Anchelm, a river in Lincolnshire, Eng. which rises near Market Raisin, flows to Glandford-bridge and is navigable thence to the Humber.

Anclam, a fortified town of Hither Pomerania, on the river Peene, 20 m. S. E. of Gripswald.

Ancoder, a territory of Guinea, on the Gold coast, to the W. of Axim. It has a river of the same name flowing through it; and at its mouth is a town with a good harbour. Long. 1. 10. W. lat. 4. 50. N.

Ancona, Marquisate of, a maritime province of the states of the church, Italy, bounded on the E. by the Adriatic, and on the W. by the Apennines; it is very fruitful in corn, fruits and silk.

Ancona, a city and seaport of Italy in the above province, and a bishop's see, with a citadel on a hill. The cathedral stands upon another hill, and the houses extend down the side of the eminence toward the Gulf of Venice. Clement XII. built a mole, to render the harbour safe; it is erected on the ruins of the ancient mole, raised by Trajan, above 2,000 ft. in length. Near this stands the beautiful triumphal arch of Trajan. Here likewise Clement XII. erected a lazaretto, which advances a little way into the sea in the form of a pentagon. Great numbers of Jews are settled in this city, where they have a synagogue; and they have the principal share of its commerce. Ancona was taken in 1796 by the French, who surrendered it to the Austrians in 1799. It is 116 m. N. by E. of Rome. Long. 13. 29. E. lat. 43. 38. N. Pop. about 20,000.

Andaman Islands, several islands on the E. side of the bay of Bengal. The largest called Great Andaman, is 120 m. long and 16 broad, indented by deep bays affording good harbours, and intersected by rivers one of which passes quite through the island, and at high water is navigable for small vessels. The forests afford some precious trees, as ebony and the Nicobar bread-fruit: and the edible birds' nests abound here. The only quadrupeds seem to be wild hogs, monkeys, and rats. The inhabitants are in a state of barbarism, and live chiefly on fish, fruits, and herbs; they perfectly resemble negroes, and their canoes are of the rudest kind. In 1793, the English made a settlement on the N. end of Great Andaman, the largest island, which is called Port Cornwallis, and has a commodious harbour to shelter ships during the N. E. monsoon. Long. 93. 0. E. lat. 13. 30. N.

Andaye, a fortified town of France, in the department of Lower Pyrenees, famous for its brandy. It is situate near the mouth of the Bidassoa, almost opposite Fontarabia, in Spain, 18 m. S. W. of Bayonne.

Andely, a town of France, in the department of Eure, divided by a paved road into Great and Little Andely, a mile from each other. Great Andely is on the rivulet Gamons, and Little Andely on the Seine. The cloths manufactured here are in high esteem. It is 17 m. N. E. of Evreux, and 20 S. E. of Rouen.

Andernack, a town in the grand duchy of the Lower Rhine, now forming part of the Prussian territory. Great quantities of timber are collected here, which are formed into vast rafts, and floated hence to Dordrecht, in Holland. It is seated on the Rhine, 20 m. N. W. of Coblenz.

Anderak, a city of Usbec Tartary, capital of the province of Tokaristan. In its vicinity are rich quarries of lapis lazuli. It is seated on a branch of the Gihon Amu, and near a pass through the mountains of Hindooko into the kingdom of Caubul, 240 m. E. S. E. of Balk. Long. 68. 58. E. lat. 36. 10. N.

Andero, St. See Santander.

Andes, a chain of mountains running through the whole extent of North and South America, although the name is confined to S. America alone; and N. of the isthmus of Darien the chain is known by the name of the Cordilleras, Rocky Mountains &c. From the utmost extremity of the Southern division, in south lat. 54, to about the lat. of 18 south, they continue in an unbroken line to run parallel with the shore of the Pacific Ocean, at a distance of 100 to 200 miles, with here and there parallel ridges further east, and at an altitude of 12,000 to 15,000 ft. above the level of the sea; from about the 18th to the 15th deg. of south lat. the chain is somewhat broken, but further north they assume a more grand and imposing form, diverging into parallel ridges, and rising near the equator to an altitude of 21,440 ft. and in several places issue forth volcanic eruptions with terrific violence. N. of the equator they diverge into 4 parallel and distinct ridges, running to the shores of the Caribbean Sea, and the outermost ridge skirting the coast of that sea to the Atlantic, through the chain which unites the two grand divisions of America, or the western hemisphere, the mountains are considerably broken; but at about the 15th degree of north lat. through the territory of Mexico, they again assume their wonted grandeur, rising to a height of 17,720 ft. and again pouring forth volcanic matter, and proceed in an unbroken line at a somewhat greater distance from the sea than through the south division, by the name of the Rocky Mountains, to the icy Sea in the 70th deg. of north lat. From the 40th deg. of lat. south, to the 30th north, the Andes abound with gold, silver, copper, and other metallic substances.

In the Colombian provinces, the Andes are divided into three parallel chains separated by deep and extensive valleys, which are the basins of great rivers. Farther south these mountains intermingle in one group and stretch onward beyond the equator. The Andes of Quito are the most elevated points of the whole chain, Chimborazo being the highest summit in America, unless according to the statement of a recent traveller, the peak of Ylimani be entitled to this distinction. Throughout Peru and Chile these mountains still maintain a sublime elevation and contain enormous metallic riches. The highest peaks are in the region of eternal snow, and they present in every quarter the most grand and imposing scenery. The passes through the mountains are frequently no more than two feet in breadth, and resemble a hollow gallery, open to the sky. The traveller shudders in passing along these tremendous fissures, which are filled with mud; while at the same time their obscurity is increased by the thick vegetation, which, hanging down from above, covers the opening. The quebradas are immense rents breaking through the whole chain of the mountains and forming vast abysses sufficient in size to swallow up an ordinary mountain. It is here that the eye of the terrified traveller can best comprehend the gigantic magnificence of the Andes. Through these natural gates the great rivers find a passage to the sea. Here also are villages of mountaineers; pastures covered with llamas and sheep; orchards bordered with quick-set hedges and luxuriant and highly cultivated cornfields, occupying a station suspended as it were in the lofty regions of the air; and the traveller can hardly bring himself to believe that this habitable region is higher above the sea than the summit of the Pyrenees.

Andlau, a town of France, in the department of Lower Rhine, with a castle, situate on a mountain, 18 m. S. S. W. of Strasburg.

Andover, a borough in Hampshire, Eng. returning two members to Parliament, with a market on Saturday, a manufacture of shalloons, and a considerable trade in malt. A navigable canal passes hence to Southampton water. It is situate near the river Ande, 10 m. N. by W. of Winchester, and 63. W. by S. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,123.

Andover, p.t. Essex Co. Mass. 20 m. N. Boston. Pop. 4,540. This is a pleasant and thriving town with manufactures of flannel and other woollen cloths; but is chiefly distinguished for its Theological Seminary, first established in 1807 and enlarged by subsequent endowments, amounting to 400,000 dollars. It comprises three large piles of building with accommodations for 120 students. The doctrines of this institution are substantially Calvinism. The library has 5,000 volumes. Most of the students are supported by charity. The officers are a President and 4 Professors. Andover also contains Phillips Academy, founded in 1788. Its officers are a principal and 5 assistants. The usual number of students is 130; all of them are engaged in classical studies. The funds of the institution amount to 50,000 dollars. Andover has a third Seminary called Franklin Academy, in which classical studies are pursued.

Andragiry, the capital of a kingdom on the E. coast of the island of Sumatra. The chief produce is pepper. It is seated on a river; commodious for trade, 200 m. N. by W. of Bencoolen. Long. 102. 0. E. lat. 0. 58. S.

Andrarum, a town of Sweden, in Gothland, with the greatest alum work in the kingdom. It is 10 m. S. of Christianstad.

Andreasberg, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Brunswick, with good silver mines, 28 m. N. E. of Gottingen.

Andrew, St. a town of Germany, in Carinthia, and a bishop's see; seated on the river Lavant, 20 m. E. N. E. of Clagenfurt.

Andrews, St. a sea-port town of New Brunswick, at the entrance of Passamaquoddy River.

Andrews, St. a city of Scotland, in Fifeshire, once the metropolis of the Pictish kingdom, and the see of an archbishop.

About the middle of the twelfth century, David I. erected the town into a royal burgh, and the privileges which it thus obtained were confirmed by Malcolm II. In the wars of subsequent times, it was more than once the object of bloody contention between the loyalists and the malcontents; and at the commencement of the Reformation it suffered its full share in the violences which were committed.

The cathedral, which was once the glory of the city, is now a ruin. It is said to have been not less than 157 years in building, but was nearly destroyed in one day, the assailants leaving only sufficient of it standing to indicate its former magnitude and great antiquity. The remains consist of part of the east and west ends, and of the south side, together with the chapel of St. Regulus, the entire body and great tower of which still exist. The latter is 103 feet high, and forms an immense equilateral triangle, each side being twenty feet broad.

The ancient castle retains as little of its original grandeur as the cathedral; but it is still remembered as the scene of many a desperate struggle in former times. It was from one of the windows of this building that cardinal Beaton beheld his unjust sentence of the heroic reformer Wishart put in execution; and it was before the same window that his own body was laid after his assassination by the friends of the reformer.

The university of St. Andrew's is the oldest in Scotland, and originally consisted of three colleges—St. Salvator's, St. Leonard's, and St. Mary's or the new college. Its government is formed of a chancellor, who, previous to the Reformation, was the archbishop of the diocese, but since then has been elected by the professor, and of the principals of the colleges. The number of students seldom exceeds 300; but both the healthy situation of the town and its accommodations for study give it great advantages as a place of education. The college of St. Mary is devoted entirely to students in theology; that of St. Salvator to the sciences in general. The extensive library of the university contains near 40,000 volumes, and numerous manuscripts.

Dr. Johnson visited this city in his tour through Scotland, and speaks of it with more than usual urbanity. "We found," says he, "that, by the interposition of some invisible friend, lodgings had been provided for us at the house of one of the professors, whose easy civility quickly made us forget that we were strangers; and in the whole time of our stay we were gratified by every mode of kindness, and entertained with all the elegance of lettered hospitality. In the morning we rose to perambulate a city which only history shows to have once flourished; and surveyed the remains of ancient magnificence, of which even the ruins cannot long be visible, unless some care be taken to preserve them; and where is the pleasure of preserving such mournful memorials? They have been till very lately so much neglected, that every man carried away the stones, who fancied that he wanted them. The university within a few years consisted of three colleges, but is now reduced to two; the college of St. Leonard being lately dissolved by the sale of its buildings and the appropriation of its revenues to the professors of the two others. The chapel of the alienated college is yet standing—a fabric not inelegant of external structure; but I was always by some civil excuse hindered from entering it. The dissolution of St. Leonard's college was doubtless necessary; but of that necessity there is reason to complain. It is surely not without just reproach, that a nation, of which the commerce is hourly extending and the wealth increasing, denies any participation of its prosperity to its literary societies, and, while its merchants or its nobles are raising palaces, suffers its universities to moulder into dust." In the year 1683, the tomb of bishop Kennedy in the college church was opened, and six silver maces were found in it of very beautiful workmanship. The other religious structures of this town are interesting for their antiquity; and the principal church, which is sufficiently large to hold between two and three thousand people, contains the monument of archbishop Sharpe, who was murdered near the town by the covenanters, and whose tragical history is displayed in rude sculpture on one of the walls.

Till the Reformation, St. Andrew's enjoyed the high distinction of being the metropolitan see of the Scottish kingdom. It also carried on a profitable trade; and, in the time of Charles I., possessed between thirty and forty vessels. Both its commerce and its manufactures have of late years been reduced to a low ebb, and the manufacture of golf-balls is now the only one that exists. It is associated with Dundee, Cupar, Perth, and Forfar, in sending one member to parliament. It is seated at the bottom of a bay, on the level top of a small hill, 30 m. N. N. E. of Edinburgh. Long. 2. 50. W. lat. 56. 18. N. Pop. in 1821. 4,900.

Andros, an island in the Archipelago, 24 m. long and 8 broad. It is one of the ancient Cyclades. It has fertile plains, which are well watered; and it wants only a good harbour. The inhabitants are of the Greek church, and have a bishop and several monasteries. The principal riches of this island consist in silks, and the fields produce oranges, citrons, mulberries, pomegranates, and figs. The capital is of the same name; and about two miles from it are to be seen the ruins of a strong wall, with the fragments of many columns, chapiters, bases, broken statues, and several inscriptions, some of which mention the senate and people of Andros, and the priests of Bacchus; from which it is probable that this was the site of the ancient city; Long. 25. 2. E. lat. 38. 0. N.

Androscoggin, a river rising from Umbagog Lake, on the W. side of the state of Maine, it runs into New Hampshire, and re-enters Maine, falling into the Kennebeck, about 18 m. above its confluence with the sea.

Andezar, or Andujar, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, with a castle, and some beautiful churches and convents. The environs abound in wheat, wine, oil, honey, and fruit. It is seated on the Guadalquivir, and on the great post road from Madrid, dis. 5 1-2 leagues, by way of Cordova to Seville and Cadiz.

Anemur, Cape, the southern extremity of Carmania, opposite the Isle of Cyprus; on the promontory are the ruins of the ancient city Anemurium. N. lat. 36. 15. E. long. 32. 36.

Angelos, a city of Mexico. See Puebla de los Angelos.

Angerburg, a town of Prussia, with a castle, seated on the N. side of a lake, to which it gives name, 70 m. S. E. of Königsberg. Long. 22. 15. E. lat. 54. 8. N.

Angerbury, or Angermanland, a province of Sweden, in Nordland, 150 miles long, and from 25 to 80 broad, the widest part being to the east on the gulf of Bothnia. It is mountainous and woody, and in it are considerable iron-works. The chief town is Hernösand.

Angermünde, a town of Brandenburgh, in the Ucker Mark, on the lake Mund., 48 m. N. N. E. of Berlin.

Angers, a large city of France, in the department of Maine and Loire, situated near the confluence of the Sarthe, the Loire, and the Maine, which divides the city into two equal parts, between which there is a communication by two large bridges. Angers contains 36,000 inhabitants. The castle is situated in the centre of the city, on a rock, overhanging the river. The cathedral is a venerable and elegant structure: the principal gate is surrounded with three steeples. Here lies interred with her ancestors, the renowned Margaret, daughter of Rene, king of Sicily, and queen of Henry VI. of England, who expired after many intrepid but ineffectual efforts to replace her husband on the throne, in 1482, at the castle of Dampierre. The university of Angers was founded in 1396, and the academy of Belles Lettres in 1685. It has a considerable manufacture of handkerchiefs and canvas; and the produce of the slate quarries, at the extremity of the suburb of Bressigny, forms likewise an important article of commerce. The walls with which king John of England surrounded it in 1214, remain nearly entire, and are of very great circumference. It is 50 m. E. N. E. of Nantes, and 175 S. W. of Paris. Long. 0. 33. W. lat. 47. 28. N.

Anglen, or Angelen, a small country of Denmark, in the duchy of Sleswick. Many authors suppose that from the people of this country the English originated; being called in to assist the Britons against the invaders from Norway, they in process of time became masters of the country, and gave it the name of England.

Anglesey, an island and Co. at the N. W. extremity of Wales. It is separated from Caernarvonshire by a long and narrow channel called Menai, which passes from St. George's Channel, by Caernarvon and Bangor, to the Irish Sea. That part of the island which borders this strait is finely wooded, recalling to the mind its ancient state, when it was the celebrated seat of the Druids, whose terrific religious rites were performed in the gloom of the thickest woods. Rude mounds and heaps of stone, said to be druidical remains, are still to be seen; but a little way within, the whole appears a naked tract, without trees or hedges, watered by numerous rills, fertile in grass and corn, and abounding in cattle. This island produces vast quantities of copper and sulphur (see Parys) and in the N. W. part is a quarry of green marble, intermixed with asbestos. Beaumaris and Holyhead are the chief towns.

Angola, the whole extent of territory on the western coast of S. Africa, from near the equator to the 13th or 14th deg. of S. lat. comprehending Loango, Congo, Angola Proper, and Benguela, is commonly called Angola; but Angola Proper, or the kingdom of Angola lies S. of the Congo, between the lat. of 7 to 9 S. All this part of the coast of South Africa is well watered and exceedingly capable of yielding abundance, not only for the subsistence but the luxury of man. It is divided into numerous petty states and sovereignties, the chiefs of which live in constant collision with each other; since the restriction of the traffic in slaves to the S. of the equator, rapine and cruelty have reigned with uncontrolled sway over the whole of this fine and extensive district; and since the period of 1815 and 1816, more than 100,000 of the natives have been annually transported as slaves, by the French, Spaniards, and Portuguese, to Martinique, Guadeloupe, Cuba, and the Brazils. St. Paulo de Loango in lat. about 8. 30. S. is the principal place on the coast of Angola Proper, at which the Brazilians more particularly carry on their operation of slave traffic. Abstracted from the unsocializing and debasing influence which the slave-traffic is so strongly calculated to excite and promote, the inhabitants of this part of South Africa are much addicted to habits of idleness, idolatry, and polygamy.

Angola, p.v. Erie Co. N. Y. 291 m. W. Albany.

Angora, or Angouri, the ancient Ancyra, a city of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, and a Greek archbishop's see, remarkable for its remains of antiquity; such as inscriptions, pillars, ruins of temples, &c. The castle has a triple inclosure, and the walls are of white marble and stone, resembling porphyry. The inhabitants are estimated at 100,000. Here are bred the finest goats in the world; the hair being almost like silk, is worked into fine stuffs. It stands in a lofty situation, 212 m. S. E. of Constantinople. Long. 32. 50. E. lat. 40. 4. N.

Angoulême, a town of France, capital of the department of Charente, and the see of a bishop. It is seated on a mountain surrounded by rocks. The river Charente runs at the foot of it; and there are some paper manufactures in its environs. It is 50 m. W. S. W. of Limoges. Long. 0. 9. E. lat. 45. 39. N.

Angoumois, a late province of France, bounded on the N. by Poitou, E. by Limosin and Manche, S. by Perigord, and W. by Saintonge. It is now distributed among the departments of Charente, Dordogne, and Deux Sevres.

Angra, the capital of Terceira, one of the Azores. It is a bishop's see and the residence of the governor of the Azores. The town is well built, and populous; and here are royal magazines for all sorts of naval stores, a cathedral, five churches, and several monastic houses. It stands on a bay, between two mountains, on the S. side of the island. Long. 27. 12. W. lat. 38. 39. N.

Angrogna, a town of Piedmont, on a river of the same name, 7 m. W. of Pignerol.

Anguilla, or Snake Island, the most northerly of the English Leeward islands in the West Indies. It is 30 miles long and 3 broad, winding somewhat in the manner of a snake, and is 60 m. N. W. of St. Christopher. Long. 62. 35. W. lat. 18. 15 N. One of the Bahama islands is also called Anguilla.

Angusshire, or Forfarshire, a maritime county on the N. E. coast of Scotland; bounded on the S. by the Frith of Tay, W. by the county of Perth, and N. by Kincardineshire. The chief towns are Dundee, Arbroath, Forfar, Montrose, and Brechin. It is prettily diversified with hill, dale, and water.

Anhalt, a principality of Germany, in Upper Saxony, 42 m. long and 10 broad; bounded on the S. by Mansfeld, W. by Halberstadt, E. by the duchy of Saxony, and N. by Magdeburg. It abounds in corn, and is watered by the Salde and Mulda. Its ancient castle is gone to decay Zerbst is the capital.

Anholt, an island of Denmark, in the Cattegat, surrounded by sand banks so dangerous to seamen, that on it is a light house. The English took possession of it in 1810, and made it a place of rendezvous for the North Sea squadron. Long. 11. 35. E. lat. 56. 38. N.

Aniane, a town of France, in the department of Herault, 13 m. W. N. W. of Montpellier. It has an extensive manufacture of mineral alkali.

Anjengo, a town of Hindoostan, in Travancore, which has a trade in pepper and calicoes. It stands at the mouth of a river, 46 m. W. N. W. of Travancore. Long. 76. 40. E. lat. 8. 40. N.

Animaly, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Coimbatore, with a fort. It has a trade in drugs, honey, and wax, collected in the hills to the south, and is seated on the Alima, 21 m. S. of Coimbatore.

Anjou, a late province of France, bounded on the N. by Maine, W. by Bretagne, S. by Poitou, and E. by Touraine. It formerly belonged to the sovereigns of England. It now forms the department of Mayenne and Loire.

Ann, St. a town of New Brunswick, situate on the river St. John nearly opposite to Fredericton, and 80 m. above the city of St. John. Also the name of the chief town of the province of Parana, in Paraguay, and of a lake in Upper Canada, to the north of Lake Superior.

Anne Arundel, a county of Maryland, on the western shore of Chesapeake Bay. Pop. 28,905. Annapolis is the chief town.

Ann, Cape, a point of land which forms the north side of Massachusetts Bay. Two light-houses on an island at the extremity of this Cape are in N. lat. 42. 40. W. Long. 70. 38.

Ann, Fort, a town in Washington Co. N. Y. between the North River and Lake Champlain. Pop. 3,301.

Annaberg, St. a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, noted for silver mines and the manufacture of lace, 17 m. S. of Chemnitz.

Annagh, an island on the W. coast of Ireland 5 miles in circumference, between the isle of Achil and the coast of the county of Mayo. Long. 9. 39. W. lat. 53. 58. N. Also the name of three parishes in different parts of Ireland; 1st, in the co. of Kerry, pop. 2,089; 2d, in Cavan, pop. 10,488; 3rd, in Mayo, pop. 5,749.

Annagh, is also a prefix to several other parishes in Ireland, such as Annagh-clone, down, duff, &c.

Annamaboe, one of the principal commercial places on the Gold coast of North Africa, in N. lat. 5. 9. W. long. 1. 41.

Annamooka, one of the Friendly Islands, discovered by Tasman, in 1643, and visited by captain Cook in 1774 and 1777. It is well cultivated in many places, consisting of plantations of yams and plantains, inclosed with neat fences of reed. The bread-fruit and cocoa-nut trees are interspersed with little order, but chiefly near the habitations of the natives; and the other parts of the island, especially towards the sea, are covered with trees and bushes. It is situate about 187. E. long. 20. S. lat.

Annan, a borough of Scotland, in Dumfriesshire, seated on the river Annan, 3 m. from its mouth, which forms a good harbour for vessels of 250 tons burden. Here was a fine castle, built by one of the Bruces, the ruins of which still remain. Much corn is exported hence; and there is a manufacture for carding and spinning. It is 16 m. E. S. E. of Dumfries, and 80 S. of Edinburgh. Long. 3. 8. W. lat. 55. 2. N.

Annapolis, the capital of Anne Arundel county, and seat of the legislative government of the state of Maryland. The state-house, a noble building, stands in the centre of the city, from which point the streets diverge in every direction. Here also is St. John's college, which with Washington college at Chester, constitute one university, named the University of Maryland. Annapolis is situate on the west side of Chesapeake bay, at the mouth of the Severn, 40 m. E. by N. of Washington, and 35 S. of Baltimore. Long. 76. 48. W. lat. 39. 0. N. Pop. 2,623.

Annapolis, a sea-port of Nova Scotia, on the E. side of the Bay of Fundy. It has one of the finest harbours in the world; but the entrance is through a difficult strait, called the Gut of Annapolis. The town stands on the S. side of the harbour, at the mouth of a river of its name, 86 m. W. by N. of Halifax. Long. 64. 55. W. lat. 44. 50. N.

Antrim, a maritime county, on the N. E. coast of Ireland. It has two great natural curiosities; Lough Neagh, a large lake, the area of which exceeds 100,000 acres, the waters being of a petrifying quality; and the Giant's Causeway, consisting of lofty pillars of basalt, all of angular shapes, from three sides to eight, and extending three miles along the north shore. The linen manufacture is carried on very extensively in this county, and since about 1823 the cotton manufacture has been making considerable progress. The principal towns are Belfast, Lisburne, and Carrickfergus, each of which (in addition to the two for the county) returns one member to the parliament of the United Kingdom. Carrickfergus is the assize town. The county contained in 1821, 270, 823 inhabitants, and 48,028 houses.

Antrim, a town and parish of the above county, about 19 m. N. W. of Belfast. Pop. of the town 2,485, and of the parish, 5,129. The town is situate on the bank of a small stream, which runs into Lough Neagh, at a short distance on the north-east.

Antwerp, a celebrated city of Brabant, and after the decline of Venice and Genoa it became one of the most considerable commercial depots of Europe. It is situated on the east bank of the Scheldt, in N. lat. 51. 13. and 4. 24. E. long. The era of its greatest importance was about the commencement of the 17th century, when its population amounted to about 200,000, but the devastating policy of Austria and Spain involved it in the bigoted and ruthless contentions of that period; further, by the extent of the commercial transactions, which its localities drew hither as to a centre, it greatly rivalled the transactions of Rotterdam and Amsterdam, and as such excited the grovelling jealousy of the Hollanders; the navigation of the Scheldt was therefore obstructed in 1648, by the treaty of Westphalia, between Spain and Holland, and Antwerp in consequence, progressively declined in population and importance, until the period of the French revolution. When the French overran this part of Europe in 1794, they proclaimed the free navigation of the Scheldt, and after the renewal of the war subsequent to the peace, or rather the respite of Amiens in 1802, Antwerp claimed the especial notice of Napoleon, who constructed a basin to hold about 20 sail of the line, and a noble quay, along the east bank of the river, and made it his principal naval arsenal for the northern part of his empire. It was not, however, till subsequent to the general peace of Europe in 1814, when the Netherlands were ceded to Holland, and Antwerp declared a free port for the transit of merchandise, that it began to resume its former wonted activity and importance. Since that period, Brussels, and a vast extent of country westward of the Rhine, draw their supplies of foreign produce from Antwerp, which is, in consequence, progressively, though slowly, increasing in population and interest. It has, however, but few articles of export, either within itself, or of transit.

The city is nearly a semicircle, of about seven miles round. It was defended by the citadel, built by the duke of Alva to overawe the inhabitants. The whole appearance of its public buildings, streets, and houses, affords the most incontestable evidence of its former splendour. Many instances of the immense wealth of its merchants are recorded: among others, it is said that when Charles V. once dined with one of the chief magistrates, his host immediately after dinner threw into the fire a bond for two millions of ducats, which he had received as security for a loan to that monarch, saying that he was more than repaid by the honour of being permitted to entertain his sovereign.

The most remarkable of the streets is the Place de Mer, said to be unequalled by any in Europe for its great length, its still more unusual breadth, and the extraordinary sumptuousness of its houses. A crucifix thirty-three feet high, made from a demolished statue of the duke of Alva, stands at one end of the street; but the eye of taste is of fended here and elsewhere by the great intermix ture of dwellings of the lowest description with splendid palaces. The noble and the mechanic often inhabit adjoining houses. The want of sunken areas before the houses, and of raised foot-paths for pedestrians, is also severely commented on by British visitors.

The quays present a noble appearance: they are richly planted, and form one of the most favourite promenades. In the neighbourhood of the basins for shipping, is a square building, 230 feet long each way, intended as a place of merchandise for the Oosterling or Hanseatic towns of Germany. In its middle story, which has a gallery quite round the square, there are 300 lodging-rooms, but they are no longer used as such. The cellars serve for stables.

Besides the canals usual in all Dutch towns, others of an extraordinary construction are to be found here. They are carried on wholly underground, having been excavated at the expense of individuals, in order to convey in small boats, to their storehouses, the goods which had been brought in by the usual conveyance of the open canals. They are now used as sewers.

The town hall, in the great market-place, is a spacious building 250 feet long, having its front adorned with statues. It was rebuilt in 1581, the period of the commercial downfall of the city. This building contains the public library, which is not remarkable for the number or rarity of its books. It also contains a fine collection of paintings. The royal palace in the Place de Mer, which had been fitted up for the residence of Bonaparte, contains also some fine paintings. The Exchange, a large, but by no means an elegant structure, has served as a model for those of Amsterdam and London.

Of the places of public worship, the cathedral is by far the most noble, not only as compared with those in the neighbourhood, but with any other on the continent. It is 500 feet long, 230 wide, and 360 high; its erection occupied a period of ninety-six years. The spire is 466 feet in height. According to the original design, another of equal dimensions was to have been erected on the other side of the great entrance. But after having been carried up to a certain height, the work was discontinued; yet, notwithstanding this defect in uniformity, it is thought that the want of the second spire adds to the simple grandeur of that which has been completed. The gallery to the summit of the tower is attained by an ascent of 622 steps; and the toil of going up is well repaid by the commanding view afforded of the city beneath, the country, the Scheldt, and its neighbouring islands, stretching into the main sea. This church contains many fine paintings, mostly by Rubens: that of the taking down of our Saviour from the cross, in which the figures are as large as life, is universally considered his masterpiece. It also contains the monuments of Ambrose Capello, seventh bishop of the see; those of Moretus the printer, the successor of Plantin; of Plantin himself, and of Van Delft. Outside its walls is the tomb of Quinten Matsys, originally a blacksmith, but who, on being refused the daughter of Floris the painter till he had proved himself a painter also, laboured with incessant assiduity till he overcame the old man's scruples, and ultimately surpassed him in his favourite art. Near the tomb is a pump, the iron-work of which is said to have been wrought by Matsys before his transformation. In this cathedral Henry VIII. of England, together with the then kings of France, Denmark, Portugal, Poland, Bohemia, and the Romans, were made knights of the order of the Golden Fleece, by Philip II. of Spain, in the year 1555.

The church of St. James contains the tomb of the great Rubens: It is of black marble, simple in design, but most appropriately adorned with one of that master's own paintings. The windows of this church are much admired.

The church of St. Paul or of the Dominicans has in it some works of Rubens and Vandyke; particularly the scourging of Christ, by the former. But it is more frequently visited to see a representation of mount Calvary near its entrance. On descending into a cavity in the rock, intended to represent the place of our Saviour's sufferings, the body of Christ is seen laid out on a tomb, and covered with a shroud of silk; the walls around are painted to resemble the flames of purgatory, and the figures of those suffering its torments. The whole is executed in a coarse style, almost bordering on the grotesque; yet, situated as it is, it seldom fails to produce a solemn effect. The other churches are in possession of paintings by the old masters.

At the academy of fine arts upwards of 1,000 students receive gratuitous instruction in painting and its kindred arts. The academy is held in some of the departments of the museum, where also there is a fine collection of pictures and of casts. A public annual exhibition of the productions of the pupils is held here alternately with Brussels and Ghent; prizes are distributed; and the successful pictures are purchased by the cities to which the victors belong, to be lodged in their public collections, as rewards to the successful candidates and as excitements to others. Antwerp boasts of being the native place of Rubens and Vandyke, as also of Teniers, Snyders, and Joerdans. Opposite to the town, and near the spot whence it was bombarded by the English in 1809, the place of a new city was traced out by Bonaparte. Its site is now occupied by some forts built under the direction of the duke of Wellington.

The recent separation of the Netherlands from Holland, will doubtless have a considerable effect upon the commercial prosperity of Antwerp. During the insurrection which preceded this event, the city was bombarded by the Dutch, and a great number of its buildings burnt. The Dutch were repulsed after much hard fighting.

Anville Island, an island in the gulf of Georgia, discovered by Vancouver, and so called from its shape.

Anweiler, or Anweiler, a town in the duchy of Deux Ponts, 6 m. W. from Laudan. It was formerly a city of Austria, and the inhabitants enjoyed the singular privilege of exemption from toll dues in all parts of the empire; but in 1330 it was brought under the dominion of the counts palatine.

Anzerma, a town of New Granada in the province of Popayan, where there are mines of gold. It is seated on the Cauca, 140 m. N. N. E. of Popayan. Long. 75. 25. W. lat. 4. 53. N.

Anziko, a kingdom of Guinea, lying east of Gabon and north of Congo, but it is little known. The king is styled the Micoco, whence the country is sometimes so called. The capital is Monsi.

Aosta, or Aoust, duchy of, a province of Piedmont, bounded on the west and north by the Alps, or rather on the north by the Valais, for the mountains run from north to south into Aoust, which may be considered altogether as a mountainous district. Pop. about 65,000. The principal city of the same name, which is a bishop's see, is situate about the centre of the province, between two streams of the Baltea River, which falls into the Po, and on the great high road from the pass of St. Bernard to Turin. It contains several monuments of the Romans. Pop. 5,500.

Apalachian Mountains, the name given to the immense chain extending along the whole Atlantic coast of the U. States, from Alabama to Maine. In the Southern States they are 200 m. from the sea, but as they extend northward approach near the coast. They run generally in parallel ridges and their various divisions go by different names. These are the Cumberland mountains of Tennessee, the Blue mountains of Virginia, the Alleghany and Laurel mountains of Pennsylvania, the Catskill mountains of New York, the Green mountains of Vermont, and the White mountains of New Hampshire. They are sometimes broken into groups and isolated chains. Their highest summits are in N. Hampshire; and are between 6 and 7,000 ft. above the level of the sea. East of the Hudson they are granitic. In the W. and S. they consist of granite, gneiss, mica and clay slate, primitive limestone, &c. Their name in the language of the Indians signified endless.

Apalachicola, a river of North America, formed by the junction of the Chatahoochee and Flint, at an old Indian fort of the same name on the south confines of Georgia, and thence flows between West and East Florida into Apalachee bay, in the gulf of Mexico, east of Cape Blaise.

Apamormia, a town seated on the N. W. coast of the island of Santorin, 7 m. N. N. W. of Scauro, at the entrance of the Grecian Archipelago.

Asenrade, or Aspenrade, a sea-port of Denmark, in Sleswick, with a citadel. It is a place of considerable trade, seated at the bottom of a gulf of the Little Belt, 27 m. N. N. W. of Sleswick. Long 9. 34. E. lat. 55. 8. N.

Aphium, or Aphium-kara-hissar, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, built round a high rock, on the top of which is a fortress. It is 3 m. in circumference, and has a considerable trade. The chief manufacture is carpets; and the country around produces much opium, called aphium by the Turks. It stands on the Mindra, 150 m. E. of Smyrna. Long. 31. 10. E. lat. 38. 35. N.

Apolda, a town of Upper Saxony in Thuringia, 8 m. N. of Jena, and 40 S. W. of Leipzig.

Apennines, a chain of mountains, in Europe which begins near Oneglia, on the gulf of Genoa, passes round that gulf at no great distance from the sea, then proceeds east to the centre of Italy, and afterward divides that country in a mediate south-east direction to the extremities of the kingdom of Naples. Hence proceed all the rivers which water Italy. The Apennines are at first a branch of the Alps, but, in general they may rather be regarded as hills than as mountains.

Appenzel, a canton in the N. E. part of Switzerland, bordering on Tyrol. It is divided into 12 communities: six called the interior, are Roman Catholic, with a population of 16,000, subsisting chiefly by agriculture; and six exterior, bordering on the canton of St. Gall, are Protestant, with a population of 40,000, a great portion of which are employed by the manufacturers of the city of St. Gall.

Appenzel, the chief town of the above Canton, is situate on the bank of the river Sitter, on the interior side, and containing about 3,000 inhab.

It has an ancient castle, and is a bishop's see. An earthquake was so violent here in Feb. 1703, that 24,000 people perished, and great numbers were wounded. It is situate 35 m. W. from the Adriatic, and 92 E. of Rome. Long. 14. 20. E. lat. 42. 50. N.

Aquileia, an ancient and large city of the Carni, or Veneti, in Italy, seated near the coast at the head of the gulf of Venice. A Roman colony was settled in it, between the first and second Macedonian wars, to be a bulwark against the Huns and Goths. In 425 it was besieged by Attila with an innumerable host of barbarians. Three months were consumed without effect in the siege; till the want of provisions and the clamour of his army, compelled Attila to issue his orders that the troops should strike their tents the next morning, and begin their retreat. But as he rode round the wall, pensive, angry, and disappointed, he observed a stork preparing to leave her nest in one of the towers, and to fly, with her infant family, towards the country; this he interpreted as an omen that those towers were devoted to impending ruin and solitude. The siege was renewed and prosecuted with fresh vigour; a large breach was made in the part of the wall from whence the stork had taken her flight; the Huns mounted to the assault with irresistible fury; and the succeeding generation could scarcely discover the ruins of Aquileia.

Aquino, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, ruined by the emperor Conrad. It is the birthplace of Juvenal, and seated near the Carigliano, on the great high road from Rome to Naples, 20 m. S. by E. of Sora.

Arabat, a town and fort of the Crimea, and province of Taurida, on the borders of the sea of Asoph, 20 m. N. by E. of Caffa.

Arabia, a country of Asia, extending from the 12th to the 32nd deg. of N. lat. and from the 33rd to the 58th of W. long. being about 1,480 m. in length, 1,200 in breadth; bounded on the W. by the Red Sea, and the isthmus of Suez, N. E. by the Euphrates, which divides it from Diarbekir, E. by the gulfs of Persia and Ormus, and S. by the Indian Ocean. It is divided into three parts, Arabia Petrea, Deserta, and Felix, so named by Europeans from their supposed qualities of soil and climate. Arabia Petrea, much the smallest of the three, lies to the south of Syria along the east coast of the Red Sea. The north part is mountainous, and in general stony, sandy, and barren; but some parts yield sufficient nourishment for cattle, whose milk, and camels' flesh, is the chief food of its few inhabitants. Arabia Deserta lies south of Syria, and east of Arabia Petrea, and the Red Sea. It is for the most part desert, being intersected by barren mountains, and many of the plains nothing but great sands and heaths; but there are some plains and valleys that feed great flocks of sheep and goats; there are also great numbers of ostriches, and a fine breed of camels in several places, and the horses are the noblest of the species.

The Arabians train up their best and fleetest horses, to hunt the ostrich. Perhaps, of all varieties of the chase, this, though the most laborious, is yet the most entertaining. As soon as the hunter comes within sight of his prey, he puts on his horse with a gentle gallop, so as to keep the ostrich still in sight; yet not so as to terrify him from the plain into the mountains. Upon observing himself, therefore, pursued at a distance, the bird begins to run at first, but gently, either insensible of his danger, or sure of escaping. In this situation he somewhat resembles a man at full speed; his wings, like two arms, keep working with a motion correspondent to that of his legs; and his speed would very soon snatch him from the view of his pursuers, but, unfortunately for the silly creature, instead of going off in a direct line, he takes his course in circles; while the hunters still make a small course within, relieve each other, meet him at unexpected turns, and keep him thus still employed, still followed, for two or three days together. At last, spent with fatigue and famine, and finding all power of escape impossible, he endeavours to hide himself from those enemies he cannot avoid, and covers his head in the sand, or the first thicket he meets. Sometimes, however, he attempts to face his pursuers: and, though in general the most gentle animal in nature, when driven to desperation, he defends himself with his beak, his wings, and his feet. Such is the force of his motion, that a man would be utterly unable to withstand him in the shock. The oxen of Arabia have generally a hump on their back like those of Syria. The sheep have a thick and broad tail, which they are said to drag behind them on a carriage: their wool is coarse, and their flesh not very delicate. The wild goat is found in the mountains of Arabia Petrea. The other animals are the jackal, hyæna, many sorts of apes, the jerboa or rat of Pharaoh, antelopes, wild oxen, wolves, foxes, wild boars and the great and little panther. The caracal or syagosh is a sort of lynx, and is probably the lynx of the ancients. It follows the lion and lives upon the remains of that animal's meals. It is somewhat larger than a fox, and much fiercer and stronger. It climbs with astonishing agility to the tops of the tallest trees in pursuit of hares, rabbits and birds. Arabia Felix, so called on account of its fertility with regard to the rest, lies to the south of Arabia Deserts, between the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean. It is by far the most considerable part, and though the centre is occupied by very dry deserts, there are many rich provinces on the coasts, producing a variety of fruits, honey, wax, cinnamon, cassia, manna, spikenard, frankincense, myrrh, and coffee, of which latter great quantities are exported from Moka. The Arabs are of a middle stature and brown complexion, and have always a grave and melancholy air. They derive their subsistence from their flocks, from hunting, and from what they acquire by plunder of the caravans which pass from Aleppo to Bassora, and from Bassora to Mecca. They acknowledge no sovereign but the emirs of their tribes, who are their natural princes, and to whom they pay obedience. They have also sheiks, or chiefs of an advanced age, whom they often consult, and whose advice they follow. The dress of the Arabs consists of a white robe, bound round with a broad leather girdle, fastened by a strong buckle or large clasp. Their drawers are made of linen, and descend to the lower part of the leg. They wear a kind of red cap on the head; and sometimes they wear slippers, after the manner of the Turks, but are generally in half boots that they may be ready to get on horseback. Winter and summer they wear a large cloak, striped black and white, made of the hair of goats or some other animal. Their emirs dress in the same manner, except that their cloaks are for the most part all black. The Arabs in the deserts live in tents, and remove from place to place, partly for the sake of pasture, and partly to lie in wait for the caravans. The famous Mahomet was a native of this country; and his followers, soon after his death, conquered a great part of Asia, Africa, and Europe, establishing their religion wherever they came. The interior of this vast territory is very little known, but it seems nearly destitute of water, as but very few rivers are found round its coast for near 2,500 miles. Medina, Mecca, and Moka, all on the coast of the Red Sea, are the chief towns.

Aracan, or Reccan, a maritime and fertile country of Asia, on the east coast of the bay of Bengal, bounded on the east by Birmah. The rainy season continues from April to October, and the rest of the year is called summer. The inhabitants are idolaters. The women are tolerably fair, but the longest ears are reckoned the most beautiful, and in these they wear many rings. They are a dastardly race of people, and have only courage to attack defenceless merchants and boatmen. There are such numbers of elephants, buffaloes, and tigers, that but few places are inhabited, on account of the ravages made by these animals. The chief productions of commerce, are salt, elephants' teeth, bees' wax, and rice; but its trade was never very considerable. Aracan was long an independent nation, governed by a king; but it was subdued by the Birmans in 1783, and is now a province of that empire.

Aracan, the capital of the country of the same name, with an extensive fort. It is situate at the head of an inlet of the sea, which forms one of the finest and most capacious harbours for shipping in the world. The river Aracan runs through the city, and waters the streets by means of several arms or canals, into which it is divided. The inhabitants are about 100,000. It was taken by the Birmans in 1783. It is 260 m. S. S. E. of Islamabad, and 230 W. S. W. of Ava. Long. 93. 10. E. lat. 20. 38. N.

Arad, an interior county of Upper Hungary, population about 155,000. There are two towns of the same name, the Old, which is the capital of the county, on the north, and the New town on the south side of the Marosch river. The old town is a great mart for cattle, and is about 24 m. N. N. E. of Temeswar.

Arafat, or Gebel Orphat, a mountain of Arabia, about 150 ft. in height, 15 m. S. E. of Mecca. Its name implies the Mountain of Knowledge, and as such is an object of adoration with the devotees of Mahomet; in 1807, upward of 80,000 pilgrims, including 45,000 mounted Wahabees, were assembled about it.

Araguaya, a river of South America, which rises in the lat. of about 19. S. near to the Parana, which runs from north to south, whilst the Araguaya runs through the heart of Brazil from south to north, to the lat. of about 7. S. where it is joined by the Tocantins, and about 5 deg. further it diverges into two branches, one falling into the Amazon, and the other forming a separate channel into the Atlantic, called Para, in the lat. of 0. 20. S. and 48. 20. W. long.

Aral, a lake of Independent Tartary, 120 miles east of the Caspian Sea. It is 200 miles in length, and in some places 70 in breadth, intersected by the lines of 45. N. lat. and 60. W. long. The water is salt, and there are many small saline lakes in the vicinity, but it has no visible communication with the sea.

Aranjuez, a town of Spain, in New Castile, with broad streets intersecting each other at right angles. The great square is surrounded by porticoes, and has a fountain that supplies the town with water. Here are three churches, and a theatre for bull-fights; but the glory of Aranjuez is the royal palace and gardens, situate on an island formed by the Tagus, the Xarama, and a canal. This palace justly ranks among the finest and most agreeable residences in Europe; it was in it the supreme junta of government of the kingdom, on the declaration in favour of Ferdinand VII. were installed, and held their first meeting, Sept. 25th, 1808. Aranjuez is seated on the Tajo, 20 m. S. of Madrid.

Ararat, a mountain of Armenia, distinguished in Mosaic history. See Gen. viii. 4. Its height is about 9,500 ft. above the level of the sea.

Ararat, a mountain in N. Carolina, 10 m from Bethany in Stokes Co.

Arassi, a maritime town of the territory of Genoa, 5 m. S. W. of Albenga.

Arau, a town of Switzerland, capital of the department of Lower Argo, canton of Berne, with manufactures of cotton, printed linen, and cutlery. A treaty between the protestant and catholic cantons was concluded here in 1712. It is seated on the river Aar, 27 m. W. of Zurich.

Arauco, a district extending from the 42nd to the 37th deg. of S. lat. on the shore of the Pacific Ocean, bounded on the E. by the Andes, and is considered as belonging to Chile, but it is inhabited almost exclusively by natives, who have not only successfully resisted every attempt of the Spaniards to become masters of the country, but frequently made incursions into their territory. The district contains both gold and silver, is watered by several streams, is very fertile, and the climate is delightful. The Spaniards constructed a fort about 40 m. S. of Concepcion, (named after the district) as a defence against the incursions of the Araucans.

Arazes, or Aras, a river of Asia, which rises in Georgia, flows S. E. across Armenia, and joins the Kur, near its entrance into the Caspian Sea. It is a very rapid river, and is supposed to be the Gihon mentioned by Moses.

Arbe, an island 30 m. in circumference, on the coast of Dalmatia, from which it is 5 m. distant. The soil is rich, but the inhabitants are indolent. It has a town of the same name. Long. 14. 55. E. lat. 45. 5. N.

Arberg, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Berne, on an island formed by two branches of the Aar. It is 10 miles W. by N. of Berne.

Arbel, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Curdistan, ancient Arbela, near which Alexander defeated Darius. Here are the remains of an ancient castle, and in the vicinity are naphtha pits. It is seated in an extensive plain 36 m. N. of Altunkupri, and 50 E. of Mosul.

Arbela, p.v. Lancaster Co. Pa. 45 m. E. Harrisburg.

Arbois, a town of France, in the department of Jura, famous for its white wines. It is 22 m. S. W. of Besançon.

Arboga, a town of Sweden, Westmanland, seated on the Ulvison, by which river, and a canal, it has a communication with the lakes Hielmar and Maclar. It is 25 m. E. N. E. of Örebro.

Arbon, a town of Switzerland, situate on a point of land jutting into the lake of Constance, 12 m. S. E. of Constance.

Arbroath. See Aberbrothwick.

Arburg, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Berne, with a citadel on a rock, seated on the Aar, opposite Olten, 12 m. E. of Soleure.

Arcadia, a division of Modern Greece, in the central part of the Morea.

Arcadia, a town on the west coast of the Morea, near the gulf of its name, W. of the above district, 22 m. north of Navarino. Long. 21. 42. E. lat. 37. 24. N.

Archangel, a large province of Russia, bounded on the north by the Arctic Ocean. It is divided into eight circles: viz. Archangel, Chencourisk, Cholmegar, Kem, Kola, Meson, Onega, and Senega. It is a very dreary district, especially the eastern part; it supplies some fir timber and deals, and contains many wild animals, which are slaughtered for their fat; and tallow and bristles form great articles of export.

Archangel, or St. Michael, the chief town of the above province, is situate on the east bank of the Dwina River, a short distance above its entrance into a bay of the White Sea, in N. lat. 64. 34. E. long. 38. 59. It was for many years the principal sea-port of Russia, and was first resorted to by the English in 1553, and although greatly declined in importance since the building of St. Petersburg, it still exports considerable quantities of tallow, deals, and some bristles; but as it is only attained by the dreary coast of Norway, and the North Cape, in lat. 71. 10., it is accessible only a few months in the year, in July, August, and September, during which short period it is resorted to by 60 or 70 sail of vessels annually, principally English. It was nearly destroyed by fire in 1793, but has since been rebuilt with neatness, principally of wood, the severity of the winter being counteracted by stoves. Pop. about 7,000, who have about a dozen churches, one Lutheran, one Calvinist, and the others Greek. Archangel is about 400 m. N. E. of St. Petersburg.

Archer, t. Harrison Co. Ohio.

Archipelago, is a term applied to a cluster or group of islands, hence the Grecian, Eastern, Northern, &c. &c.; but the most celebrated group is the Grecian, at the head of the Mediterranean sea, having Romania on the north, Natolia on the east, the isle of Candia on the south, Macedonia, Livadia, and the Morea on the west. It is partly in Europe, and partly in Asia, containing the islands of Rhodes, Negropont, Lemnos, Tenedos, Scyros, Mytilene, Scio, Samos, Patmos, Paros, Antiparos, Cerigo, Santorini, Andros, Tina, Naxia, Milo, Delos, Argentiera, and many others.

Archipelago, Northern, a part of the Pacific Ocean, having the peninsula of Kamtschatka on the west, and the coast of America on the east. It includes a number of islands, among which are four principal groups. The first, called Sasignan, contains five islands; the second, called Khoo, includes eight islands; and both these groups together are styled the Aleutian Islands. The third group is called the Anpreoffski Ostrova, and comprises 16 islands. The fourth group is the Lissie Ostrova or the Fox Islands, 16 in number. They all belong to Russia, and are valuable chiefly for the skins of animals found there, particularly the sea-otter. See Fox Islands.

Arcis-sur-Aube, a town of France, in the department of Aube, seated on the river Aube, 15 m. north of Troyes.

Arco, a town and castle of Germany, in Tyrol, taken by the French in 1703, and abandoned soon after. It stands on the Sarca, near the head of the lake Garda, and 15 m. W. S. W. of Trent.

Arcas, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, seated on a craggy rock, on the river Guadalete, 28 m. N. E. of Cadiz. It is the residence of the vicar general of the metropolitan church of Seville. There are several other towns of the same name in Spain and Portugal.

Arcot, a city of Hindoostan, capital of the Carnatic, which became subject to the English East India Company in 1801. The citadel is large, and esteemed a place of some strength; but the nabob often resides at Madras. In the vicinity are several celebrated temples, visited by numerous pilgrims. Arcot has a manufacture of coarse cotton cloth. It is seated on the south bank of the Paliar, 66 m. W. by S. of Madras, and 180 E. by N. of Seringapatam. Long. 79. 24. E. lat. 12. 51. N.

Ardagh, the name of a barony in the county of Longford, Ireland, containing 9 parishes, and the towns of Longford and Edgworthstown; a parish of the same name, in 1822, contained a population of 4,962, and which, united with Kilmore gives name to a bishopric, but there is neither cathedral nor episcopal residence in Ardagh. There are four other parishes of the same name in different parts of Ireland: viz. 1st in Meath, pop. 1,074; 2nd in Cork, pop. 2,344; 3rd in Limerick, pop. 1,550; and 4th in Mayo, pop. 1,556. There are 40 other parishes in different parts of Ireland beginning with Arđ.

Ardebil, a town of Persia, in Aderbeitzan, the residence and burial-place of many kings, particularly of Sheik Sessi, the founder of the Persian sect. Pilgrims resort to this place from all parts of Persia; and caravans are frequently passing to and from Constantinople and Smyrna. It is 35 m. E. S. E. of Tauris. Long. 47. 10. E. lat. 38. 20. N.

Ardeche, a department of France, including the late territory of Vivarez. It takes its name from a river, which flows into the Rhone, at the south extremity of the department. Privas is the capital. Pop. about 285,000.

Ardee, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Louth. Here is a large mount, apparently artificial: some suppose it to have been a burial place of the Irish kings; others, that it was a place where the people assembled to deliberate on public affairs. It is 14 m. N. W. of Drogheda. Pop. of the town 3,588, and the parish 1,773 more.

Ardennes, a department of France, containing part of the late province of Champagne. It is so named from a famous forest, lying on the river Meuse. The principal town is Sedan. Pop. about 350,000.

Ardfert, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, and a bishop's see united with Aghadoc to Limerick. It was formerly the capital of the county, but is now a poor place, with extensive ruins. It is seated on a river which runs into Tralee bay, 7 m. N. N. W. of Tralee. Pop. of the town 629; of the commons 263; and of the whole parish 2,481.

Ardmore, a town of Ireland, in the county of Waterford, on a cape and bay of its name, 10 m. S. S. W. of Dungarvon. Pop. of the town 403, and of the parish 2,761.

Ardra, a small kingdom of Guinea, on the Slave coast, at the bottom of the gulf of St. Thomas. The country is fertile in maize, palm wine, plants and fruits, which last all the year; and it produces a great deal of salt. It has a town of the same name. Long. 3. 5. E. lat. 6. 0. N.

Ardres, a town of France, in the department of Pas de Calais. On an open plain between the town and Guisnes, was the celebrated interview between Francis I. of France, and Henry VIII. of England, in 1520. It is 10 m. S. S. E. of Calais.

Arree, an island in the gulf of Persia, 3 m. S. W. of Ormus. The Dutch attempted to establish a factory, and built a fort here, but were expelled by the Persians.

Arakea, a sea-port of Abyssinia.

Arensberg, the capital of a county of the same name, in the duchy of Westphalia. It is seated on a hill, by the river Roer, 22 m. S. S. E. of Ham, and 63 N. E. of Cologne. Long. 8. 10. E. lat. 51. 23. N.

Arensburg, a sea-port of Russia, in the government of Riga, capital of the isle of Osel, and a bishop's see. Long. 25. 40. E. lat. 58. 15. N.

Arensharde, a district in Denmark, in the duchy of Sleswick, containing the greatest part of the famous rampart built by king Gotric, in the beginning of the 9th century, as a defence against the irruptions of the Saxons. It extends across the country, about 9 m. in length.

Arequipa, an episcopal town of Peru, founded by Pizarro, in 1539. Near it is a volcano. It has been four times laid in ruins by earthquakes. It stands in a fertile country, a few miles south of a small lake, which is the source of the Apurimac branch of the Amazon River; 240 m. S. of Cuzco, and 460 S. E. of Lima. Long. 72. 30. W. lat. 16. 40. S.

Arezzo, a town of Tuscany, in the Fiorentino. Guy Aretin, a Benedictine monk, inventor of the musical notes, ut, re, &c. was born here; also the celebrated Francis Petrarch, and Mecenas. It stands on a hill, at the conflux of the Chianno and Arno, 15 m. west of Citta di Castello.

Argau, or Lower Argow, a canton of Switzerland, formerly the north part of the canton of Berne, lying to the west of that of Zurich. Arau is the capital.

Argences, a town of France, in the department of Calvados, on the river Menace, 10 m. E. of Caen.

Argentan, a town of France, in the department of Orne, which has a considerable trade in lace. It is seated on an eminence, in the middle of a fertile plain, on the banks of the Orne, 12 m. N. W. of Sees, and 110 W. of Paris.

Argenteuil, a town of France, on the river Seine, 5 m. N. W. of Paris. It has a fine vineyard, and in the environs are quarries of the plaster of Paris.

Argentiera, a barren island of the Archipelago, so called from the silver mines in it. There is but one village, and it has no water but what is kept in cisterns. Long. 23. 10. E. lat. 36. 50. N.

Argenton, a town of France, in the department of Indre, divided into two parts by the river Creuse. It is 37 m. S. W. of Bourges.

Argolis, one of the divisions of Modern Greece in the eastern part of the Morea or Peloponnesus, established since the recent independence of that country.

Argos, a seaport of Modern Greece, in the preceding district, 25 m. S. of Corinth. Long. 23. 5. E. lat. 37. 30. N.

Argostoli, a town of the island of Cefalonia, with a fortress and the best harbour in the island. It is 8 m. W. S. W. of Cefalonia.

Argueil, a town of France, in the department of Lower Seine, 18 m. N. E. of Rouen.

Arguin, an island and fort on the coast of Zahara, 30 m. S. E. of Cape Blanco. It was taken by the Dutch from the Portuguese, in 1637; afterward the French took it from the Dutch. Long. 17. 5. W. lat. 20. 30. N.

Argun, a river of Asia. See Saghalien.

Argunskoi, a town of Siberia, on the frontiers of Chinese Tartary. There are mines of silver and lead near it, and a pearl fishery in the river Argun, on the west bank of which the town is situate. It is 70 m. S. E. of Nerchinsk. Long. 118. E. lat. 52. 30. N.

Argyle, t. Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 326.

Argyle, p.t. Washington Co. N. Y. 46 m. N. Albany. Pop. 3,459.

Argyleshire, a county of Scotland, bounded on the north by Invernesshire, east by the counties of Perth and Dumbarton, and south and west by the Atlantic ocean, by which it is broken into islands and peninsulas. It is 110 miles long from the Mull of Cantyre to its N. E. extremity; its breadth is very unequal, about 40 miles where greatest. To the N. W. is a peninsula, nearly detached from the rest of the county: it contains the districts of Ardnamureham, Morven, Sunart, and Ardgowar. The peninsulas of Cantyre and Cowal are likewise very large. The chief islands, attached to this county, are Mull, Islay, Jura, Tirey, and Col. The soil of Argyleshire, in the high grounds, though little fitted for cultivation, affords excellent pasture. Some parts are covered with heath, and others exhibit rugged and bare rocks. The sides of the hills and lakes are interspersed with woods; and there are rich mines of copper, iron, and lead. The mountainous parts abound with deer and the heaths with grouse. The chief town is Inverary.

Arica, a seaport at the south extremity of Peru. It is but badly fortified, and has been much injured by earthquakes. Here the treasure brought from Potosi is shipped; and there are many farms employed in the cultivation of Guinea pepper, in which it has a great trade. It is 550 m. S. E. of Lima. Long. 70. 25. W. lat. 18. 27. S.

Arienzo, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, 14 m. N. E. of Naples.

Arindal, a town of Norway in the government of Bergen, noted for the productive iron mines in its vicinity. It is seated near the sea, 10 m. N. E. of Christiansand.

Arisch, or El Arisch, a town and fort of Egypt, on a gulf of the Mediterranean, to which it gives name. The French became masters of it in 1799; but it was retaken by the Turks and English at the end of the year. In 1800, the Turks and French signed a convention here, by which the troops of the latter were to evacuate Egypt; but the English admiral refused to ratify the capitulation. Arisch stands on the confines of Arabia and Palestine, 36 m. S. W. of Gaza, and 120 N. E. of Suez, in N. lat. 31. 8. E. long. 34. 3.

Arispe, the chief town of the extensive district of Sonora, Mexico. Arispe is situate at the foot of the Cordilleras, near the source of the Hia, or Yaqui river, in the lat. of about 31. N. and 109. W. long.

Arkansas, a territory of the U. S. formed from a part of the Missouri territory in 1819. It lies between 33. and 36. 30. of N. lat. and between 90. and 100. W. long. Bounded N. by the state of Missouri, E. by the river Mississippi, separating it from Tennessee and Mississippi, S. by Louisiana, and W. by the Mexican and Missouri territories. Containing above 500,000 sq. m., and a population of 30,383, of which 4,578 are slaves. The limits of this region are strongly defined by physical and geographical lines. These lines are for the most part large rivers and the ocean of prairies beyond. The chief rivers are the Mississippi, Arkansas, White, Washita and Red rivers. The western part is traversed by the Ozark and Masserne Mountains.

For some distance up the waters of Arkansas and White rivers, the country is an extensive, heavily timbered and deeply inundated swamp. Near the St. Francis hills and at Point Chico, the eastern front along the Mississippi is above the overflow. The remainder of the eastern line is a continued and monotonous flooded forest. It has large and level prairie plains. It possesses a great extent of rocky and sterile ridges, and no inconsiderable surface covered with mountains. Perhaps no section of our country is more diversified, in regard to its surface. Its northern line is intersected by a range of hills, which are commonly denominated the 'black mountains,' a line of elevations running from Black river to the western extremity of the territory, and separating between the waters of White river and Arkansas.—

There are ranges of hills, that have the name of mountains, which separate the waters of Arkansas from those of Washita. Near the Hot springs, these ridges mount up into elevated peaks, which in the eye of a visitor at the springs, from the level country of Louisiana, have the aspect of lofty mountains. At the south-western extremity of the territory, there are three parallel ranges of hills, that divide the waters of Red river from those of Washita. There are, also, many detached hills, and flint knobs. On some of these is found the whortleberry 'vaccinium' of the north, in great perfection and abundance. These hills exhibit red cedars and savins, such as grow on hills of a similar appearance on the Atlantic shore. In the central parts of the territory, and intermediate between Arkansas and Washita rivers, on the waters of the latter is that singular detached elevation, called 'Mount Frairie.' On the waters of White river and St. Francis, the country generally is rolling. But, take the extent of the territory together, it is either very level or very hilly. In some places, the hills rise at once from level prairies and plains. A very considerable portion of the country is broken land, and unfit for cultivation. A great part of the 'barrens' of this state are what their name imports. There are four considerable detached bodies of good upland. But it may be assumed as a general fact, that the high prairies and timbered lands are sterile. That part of the course of the Washita, which runs in this territory, has narrow, though in some places rich bottoms. Here are cane brakes, birch, maple, holly, and muscadine grape vines. The tender soil on the banks is often torn away by the sweeping and rapid course of the full river. Rugged hills, covered with stunted pines and cedars come in close to the river; and the valley is so deep, and its boundaries so abrupt, that the sun is seen but a few hours in a day.

There is a large tract of country, on the upper waters of White river, which has sometimes been denominated New Kentucky, either from its being fertile, rolling, and abundant in lime stone springs; or from its being more congenial to the staple products of Kentucky, than the country lower down. It is sheltered on the north by mountains. The fertile tracts are valleys embosomed between high hills; and the productions of the north and the south for the most part succeed in this soil. It has one great inconvenience. The streams, that run among its precipitous hills, receive the waters of the powerful showers that occasionally fall, and pour these waters from an hundred shelving declivities into the streams. They have been known to rise forty feet in perpendicular height, in a few hours. The standing corn and cotton is submerged; and the hope of the year destroyed.

Arkansas is the northern limit of the cotton growing country. The rich lands on the Arkansas produce cotton of the same staple and luxuriance as those of Red river; but, having a season some what shorter, it cannot ripen so well. Nevertheless, the planters here assert, that even here they can raise more, that their hands can 'pick out,' as the phrase is; consequently they affirm, that they lose nothing by the shortness of their season. Cotton becomes an uncertain crop north of the river St. Francis. As we ascend the Arkansas towards the high table prairies, the temperature diminishes more rapidly, than would be indicated by the latitude; and cotton ceases to be a sure crop a little beyond 34. in that direction. It is at present the staple article of cultivation. The rich lands bring fine maize, sweet potatoes, and the vegetables generally of Mississippi and Louisiana. In the high country above 34, wheat does well. Rye and barley will thrive almost in any parts of the country. Mulberry abounds; and on the bases of the precipitous hills of White river, we should suppose, would be the happiest soil and climate for the vine. Muscadine, and pine wood's grapes abound; as do pawpaws and persimmons. Figs are raised, but with difficulty; and the tree is often killed to the ground by the frost. Peaches are raised in great excellence and abundance. Apple orchards do well at Mount Prairie, and in the open and high lands above Peccan Point on Red river; and no doubt, will thrive in all the higher and more northern regions of this territory. In the lower and more settled parts of it they have no where succeeded well. Chickasaw and prairie plums grow wild in abundance, and the woods and prairies abound in native fruits and berries.

The soil is of all qualities from the best to the most sterile. The settlement of Point Chico, on the Mississippi, has a soil of the best quality; and is noted for the productiveness of its cotton plantations. The bottoms of the Arkansas are not generally so rich, as those of Red river.—The belt of cultivated land below the Post of Arkansas, called 'the coast,' does, indeed, somewhat resemble the delightful country so called above New Orleans in appearance. The resemblance ceases here. It has a soil of but moderate richness; and needs manuring to produce large cotton, or maize. To one emerging from the inundated and mephitic swamps below, this line of open, contiguous plantations, dotted with beautiful clumps of the fine trees of this climate, and French habitations, which generally have a very picturesque appearance, this tract, called 'the coast,' has a charming appearance. There is a great extent of cotton lands of the first quality, in the country along the river, above the Post, in the 'Quawpaw purchase.' The country, five or six hundred miles up the Arkansas, where the American garrison used to be, and that, where it now is, and the country where the Arkansas mission is settled, have large prairies interspersed with forest bottoms, and great tracts of excellent soil. There is much fine country in this territory above Peccan Point on Red river. Mount Prairie, which rises, like a prodigious Indian mound, from the subjacent plains, may be reckoned among the striking spectacles of the country. It is ten or twelve miles in diameter; and is situated on the waters of the Washita. It has a soil of great fertility, and of the blackness of ink; rather exposed, however, to 'bake,' as the phrase is, in the hot and dry weather. They obtain water from wells, which are obliged to be dug of very great depth.—In the whole depth vast quantities of sea-shells appear.—In a state of pulverization they are mixed with the earth, communicating a mawkish and unpleasant taste to the water, and very great fertility to the soil. On White river are some of the finest lands and the healthiest sites for planters in this country. In short this territory possesses great bodies of the best soil. There are vast tracts, too, of precipitous knobs, sterile ridges, sandy, or muddy prairies, and miserable barrens. The country on the Mississippi, between White river and the St. Francis, is in many places above the overflow, and of the highest fertility. Wapanocka bottom, opposite Memphis, is an uncommonly high, rich and extensive bottom. The soil on the St. Francis is very fertile; and is covered with a heavy growth of beech, generally denoting a rich soil; but the hills are so precipitous, and exposed to wash, as hardly to be susceptible of cultivation. On the whole, this territory has a sufficiency of excellent lands, to become a rich and populous state.—In its eastern front, and near the Mississippi and the Arkansas, it is exposed to excessive annoyance from its myriads of mosquitoes.

This climate is a compound of that of Missouri and Louisiana. Until we advance 200 miles west of the Mississippi, in its humidity it more nearly resembles the latter. The season, in point of the forwardness of vegetation in the spring, is also, much more like that of Louisiana. The season of planting is three weeks later than on the coast above New Orleans; and is more than that in advance of the climate of Missouri.—The distribution of rain is extremely unequal. There are often drenching rains and thunder every day, for thirty-six days in succession. At other times, the weather is as remarkable, for long droughts. Planting of corn commences by the middle of March, and cotton by the first of April. By this time the forests of the Arkansas are in full leaf; and the shores of no river show a deeper tangle of vines near the soil, and of nobler forest trees above.

The shores of Arkansas, as far up as Little Rock, are decidedly unhealthy. Great tracts on all sides are covered with sleeping lakes and stagnant bays. The country is a dead level. The falling waters of the rains cannot be drained off. In the commencement of summer they are exposed to the intense ardors of the sun. Sickness is the natural result. On the vast prairie, which commences just above the Post, and extends ninety miles up the country, it is more healthy; and there is less annoyance from the mosquitoes. This long sweep of country is thoroughly ventilated. But the air, in the timbered bottoms, is close, and unelastic; and the mosquitoes are excessively troublesome. There is but too often an abundant visitation of bilious and remittent fevers in the latter part of summer and the first of autumn. Farther up the country and on the open prairies, it is as healthy as in any other country in the same climate. It is a very absurd idea, that a country of the extensiveness of this should all be alike sickly. In this territory there are many positions, but a few miles apart, one of which may be as sickly as the shores of Surinam, and the other as healthy, as any country in America.

Among the curiosities of this region may be mentioned the vast masses of sea shells, that are found dispersed over different tracts of the country. They are generally found in points remote from limestone; and answer a valuable purpose to the inhabitants, who collect, and burn them for lime. Far above the political limits of the territory, and towards the sources of the Arkansas, is the sublime elevation, which we hope will always retain the name of Pike's mountain. The prairies are bounded in that direction by the stupendous ridges of the Rocky mountains. There are very considerable mountains near the Hot Springs, which see.

The Quawpaw Indians intermixed with many fugitive Choctaws, reside on the Arkansas not far above the Post. That portion of the Cherokee nation, which has emigrated west of the Mississippi, has its chief settlements on the Arkansas. Beyond this territory (a White river are congregated the Shawnees and Delawares, that have emigrated from Ohio and Missouri. Above the Cherokees, on the Arkansas, are the Osages; and still higher are the Pawnees. In the vast waste of prairies, that interpose between this territory and the Rocky mountains, roam different tribes of Indians, among which are often seen, Indians from the Mexican country, who come here to hunt the bison. These animals with deer, elk, bears, and wolves are abundant in this region. Herds of wild horses are seen ranging the prairies and forests of the western parts. They are rather small in size but very fleet and hardy. They are caught with the noose or entrapped into pens, and when taken may be broke to the saddle or harness.

There are no large towns in this territory and the settlements are scattered about in isolated and detached situations, generally with great tracts of wild country between them. Little Rock, on the south bank of the Arkansas, is the seat of government.

Arkansas, a great river running into the Mississippi, from the West, through the centre of the Territory of Arkansas.

The extent of this mighty stream, which is said to meander a long distance in the Rocky mountains, is commonly given at 2,500 m. This is probably an extravagant calculation. It is believed, that its distance from the point, where it has a volume of waters to entitle it to the name of river, to its entrance into the Mississippi, measuring its curves, is about 2,000 miles. In summer it pours a broad and deep stream from the mountains upon the arid, bare, and sandy plains. The sand and the dry surrounding atmosphere so drink up the water, that in the dry season it may be crossed, many hundred miles below the mountains, without wading as high as the knees. The tributary streams are far from being so well known, as to render them susceptible of an accurate description. Some of them are remarkable for being impregnated with salt to such a degree, that we have tasted the waters of the main river so salt, as to be unpotable. The whole alluvial earth along the banks is so strongly impregnated with salt, that the cattle sometimes kill themselves by eating it. For a distance of many hundred miles from its mouth, it receives no tributaries of any considerable length, owing to the configuration of the country through which it passes, and to the vicinity of Red river and Washita on one side, and the Yellow Stone, Kansas, and Osage on the other. When it has arrived within four hundred miles of the Mississippi, it begins to assume the character of Red river, in the numbers of its bayous and lakes. The belt of high land, between the river and the cypress swamps, is by no means so wide, as that on the other river. The alluvial soil is of the same colour and qualities, though it is not generally so fertile. It has a broader channel, and generally a narrower valley. We believe, that it does not carry so much water; and the rapidity of its ordinary current is less. When it is full, its waters have a still deeper colour. Its curves, that is to say, its points and bends are broader and deeper. It surpasses the Mississippi, or any river of the west in the perfect regularity of these, and in the uniformity and beauty of the young cotton wood groves, that spring up on the convex sand bars. In other respects, it has a surprising resemblance to Red river. The Arkansas has decidedly the advantage in the extent of its navigation. In the spring floods, steam-boats can ascend it nearly to the mountains. The first thirty or forty miles of its course, is through a heavy, inundated forest, with very little land sufficiently above the floods, to admit of cultivation. Forty or fifty miles by the course of the river above the Post, bluffs, crowned with pine, come into the river. Between that distance and the Post, only a narrow belt along the river is above the overflow; and even through this belt the river has torn great numbers of crevasses, through which in high floods its waters escape into the swamps. Directly beyond these belts are gum trees, and other vegetation denoting swampy soil. Beyond these are vast cypress swamps; and in all its course from the bluffs to the mouth, like Red river, it has its net-work chequering of bayous and lakes. The lakes, on the subsidence of the river, are covered with vast leaves of the Nymphaea Nelumbo. The bayous, when filled with the river waters, have the same curves as the river: and while the river is full, the same colour; and, until we observe their want of current, might easily be, as they have a thousand times been, mistaken for the river itself.

Arklow, a barony containing 13 parishes, and the towns of Arklow, and part of Wicklow, in the county of Wicklow, Ireland. The town of Arklow is situate on the shore of St. George's channel, about 13 m. S. of Wicklow, and contained a population of 3,808 in 1821, and the parish 2,418 more.

Arles, an ancient city of France, in the department of Mouths of the Rhone, lately an archiepiscopal see. It was the chief city of ancient Gaul during the reign of Constantine, and Boson made it the capital of the kingdom of Burgundy. The country around produces good wine, vermillion, manna, oil, and fruits. There are a great number of antiquities, of which the amphitheatre and obelisk are the most remarkable. It is seated on the Rhone, 20 m. S. E. of Nismes. Long. 5. 37. E. lat. 43. 40. N.

Arlington, p.t. Bennington Co. Vt. 40 m. from Troy, Saratoga Springs, Whitehall and Rutland Pop. 1,207. It has quarries of marble and lime stone, and a mineral spring.

Armagh, an interior county in the N. E. part of Ireland, 32 m. long and 19 broad; bounded on the E. by Down, W. by Tyrone and Monaghan, N. by Lough Neagh and S. by Louth. It contains 20 parishes, and sends three members to parliament. The soil is reckoned the richest in Ireland; but a tract called the Fewes is hilly and barren, and there are also some considerable bogs. Some good marble is found in this country; and the linen manufacture flourishes in all its branches. It has no river of consequence but the Blackwater, which separates it from Tyrone.

Armagh, a populous parish and city of Ireland, the capital of the county of its name, and the see of an archbishop, who is primate of all Ireland. It has one of the best linen markets in Ulster, and many bleaching grounds in its vicinity. It is seated near the river Kalin, 45 m. S. E. of Londonderry, and 62. N. by W. of Dublin. Long. 7. 6. W. lat. 54. 20. N. Pop. of the city in 1821, 8,493, and the parish 22,650 more.

Armagh, p.v. Indiana Co. Pa. 160 m. W. Harrisburg.

Armagnac, a late province of France, in Guisenne, 55 m. long and 40 broad. It is fertile in corn and wine, and has a trade in brandy and wool. This province, with Gascony, now forms the department of Gers.

Armenia, a country of Asiatic Turkey, bordering on the S. E. extremity of the Black Sea, and extending eastward into Persia; it lies between the 38th and 45th deg. of E. long. and under the 39th and 40th of N. lat. The Euphrates, which has its source at the S. E. extremity of the country, runs parallel with its southern boundary; it is watered by several other rivers falling into the Black Sea, and the Karai which rises in the centre of the country runs eastward falling into the Caspian. It is a mountainous country (Ararat rising to the height of 9,500 ft.) and abounds in minerals, whilst the valleys yield abundance of corn and fruit. The inhabitants are much addicted to commerce and have a high reputation for probity, they are the chief merchants for the eastern commerce of Turkey, as the Greeks are for the western. The Armenians form a distinct sect of Christians under a patriarch and an archbishop. Erzerum, or Arz Roum, m N. lat. 40. and 40. 50. E. long. is the capital. Of the civil, judicial, or military institutions, or extent of population of Armenia, but very little is known to Europeans; the Persians claim authority over the eastern part, and the Kurds interfere from the south.

Armentiers, a town of France, in the department of Nord, seated on the Lis, 8 m. W. N. W. of Lisle.

Armiers, a town of France, in the department of Nord, seated on the Sambre, 20 m. S. of Mons.

Armiro, a town of European Turkey, in Thessaly, on the gulf of Volo, 30 m. S. E. of Lariassa. Long. 23. 22. E., lat. 39. 30. N.

Armond, St. a town of Lower Canada, at the N. end of Lake Champlain.

Armstrong, a County in the western part of Pennsylvania. Pop. 17,625. Kittaning, 214 m. W. by N. of Harrisburg, is the chief town. The Alleghany river enters the county at the N. W. extremity, runs in an angle to the centre, and leaves it at the S. W. extremity. Kittaning is situate on the east bank, near the centre of the county.

Arquata, a town of the territory of Genoa, seated on the Scrivia, 25 m. N. of Genoa.

Arques, a town of France, in the department of Lower Seine, with an ancient castle. Here Henry IV. gained a complete victory over the duke of Mayenne, general of the leagues, in 1589. It stands on a river of its name, 4 m. S. E. of Dieppe.

Aragon, a province of the kingdom of Spain. Arragon was formerly an independent kingdom and comprehended Arragon Proper, Catalonia, Valencia, and the Balearic isles of Majorca, Minorca, Ivica, Cabrera, and Formentera. The kingdom of Arragon Proper is an interior district, extending south from New Castile in the lat. of 40.

N. in a N. E. direction to the Pyrenees, bounded on the N. W. by Old Castile and Navarre; and on the east by the north end of Valencia, and Catalonia; its superficies is about 1,230 sq. French leagues, and its population in 1810 was about 680,000. The river Ebro enters the territory from the N. W. and runs through the middle of it in a S. E. direction. Saragossa seated on the banks of the Ebro, is the chief and only place of importance in the whole territory, nor is it remarkable for any natural productions; whilst the domination of the priestcraft, which pervades all Spain, operates as a barrier to all social enterprise and improvement.

Arrah, or Arraba, a river on the east side of the province of Mekhran, Persia. There is a town of the same name on the coast about 60 m. west of the river, in lat. 25. 30. N. 65. E. long.

Arrah, a town of Hindoostan, in Bahar, 33 m. W. by S. of Patna.

Arran, an island of Scotland, in the frith of Clyde, to the south of the isle of Bute. It is of an oval form, 20 m. long and 12 broad, and constitutes the greatest part of the county of Bute. Ridges of rugged mountains extend across the island, and Goatfell is near 3,000 ft. in height. The southern parts present low and cultivated grounds. The climate is healthful, and invalids resort hither to drink the whey of goats milk. Robert Bruce took refuge in this island, during the time of his greatest distress. Among the rocks are found iron-ore, spar, and a great variety of beautiful pebbles. On the coast are many wonderful caverns, which often afford shelter to smugglers. It is divided into two parishes, Kilbride, and Kilmorey. Total pop. 6,541. The principal place is Lamlash.

Arras, a fortified city of France, capital of the department of Pas de Calais, and an episcopal see, and one of the most ancient towns of France; it was the seat of the Atrebates in the time of Cæsar. It is divided into two towns; one named the city, which is the most ancient; and the other the town, which is modern. The great square is full of fine buildings, surrounded with piazzas. It was the birth-place of Robespierre, and is seated on the Scarpe, 22 m. W. N. W. of Cambray. Long. 2. 46. E. lat. 50. 17. N. Pop. about 19,000.

Arriège, a department of France, containing the late provinces of Couserans, and Foix. It is so named from a river, which rises in the Pyrenees, and passing by Foix and Pamiers, enters the Garonne, near Toulouse. Gold dust is found among its sands. Foix is the capital. Pop. about 225,000.

Arroe or Aaroe and Eroe, two islands of Denmark, the first about the middle of the little Belt, and the other at its entrance into the Baltic. There are a cluster of islands also called Arroe, just within the Red Sea, opposite to Moka.

Arroo, five islands in the Indian Ocean, to the south and west of New Guinea, extending from 5 30. to 7. 0. S. lat. with narrow channels between them. The chief product is sago. During the dry or western monsoon, numerous flocks of the birds of paradise, from New Guinea, reside in these islands, where great numbers are killed, dried, and exported to Banda. The Arroo isles are considered as belonging to the Dutch.

Arsamas, a town of Russia, situate near the source of the Tschia, a branch of the Oka river, in the province of Nishnei, or Lower Novogorod. It is about 100 m. E. of Moscow, and has a variety of manufactures. Pop. about 6,000

Asur, a town on the coast of Syria, in Palestine, with a fortress, 10 m. N. of Jaffa.

Arta, a seaport of European Turkey, in Albania, and a Greek archbishop's see. It has a considerable trade in tobacco and skins, and is seated on the Arta, 70 m. N. N. W. of Lepanto. Long. 21. 20. E. lat. 39. 28. N.

Aruba, an island 15 m. in circumference, situated near the mouth of the gulf of Maracaybo. 45 m. W. of Curaçao. Long. 70. 5. W. lat. 12. 10. N.

Arundel, a borough in Sussex, Eng., governed by a mayor. It is seated on the side of a hill on the river Arun, about 5 m. from the sea, and has a venerable gothic church, formerly, collegiate. Its castle, the ancient seat of the dukes of Norfolk, stands on the hill, and is of great extent; a vast sum was expended upon it by Charles the XII. duke; the interior court forms a square of 200 ft. each way, the centre of the east side is decorated by a magnificent work of art, a bas relief, representing Alfred and the assembling of the first jury. It was executed by the elder Rossi, and is the finest and most characteristic work of art of the kind in Europe; the library is on the same side, fitted up with the finest mahogany and cedar most highly wrought; the west side is occupied by a grand banqueting room and chapel; the south, the state apartments; the north is open to the gardens, but at the N. W. corner is the old gateway, and tower, a circular building of great dimensions, and was formerly the strongest place of defence in Britain. The possession of this castle confers an earldom on the proprietor. The river is navigable for barges, and great quantities of timber are sent hence for the dock-yards. It is 11 m. S. E. of Chichester and 56 S. S. W. of London.

Arva, a County at the northern extremity of Lower Hungary, intersected by the Carpathian mountains; it contains a pop. of about 75,000, subsisting chiefly by agriculture, more particularly flax for domestic manufacture and some for trade. There is a town which gives name to the county, situate on a stream which falls into the Wag River.

Arve, a rapid river of Savoy, which rises in Faucigny, and watering Salenche, Cluse, and Bonneville, joins the Rhone, below Geneva.

Arwangen, a town and castle of Switzerland, in the canton of Berne, on the river Aar, 12 m. E. of Soleure.

Arzew, a seaport town of Algiers, about 15 m. W. of Oran. It appears to be the ancient Arsenaria, there being many relics of antiquity in the neighbourhood.

Arzila, a seaport in the kingdom of Fez, about 30 m. S. of Cape Spartel, and 50 S. S. W. of Tangiers. It was formerly a Roman colony, and a place of considerable importance, but at present does not contain more than 1,000 inhabitants.

Arzingan, a town of Armenia, on the west bank of a branch of the Euphrates, 45 m. S. W. of Arx Roum.

Asab, or Assab, a town of Abyssinia, in Danacali, on a bay in the straits of Babelmandel, 36 m. S. E. of Bailur.

Asangaro, a town and district of Peru, west of the Andes, north of the lake Chuiento. It is very thinly peopled.

Asaph, St. a city of Wales, and a bishop's see, in Flintshire, on the river Elwy, where it unites with the Clwyd. It is a poor place, of note only for its cathedral, but has a market on Saturday. It is 27 m. W. of Chester, and 217 N. W. of London, on the line of road to Holyhead.

Asben, an interior country of North Africa, of which Agadas is the capital; it is bounded on the east by Bornou, and north and west by the deserts of Zaara and Tuarick.

Ashbury, p.v. Warren Co. N. J. 34 m. N. W. Trenton.

Ascalon, a town on the coast of Palestine, distinguished in Jewish history as one of the chief cities of the Philistines. It is now an insignificant place about 30 m. S. W. of Jerusalem, and 10 N. of Gaza.

Ascension, a parish in the Eastern District of Louisiana, upon the Mississippi. The soil is rich and produces sugar and cotton. Donaldson, 75 m. from New Orleans, is the chief town. Pop. of the parish, 5,400.

Ascension, a barren island in the Atlantic Ocean, 600 m. N. W. of St. Helena. It has a safe harbour, at which the East India ships often touch, to procure turtles which are here plentiful and large. Long. 13. 50. W. lat. 7. 57. S. Also the name of a bay on the east coast of Yucatan, and of the chief town of the island of Margarita on the coast of Cumana.

Asch or Ausch, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Leutmeritz, situate on the banks of a small river which falls into the Elbe, about 20 miles above the town of Leutmeritz. Also the name of a small town in Wirtemberg, and of another in Bavaria.

Aschach, a considerable town of Upper Austria, in the quarter of Hausruck, on the south bank of the Danube.

Aschaffenburg, a town of Germany, lately in the territory of Mentz, but now the capital of a principality of the same name, in the circle of the Lower Rhine, insulated in that of Franconia. Here is a palace in which George II. of England took up his quarters the night before the battle of Dettingen, in 1748. It was taken by the French in 1796 and 1800. It is situate near the conflux of the Aschaff with the Maine, on the east side of the latter river, 20 m. E. S. E. of Frankfort, and 40 W. N. W. of Wurzburg. Long. 9. 5. E. lat. 50. 0. N.

Aschersleben, a considerable town on the west bank of the Saal, in the principality of Anhalt, circle of Upper Saxony.

Ascoli, a town of Italy, in the marquisate of Ancona, with two citadels; seated on a mountain, by the river Tronto, 80 m. N. E. of Rome. Long. 13. 29. E. lat. 42. 44. N.

Ascoli di Satriano, a town of Naples, in Capitanata, seated on a mountain, 70 m. E. of Naples. Long. 15. 50. E. lat. 41. 8. N.

Ascora, a town in the island of Majorca, with a church containing a celebrated image of the Virgin, much resorted to by pilgrims.

Ascutney, a mountain in Vt. between Weathersfield and Windsor, 3,320 feet high. It is chiefly a granite rock with very few trees. The summit affords an extensive prospect of the Connecticut and a highly cultivated region in the neighbourhood.

Ashantee, an interior territory of North Africa, extending from the meridional line to the 5th or 6th deg. of W. long. bounded by the Gold coast. The Ashantees have for a long period been the most powerful of all the Negro tribes of W. Africa, not only in their contests with their neighbours, but they have frequently defied the scientific and destructive means of European warfare: during the period of the uncontrolled sway of the slave trade, previous to the commencement of the present century, the Ashantees, though little known upon the coast, were the main instruments in the interior, by which that debasing traffic was carried on, being constantly at war with their neighbours for the obtaining of prisoners to send to the coast as slaves, and it was the Ashantees who gave rise to the famous, or rather infamous Assiento contract of the Spaniards: since the restriction of the slave trade to the south of the equator, the Ashantees, though still full of thirst for war, have directed more of their attention to commerce. It was in 1806 that they first appeared formidable on the coast against the Annamboes, and in 1823 they completely defeated the whole British force of the coast, which took the field against them; the governor who commanded in person being slain in the conflict, and the wreck of the army compelled to take refuge in the forts.

Ashborough, p.v. Randolph Co. N. C. 78 m. W. Raleigh.

Ashborne, a town of Derbyshire, Eng. It is famous for cheese, and seated between the rivers Dove and Compton, 10 m. N. E. of Uttoxeter, and 139 N. N. W. of London. Pop. of the parish 4,688.

Ashburnham, p.t. Worcester Co. Mass. 55 m. N. W. Boston. Pop. 1,403. Leather is made here in large quantities by an incorporated company with a capital of 30,000 dollars. Here is also the Boston Soap-stone manufactory with a capital of 20,000 dollars.

Ashburton, a borough in Devonshire, Eng. It is one of the four stannary towns, and has a considerable manufacture of serges. It is seated among hills (remarkable for tin and copper) near the river Dart, 19 m. S. W. of Exeter, and 192 W. by S. of London. It returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 3,403.

Ashby, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. 50 m. N. W. Boston. Pop. 1,240.

Ashby de la Zouch, a town in Leicestershire, Eng. It had a castle with a very high tower, some ruins of which are standing. Here are manufactures of stockings, hats and ribands, and a considerable trade in malt. A canal from the town communicates with the Coventry canal. Ashby is 13 m. S. of Derby, and 115 N. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,227. A vein of coal, of a very superior quality was opened in the vicinity about the year 1816, and a mineral water in the same neighbourhood, since about the same period, has been much resorted to.

Ashereff, or Eshreff, a town of Persia, situate on a small rivulet which falls into the Caspian Sea at its south end.

Ashfield, p.t. Franklin Co. Mass. 105 m. W. Boston. Pop. 1,732.

Ashmunein, a town of Egypt, built on the ruins of a city, supposed to be the ancient Hermopolis, on the left bank of the Nile, 140 m. S. S. W. of Cairo. Long. 31. 7. E. lat. 28. 10. N.

Ashnagar, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Cabul, seated on the Kameh, 80 m. N. of Attock, and 110 S. E. of Cabul.

Ashtabula, a County at the N. E. extremity of Ohio, bordering on Lake Erie. Pop. 14,584. Jefferson is the chief town.

Ashtabula, p.t. in the above County, on L. Erie, 200 m. from Columbus. It has a good harbour and is a flourishing town.

Ashtabula, a stream of Ohio, about 30 m. in length, running into L. Erie.

Ashton-under-line, a town and populous parish of Lancashire, Eng.; the town is seated on a high bank which rises from the river Tame, 7 m. east of Manchester. The parish is divided into four districts, viz. that of the town, which in 1821 contained 9,225 inhab. Audenshaw, 3,781, Hartshead, 9,137, and Knott-Lanes, 3,827: total 26,967, forming together one of the most important seats of the cotton manufacture, containing upwards of 60 large establishments for spinning and machine-weaving, four iron and brass foundries, as many machine manufactories, and about 30 establishments for the manufacture of hats. It has also extensive collieries in its vicinity, and it is intersected by the Manchester, and the Huddersfield and Peat Forest canals. The foundation stone of a new church in the gothic style was laid in 1821. There are 16 other towns or villages in different parts of England named Ashton, or to which it is prefixed.

Ashuelot, r. Cheshire Co. N. Hampshire, flows S. W. into the Connecticut.

Asia, one of the three grand divisions of the eastern hemisphere; its boundaries are so exceedingly irregular as to render it difficult to convey an accurate idea of its position, limits, and extent, except by a map; it lies however wholly north of the equator. Point Romaine, the most southerly point of the Malaya promontory, being in lat. 1. 23. 30. N. Bounded on the north by the Arctic Ocean, or as a medial line by the 70th deg. of N. lat. from west to east it extends in its extreme limits from the Dardanelles in 26. to Behring's straits in 190. E. but exclusive of the promontories of Natolia, Hindoostan, Malaya, Kamschatka, and the islands under the equator, Asia may be considered as lying between the 15th and 70th deg. of N. lat. and the 40th and 130th of E. long. and containing an area of about 11,000,000 of sq. m. Asia is separated from Europe on the west by the Ural mountains, extending from the line of the Arctic circle in the long. of 63. E. bearing west to the long. 54. in the lat. of 63. from which point they again bear to the east to the long. of 59. in the lat. of 55., from which point, while the Ural mountains run in a parallel line with the 59th of long. the Asiatic boundary becomes partly conventional, bearing west to the sea of Asoph; from which, the Black Sea, the Sea of Marmora, the Dardanelles, and Levant, form the western boundary to the isthmus of Suez which separates it from Africa: the Arabian gulf or Red Sea.

then forms the remainder of its western boundary, and the Arabian Sea, Indian Ocean, and China Sea, bounds it on the south, and the North Pacific Ocean on the east, and the Arctic Ocean as previously stated, forms its northern boundary; this vast extent of territory is divided into 11 great parts, viz. Siberia, Chinese Tartary, China, Thibet, Western or Independent Tartary, the Birman empire, Hindoostan, Persia, Arabia, Asiatic Turkey, and Japan, the latter being exclusively insular. Several noble rivers flow in various directions; the Obi, the Ynessei and Lena, fall into the Arctic Ocean, the Amoor or Saghalien, into the sea of Ochotak, in the North Pacific, the Yellow and Great Rivers intersect China from west to east falling into the bay of Nankin, and the Ganges, Indus, and Euphrates flowing from north to south; but it is worthy of remark, that neither in Asia or Europe, or in either of the two grand divisions of the western hemisphere, are there any rivers of importance that flow from east to west, whilst in Africa there are none that flow from west to east.

Although the rivers of Asia do not vie in magnificence with those of the western hemisphere, Asia far exceeds it in the magnificence of its mountains. The Himalaya range which separates Hindoostan from Tartary in the lat. of 29. N. rises to the prodigious height of 27,677 ft. above the level of the sea; the Ural ridge extends in a uniform and unbroken chain, from the line of the Arctic circle to the sea of Aral, and although not rising higher than about 4,500 ft. they are emphatically denominated by the Russians, the back, and by the Tartars, the girdle of the world; the Altaian chain intersects the entire territory in a N. E. direction, from the Arabian Sea to the east cape in Behring's straits, and in the lat. of 49. N. rises to the height of 12,800 ft. and Mounts Caucasus, Taurus, Ararat, &c. &c. spread over the western part of Asia, rising to the height of 8 to 10,000 ft. The Caspian, Baikal, and sea of Aral, are the only inland waters that merit notice in this place, and when compared with those of the north division of the western hemisphere, they are very insignificant. The islands of the eastern ocean are so numerous, and so diffusely scattered, as to render it difficult to decide which properly belong to Asia, and which do not; those however which admit of no dispute may be enumerated as follows, beginning at the north: viz. Saghalien, Jesso, the Japanese, Loo Choo, Formosa, Hainan, the Philippines, Borneo, Celebes, Java, Sumatra, Ceylon, the Maldives, and Laocadives; the Ladrone, New Carolines, Pelew, New Guinea, Solomon's, New Hebrides, New Caledonia, Sandwich, Society, Friendly, New Zealand; and Van Diemen's Land, will most probably hereafter become more particularly identified with New Holland.

Asia was the parent of nations, and the scene of most of those remarkable transactions which are recorded in sacred history. After the deluge, Noah is said to have settled near the borders of the Euphrates, and to have peopled the whole continent, the posterity of Shem occupying the central regions, Japhet the northern, and Ham the southern. Javan and his descendants, Ashkenaz, Dodanim, Tharashish, Elisha, Togermah, and Riphath, are supposed to have been the ancient inhabitants of Asia Minor. The Canaanites and Amalekites were the people of Syria and Arabia Petrea. Modern writers have referred the present natives of Asia to those different stocks the Hebrews, Indians, and Tartars, the propriety of which will appear from their make, features, and languages. There are, however, some large tribes which cannot be referred to any of these classes. Mr. Pinkerton observes that the population of Asia is allowed by all authors to be wholly primitive, with the exception of the Tahuktahis (whom the Russian historians suppose to have passed from the opposite coast of America), the colonies that have migrated from Russia to the northern parts as far as the sea of Kamtschatka, the well-known European settlements, and a few others. Asia certainly contains a decidedly original population, and presents an ample field for the study of man in all the stages of his progress from barbarism to civilization. The western part of Asia appears to have been occupied by numerous petty sovereignties, whose very names are now extinct. At a somewhat later period the Babylonian empire extended over the greater part of Western Asia; the Persians next reigned paramount on that side, 328 years before the Christian era; Alexander of Macedon extended his arms as far as the Ganges; but his exploits in Asia may be considered as incursions rather than conquests.

The ascendancy of the Persians in its turn yielded to the still greater ascendant influence and power of the Tartars from the north, who also in the 12th century subdued China in the east; and indeed such was the extent of their power, that at one period nearly the whole of Asia as well as a great part of Europe fell under their dominion.

The Mogul empire succeeded the Tartar, whilst the greater part of Eastern Tartary became united to China, which for several centuries has remained comparatively undisturbed; but at the present time, a company of English traders, under the denomination of "The United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies," may be regarded as the ascendant power, and as reigning lords paramount over all Asia. The Russians however occupy the whole of the north of Asia, from the Arctic Sea to the 50th degree of north latitude; and it will probably be their turn next to rule the S. as well as the N.

The productions of Asia, animal, mineral, vegetable, as well as birds, insects, reptiles, and fishes, are as majestic, valuable, and useful, as they are various and infinite. The elephant in Asia, like the camel in Africa, is made the instrument of burthen, and in war and pageantry ranks highest in importance; the lion and tiger of Asia are the noblest of their species, and as distinguished for their beauty and their symmetry as for their agility, strength, and ferocity. The leopard inhabits eastern and southern Asia and in rapidity and agility of motion is unrivalled by any other animal. He has a restless eye and a sinister sues it up the trees. Usually he shuns man, but when closely pressed, he turns upon the hunter and sometimes when pinched by hunger he will attack unprovoked, though by stealth, the human race. The inferior classes of the animal creation will be more particularly adverted to under the heads of the several divisions of Asia. Although apparently not so rich in precious minerals as the southern division of the western hemisphere, Asia indicates abundance of gold, and some silver, and its gems are deservedly held in the highest estimation. Of the inferior metals, if they abound, a subduing species of policy precludes their preparation for utility, and Asia draws considerable supplies of iron, copper, tin, and lead from Europe.

Rice for food, and cotton for clothing, are the main productions of the soil over all the south parts of Asia and China, and in the latter country, a decoction of the well known tea shrub, constitutes the principal drink of that populous empire, whilst the vegetable tallow tree supplies many of their domestic wants.

Mahomedism is established in the central and western parts, while paganism, and the most degrading and cruel superstitions, prevail in all the other regions of Asia. Christianity is scarcely known throughout this part of the globe, except in Siberia and in Greece, where the profession of it has been perpetuated amidst cruelty and oppression;—nor have any adequate exertions been made by Europeans for its introduction, the small tract of India brought under cultivation by our missionaries being only as a single oasis in a vast and dreary desert.

The governments of Asia appear in all ages to have been arbitrary and despotic in the extreme; much addicted to parade and pageantry, and that to a degree of which Europe has exhibited no parallel. The government of China, although in name and form a complete despotism, appears however to be administered not only with temperance, but with a paternal solicitude for the welfare of the great body of the people, who may yet at the same time be ranked amongst the most abject of the human race. The ascendancy of the English at the close of the 18th and commencement of the 19th century is unquestionably the most important era in the history of Asia; and, although much that is objectionable and reprehensible prevails, in some respects it indicates brighter and better prospects to Asia than it has ever before experienced.

Asia Minor comprehends that part of western Asia under the dominion of the Turks, bordering north on the Black Sea, and south on the Levant, including the provinces of Natolia, Caramania, and Roum, which see.

Asiago, a considerable town of Italy, in Vicentino, 20 m. N. of Vicenza.

Asinara, an island in the Mediterranean, on the N. W. coast of Sardinia, 17 m. N. by W. of Sassari. It is 28 m. in compass, and is fertile and populous. Long. 8. 24. E. lat. 41. 0. N.

Askeaton, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Limerick, noted for its castle, and for one of the most perfect abbeys in the country; built by one of the earls of Desmond. It is seated on the Dee, near its confluence with the Shannon, 20 m. W. S. W. of Limerick. Pop. in 1820, 1,239, and of the parish, 3,425.

Asnieres, a town of France, in the department of Upper Vienne, 10 m. N. W. of Bellac.

Asola, a town of Italy, in Bresciano, 20 m. S. E. of Brescia.

Asolo, a town of Italy, in Trevisano, with a spacious citadel on a hill. It is surrounded by walls, and situate near the Musone, 17 m. N. W. of Treviso.

Asoph, or Azof, a sea, anciently the Palus Mæotis, lying N. of the Black Sea, with which it communicates by the strait of Caffa, the ancient Cimmerian Bosphorus. The sea, which is sometimes called the Sea of Zabak, extends 240 m. from S. W. to N. E. between the latitudes of 42. to 47. N. and 34. to 39. of W. long.

Asoph, a district of the Russian empire, in the province of Catharineslaf, including a large tract of territory to the east and west of the town of Asoph. It was ceded by the Turks in 1774, and after that period, several new towns were built by Catharine II.; one of which, Catharineslaf, is now the capital.

Asoph, a town of Russia, lately the capital of a district of the same name, seated on the east bank of the Don, near its entrance into the sea of Asoph. It has been several times taken by the Turks and Russians. It is not of the importance it was in the reign of Peter the Great; the river being now so choked with sand as scarcely to admit the smallest vessel. Long. 38. 32. E. lat. 46. 58. N.

Asperen, a town of Holland, famous for a long siege which it held out against the Geldrians, in 1517. It is seated on the Linghe, 13 m. S. of Utrecht, and 22 E. of Rotterdam.

Aspera, a town of Austria, on the north bank of the eastern branch of the Danube, a little below Vienna, distinguished for a great battle fought between the French and Austrians in 1809, during which the town was totally destroyed, but has been since re-built.

Assam, an interior country of Asia, bounded on the W. by Bengal and Bootan, N. by Thibet, and S. E. and S. by Meckley. The river Burram-pooter divides it into two provinces; the northern, which is the most fertile, being called Uttercul, and the southern Dachincul. Among the products are many kinds of valuable fruits, with silk, musk, pepper, cocoanuts, sugar, and ginger. The open parts are marked with population and tillage; the woods abound with elephants. The mountains are inhabited by a savage tribe called Nances, who go naked, and eat dogs, cats, mice, locusts, and any thing they can find. The other inhabitants of Assam are base and unprincipled, have no fixed religion, nor any rule but their inclination. They eat all flesh except human, and even animals that die a natural death. They are enterprising, savage, vindictive, and fond of war. They have neither horses, asses, nor camels; but these are sometimes brought there from other countries. Asses they are fond of, but are so much afraid of a horse, that one trooper would put a hundred of them to flight. The invention of gunpowder is ascribed to the Assamese. It was known in China and Hindoostan in very remote antiquity; and in the code of Gentoo laws there is a prohibition of the use of fire-arms: but what these fire-arms were is not distinctly known. Ghergong is the capital.

Assancake, or Hasenkala, a town of Turkish Armenia, which has hot baths much frequented. It is seated on the Ares, 22 m. E. of Erzerum.

Assarpour, a town of Hindoostan, in the country of Cutch, at the most eastern mouth of the Indus, 38 m. W. of Boogebooge.

Assergur, a strong hill fort of Hindoostan, in Candeish. In the war with the Mahrattas, in 1803, it surrendered to the British. It is 20 m. N. E. of Burhanpour.

Assen, a town of Holland in Overijssel, 12 m. S. of Groningen, and 51 N. N. W. of Coevorden.

Assenheim, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Rhine, at the conflux of the Wetter with the Nidda, 11 m. N. E. of Frankfurt.

Assens, a sea-port of Denmark, in the island of Funen. It is the common passage from the duchy of Sleswick to Copenhagen, and is 17 m. S. W. of Odensee. Long. 10. 2. E. lat. 55. 17. N.

Assiniboins, or Asseneboynes, a river of North America, falling into the S. W. end of Lake Winnipeg; the North West Fur Trading Company have a house on the south bank of the river, about 15 m. above its entrance into the lake.

Assisi, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Spoleto, with a magnificent church, 22 m. N. W. of Spoleto.

Assumption, a township and village of Lower Canada, situate on the bank of a river of the same name, which falls into the St. Lawrence a little below Montreal.

Assonet, p.v. in Berkley, Bristol Co. Mass.

Assos, a sea-port of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, on a bay of the Archipelago, 12 m. S. E. of Tross. Long. 26. 36. E. lat. 39. 32. N.

Assumption, an episcopal city, capital of a province in Paraguay. It stands in a fertile country, on the east bank of the river Paraguay, a little above the confluence of the Pilcomayo. Long. 57. 40. W. lat. 22. 47. Also the name of one of the Ladrone islands, in N. lat. 19. 45. and 45. 35. E. long.

Assumption, a parish in the E. District of Louisiana, on the river Lafourche. Pop. 5,400. The court-house is 90 m. W. of New Orleans.

Astabat, a town of Persian Armenia, 3 m. from the river Aras, and 32 S. E. of Naksivan.

Astara, a town of Persia, in Ghilan, on a river of the same name, near its entrance into the S. W. end of the Caspian Sea. Long. 50. 40. E. lat. 38. 30. N.

Asterabad, or Esterabad, a town of Persia, capital of a province of its name at the S. E. part of the Caspian Sea. It stands at the mouth of a river, which forms a bay convenient for trade, 110 m. E. of Ferabad. Long. 54. 58. E. lat. 37. 16. N.

Asti, a city of Piedmont, capital of the department of Tanaro, with a citadel. Beside the cathedral, it contains upward of thirty other churches. It is seated on the Tanaro, 24 m. E. of Turin. Pop. about 22,000.

Astorga, an episcopal town of Spain, in Leoa, well fortified by art and nature. It is seated in a plain, on the river Tueria, 25 m. S. W. of Leon, and about midway on the high road from Corunna to Madrid.

Astrabad, a tongue of land on the northeast coast of the Crimea, extending into the sea of Asoph.

Astracan, a city of the Caucasus, and the principal city of Asiatic Russia, capital of a province of the same name, and an archbishop's see. It is situate on an island formed by two branches of the Volga River, near its entrance into the north end of the Caspian Sea, in the lat. of 46. and has a good harbour. It is surrounded by walls, and on the west has a triangular fortress

Here are 25 Russian churches, and two convents; the Armenians, Lutherans, and Papists, have their places of worship; and the Hindoos of Moulton have been permitted to erect a temple. The houses are in general of wood; and the inhabitants are estimated at 70,000. It seldom rains here, but the river Volga overflows, like the Nile, and when the water has run off, vegetation is very rapid. Here are several large vineyards from which some wine is made for home consumption; also manufactures of gunpowder, and nitre, and on the side of the Caspian Sea, are long marshes which produce a great quantity of salt. The Volga, either of itself, or by its numerous branches, intersects half of the interior provinces of European Russia, and affords to Astracan a facility of communication by water of inestimable advantage; it communicates with Moscow by the Kashma branch and with St. Petersburg from Twer, partly by canal, and partly by intermediate waters. The mouths of the river abound with beluga, a species of sturgeon, from the sound of which is made the finest isinglass, which forms a very extensive branch of the commerce of Astracan. Here is also the centre of all the commerce of Russia with Persia and the East, in which Russians, Persians, Armenians, Greeks, Tartars, Jews, Hindoos, French, and English all participate. It was taken from the Mongol Tartars about the middle of the 15th century, and is about 770 m. S. E. of Moscow, and 1,050 S. S. E. of St. Petersburg.

Asturias, a maritime province of the northwest of Spain, extending for about 120 m. along the shore of the Bay of Biscay. It is divided into two parts, Asturias de Oviedo and Asturias de Santillana, so named from their chief towns. This province is full of mountains and forests, its wine and horses are excellent; and it has mines of gold, lapis lazuli and vermilion. The eldest son of the king of Spain is styled prince of the Asturias. It was formerly a principality of the kingdom of Leon, and is bounded on the S. by the province of Leon; on the W. by Galicia; and on the E. by Biscay and Old Castile; it extends inland from the Bay of Biscay about 45 m. and contains a superficies of 308 sq. leagues, and in 1810, a population of 364,238. St. Andero at the eastern extremity of the province, in lat. 43. 28. N. and 3. 40. W. long. and distant by way of Segovia 87 and by Aranda 71 1-2 leagues north from Madrid, is the principal town on the coast, and Oviedo, 75 1-2 leagues N. W. from Madrid, is the chief town inland.

Asylum, t. Luzerne Co. Pa., on the Susquehanna, 66 m. N. W. Wilkesbarre.

Atacama, a seaport and province of Peru. The province has a great desert of the same name, which separates Peru from Chile. The town is remarkable for the fish called tollo, with which it carries on a great trade with the inland provinces. It is 210 m. S. by E. of Arica. Long. 69. 30. W. lat. 21. 20. S.

Atchinsk, a considerable town in the government of Tobolsk, on the frontiers of Colyvan. It is situated on a branch of the Obi river, in the lat. of 56. 20. N. and 89. 30. E. long.

Atchafalaya, a river of Louisiana, one of the mouths of the Mississippi, striking off from that stream just below the entrance of Red River, and flowing south into the Gulf of Mexico. It is only however when the river is very high, that any great portion of the waters of the Mississippi passes off by this channel. Vast quantities of drift timber have passed from the main stream into this river, and becoming clogged between its banks have formed what is called the Great Raft, where the river is covered with a floating bridge of timber, extending with interruptions, a length of 25 miles.

Atena, a town of Naples in Principato Citiorre, near the river Negro, 22 m. N. of Policastro.

Ath, a fortified town of the Netherlands, in Hainault. It has been often taken, and is seated on the Dender, 12 m. N. W. of Mons, on the road from Brussels to Tournay. Pop. about 7,500.

Athaboli, a town of European Turkey, in Rumania, on the coast of the Black Sea, 70 m. N. E. of Adrianople.

Athapescovo, a lake in the N. part of British America, discharging its waters into Slave Lake. It is 200 m. long.

Athboy, a parish and town in the county of Meath, Ireland. In 1821 the town contained a population of 1,569, and the parish, including the commons, and the village of Castletown, 4,275. The town is 30 m. N. of Dublin, and has three annual fairs.

Athelney, an island in Somerset, Co. Eng. at the confluence of the Thone and Parret, a few miles below Taunton, memorable for having afforded shelter to king Alfred. Here he collected some of his retainers, on which account he called it Athelningay, or the isle of Nobles, and hence he made frequent sallies upon the Danes.

Athenrey, a populous parish and town in the county of Galway, Ireland; in 1821, the population of the town was 1,093, and total of the parish 10,977.

Athens, a once celebrated city, situate on a promontory at the southern extremity of Eastern Europe, supposed to have been founded by Cecrops, 1,556 years antecedent to the Christian era, or about the period of the height of Egyptian glory in the age of Moses; it became the seat of kingly authority under Codrus, about the period of the reign of David in Palestine, and in about 1,000 years subsequent to its foundation, it had attained the summit of its glory, when it became the chief city of the Grecian republic, which successfully contended against the powerful arms of the Persian monarchy, and excelled in all the arts of poetry, painting, sculpture, and architecture; the two last, the Athenians may be said to have perfected, for all that succeeding ages have done has been to copy, mix, and transform. Eighty-six years antecedent to the Christian era, when refinement among the Athenians had sunk into licentiousness, and patriotism into selfish ambition, and individual aggrandisement, Athens fell a prey to the furious arms of Sylla, who sacked it of some of its choicest treasures; from this period it may be considered as having passed the meridian of its glory. In the 50th year of the Christian era, it was visited by the apostle Paul, whose speech to the multitude from the celebrated temple on Mar's Hill, as recorded in the 18th chap. of the Acts of the Apostles, verse 22nd, will best testify the social and moral condition of its inhabitants at the period; it subsequently became a prey to internal commotions, as well as to external enemies, and after experiencing various alternations of fortune, it became tributary to the Turks, on their establishing their dominion in Europe, and under them was the chief town of the district of Livadia; numerous vestiges of architectural grandeur still remain to attest the supremacy of the Athenians in that noble and useful art. The tower of the new church of St. Panaras, built in London in 1822, is a copy of the celebrated Temple of the Winds which adorned Athens; and it is proposed to erect in Westminster a fac simile of the Parthenon, an edifice which has delighted the eye of every beholder, through a period of 2,500 years, the latter part of which it has been a prey to every species of spoliation. In 1808, lord Elgin, then ambassador from England at Constantinople, ransacked the Parthenon of the choicest vestiges of its friezes, &c. which now adorn the national Museum in London. Athens was besieged by the Greeks in the early part of their revolutionary struggle, and the acropolis fell into their hands in 1822. Since which time they have been masters of the city. It stands in a spacious plain; the hill of Mars, on the summit of which stood the temple, dedicated to the idol of that name, was, during the zenith of its greatness, in the centre of the city, but now, at some distance from the present town, which is bounded on one side by Mount Hymettus, deservedly celebrated for the honey which it produces. On the sea side it has three ports; the Phalereus, Munchyia, and Piræus, about 5 miles distant from the town, and through which it carries on some little external traffic in honey, wax, oil, olives, silk, &c. in exchange for the manufactures of Western Europe generally, but for which, its chief means of payment consist in the bills of exchange, drawn to defray the expenses of its numerous visitors; it is in lat. 37. 58. N. and 23. 46. W. long. Pop. 12,000.

Athens, p.t. Somerset Co. Me. Pop. 1,200.

Athens, t. Windham Co. Vt. 25 m. N. Brattleboro. Pop. 415.

Athens, p.t. Greene Co. N. Y. or the E. bank of the Hudson, opposite Troy. 26 m. below Albany. Pop. 2,425.

Athens, p.t. Clarke Co. Geo. 68 m. N. Milledgeville, contains the university of Georgia, which has a President and 6 Professors; the libraries contain 4,500 vols.; the students in 1831 were 95. Pop. 1,100.

Athens, a Co. of Ohio, in the S. E. part. Pop. 9,763. Athens is the chief town.

Athens, p.t. capital of the above Co. belongs to the Ohio university. The college at this place comprises 2 buildings, and had in 1831, 57 students. Its annual revenue is 2,300 dollars. Athens is 70 m. S. E. Columbus.

Athens, t. Harrison Co. Ohio, 125 m. E. Columbus.

Atherston, a town in Warwickshire, Eng., with manufactures of hats, ribands, and shalloons. Richard III. held a council with his nobles here, the night before the battle of Bosworth. It is seated near the Anker, on the high road from London to Holyhead, by Chester. 13 m. N. of Coventry, and 108 N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,434.

Athlone, a borough of Ireland, partly in the Co. of Westmeath, and partly in Roscommon. It stands on both sides of the Shannon, over which is a long bridge that is the grand pass between the provinces of Leinster and Connaught. It is 60 m. W. of Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 7,543, and of the parishes of St. Mary and St. Peter in which the town is situate, 6,270 more. This is now one of the most extensive military stations in all Ireland; and sends one member to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Athol, p.t. Worcester Co. Mass. 70 m. W. Boston. Pop. 1,325.

Athos, or Monte Santo, a high mountain of Greece, Macedonia, on a peninsula at the entrance of the gulf of Contessa. It has been celebrated in all ages for its singular locality, and the majesty of its appearance, and became an object of such great attraction to the Greeks, as to draw devotees from all parts of Eastern Europe, who have interspersed it with numerous churches, monasteries, and hermitages; hence it has acquired the name of Monte Santo, or the Holy Mountain. The monks amount to about 6,000, who subsist chiefly by preying on the numerous devotees whom their affected sanctity and craft continually draw around them; they however cultivate the olive and the vine to some extent, and there are four establishments of education for Greek ecclesiastics; there is a fortified town called Karesis, about half way up the mountain, at which a Turkish aga resides. It is about 70 m. E. of Salonica, and in lat. 40. 7. N. and 24. 15. E. long.

Athy, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Kildare. It is seated on the river Barrow, 12 m. S. of Kildare, and communicates with Dublin daily by passage boats, by the line of the grand canal. Pop. in 1821, 3,693. The remains of an old castle now serve for a county jail, and there are ruins of two monasteries in the vicinity.

Austria, Empire, Circle, and Archduchy of, in Europe. The Austrian empire comprehends the ancient kingdoms of Bohemia, Moravia, and Hungary, the Italian States of the Tyrol, and the ancient republic of Venice, Dalmatia, the duchies of Mantua and Milanese, parts of the circle of Bavaria, of Switzerland, and of Poland, and the circle which includes the archduchy. This fine empire lies between the 45th and 51st deg. of N. lat. and the 9th and 27th of E. long. and contains a superficies of about 300,000 sq. m. and 28,000,000 of inhabitants. In an aggregate sense the Austrian empire may be considered an interior and agricultural, rather than a maritime and commercial country, the only part that borders upon the sea being the Italian States on the south, which may be considered tributary, rather than integral parts of the empire, and as such are held by too precarious a tenure, and under circumstances too prescribed to excite a spirit of commercial enterprize. That noble river the Danube, runs from west to east through the heart of the empire, and by its numerous branches, intersects almost every part, affording great internal facility of communication, and advantages; but the peculiar locality of its communication with the Black Sea within the Dardanelles, precludes it from affording any very great external advantage. The Elbe rises in Bohemia; but its course is too circuitous, and too much liable to political impediments, to afford any advantages to Austria to be relied on; all the useful branches of manufacture, however, in wool, flax, silk, and leather, and most of the useful arts which contribute to the comfort and prosperity of society, are carried on over every part of the empire, from materials drawn from its own internal resources.

Several mountain districts supply abundance of almost every species of metallic substances; the forests supply abundance of timber, and the plains such numbers of cattle and sheep, as to afford several million lbs. weight of wool to be annually exported, after supplying their own internal demands. The Italian States furnish silk, olives, and oil, and Hungary the choicest wines; and indeed the Austrian empire may be considered as containing within itself all the means of substantial subsistence and of comfort, and much of luxury. But although Austria is not destitute of genius, enterprise, and efficiency in the higher departments of art, a bigoted and idolatrous species of religious faith, and self-sufficiency of political ascendancy, tend to subdue rather than excite the mental faculties, and preclude all great exertion of social enterprize. The government is absolute in form, and the formularies of the church of Rome, are the established religion of the empire; the government however if not mild, is not sanguinary, and the religion is rendered tolerant. The ruling passion of the government is military parade, to maintain which a revenue of more than 50,000,000 dollars is abstracted annually from the productive classes of the empire.

Nobles from every part of the empire settle in the capital, and contribute by their wealth to increase its commerce and industry. The indolence and ennui of the rich render many places of amusement necessary, but none are so much frequented as the theatre. Much has not been done in literature, still less in science; music forms the only exception; it has been cultivated with great success. The people are punctilious in observing forms and ceremonies; no class of the community, no rank or order, is free from credulity, superstition and bigotry. But although the inhabitants are ignorant, they are not corrupt; the men are honest, and the domestic virtues are cherished in the family circle.

The Circle of Austria, is bounded on the east by Hungary, north by Moravia and Bohemia, west by Bavaria, Suabia, and Switzerland, and south by the Austrian and Italian States, and the gulf of Venice, and contains superficies of about 50,000 sq. miles, and 4,500,000 inhabitants. It is divided into the Voralberg, and the counties of Bregenz and Tyrol, the bishopric of Trent, the duchies of Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, each subdivided into upper and lower, Friuli, and Istria, the bishoprics of Salzburg and Passau, insulated in the circle of Bavaria, and two small territories of the Teutonic knights, insulated in the circle of Suabia and Franconia, all of which will be found more amply described under their respective heads.

The Archduchy of Austria, is bounded on the N. by Bohemia and Moravia, E. by Hungary, S. by Stiria, and west by Bavaria; it forms the the north-east part of the circle, and is divided into West, Upper, and East, Lower. Upper Austria is again subdivided into the Inn Quarter, Michel Quarter, Quarter of Hausruck, and Black and Traun Quarters; and Lower Austria north of the Danube is subdivided into the circles, west above and east below the Manhartsberg, and south of the Danube, into the circles above and below the forest of Vienna. Upper Austria contains about 5,100 sq. miles, 100 cities and towns, numerous villages, and 630,000 inhabitants; and Lower Austria about 78,000 sq. miles, 280 cities and towns, numerous villages, and 1,100,000 inhabitants. The Archduchy of Austria constitutes what conventionally is considered the hereditary dominions of the house of Hapsburg, the reigning and ruling family, and the city of Vienna, situate on the south bank of the Danube, in the circle below the forest of Vienna, in lower Austria, is the seat of government of the whole Austrian empire. Except Vienna, there are no other cities or towns in the Archduchy of Austria, that merit any particular notice; it may be considered an agricultural and a somewhat fruitful district, and its peasantry are considered to be the happiest and best conditioned of any in Europe. To obtain however a just view, and to form a just estimate of their condition, and indeed of the condition of any people, it is necessary to weigh well the circumstances under which they are born, and by which they are surrounded. The peasants of Austria have been born under the influence of the star of passive obedience, which for years past has been preached to them with mildness and persuasion, rather than violence; and as such has made them a quiet and contented people, and as far as contentment constitutes happiness, the peasantry of the archduchy of Austria, may perhaps, justly be considered as the happiest and best conditioned in Europe; but after all, in the legitimate sense of the term happiness, it is a condition alike repugnant to common sense, and derogatory to the character of man. The character of the government, courtiers, and privileged classes of the archduchy of Austria, although tending somewhat to self-importance, is on the whole, courteous, affable, and condescending; and whilst the peasantry of the archduchy may be considered the most contented, the court may be considered the least licentious of any in Europe.

Averno, a lake of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, 600 yards in diameter, near Puzzuoli. Virgil and others have said the water was so bad, that birds dropt dead when flying over it, and hence they call it the lake of hell; but it now has no such poisonous quality, for birds swim upon it. A little to the west of the lake is a cave, where some pretend they went formerly to consult the Cumaean sybil. There are also some old walls, which some suppose to be the ruins of a temple of Apollo, and others of Pluto.

Aversa, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro

In 1806, it suffered greatly by an earthquake. It is seated in a fine plain, 18 m. N. E. of Naples.

Aversboro, p.v. Cumberland Co. N. C. on Cape Fear river, 35 m. S. Raleigh.

Avos, or The Islands of Birds, so called from the great number of birds that frequent them, though they have not a tree. They are 70 m. E. of Curacao, and 100 N. of the coast of Terra Firma, in N. lat. 15. 50. W. long. 63. 43.

Avonnes, a frontier town of France, in the south of the department of Nord, seated on the high road from Mons to Paris.

Avostadt, a town of Sweden, in Westmania, noted for its copper-works, and a mint for copper money, 35 m. N. N. W. of Westeros.

Avulsano, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Ulteriore, 18 m. S. of Aquila.

Aviano, a town of Italy, in Friuli, 23 m. W. of Udina.

Avigliano, a fortified town of Piedmont, on a hill near the Cotian Alps, 10 m. W. of Turin.

Avignon, a city of the south of France, capital of the department of Vaucluse, and a bishop's see. It was formerly dependent on the pope, and an archbishop's see, but became annexed to France in 1791. It has a university, several handsome churches and a synagogue, and numerous manufacturing establishments. It is seated in the heart of a very fruitful district, (in which the olive, vine, and fruits of all kinds are very abundant,) on the east bank of the Rhone, near the confluence of the Durance, about 20 m. N. E. of Nismes. Pop. 32,000.

Avila, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, and a bishop's see, with a university and a manufacture of fine cloth. It is seated on the Adaga, in a large plain, surrounded by mountains covered with fruit-trees and vineyards, 56 m. N. W. of Madrid. It was formerly one of the most considerable cities of Spain, but does not now contain more than 4,000 inhabitants.

Aviles, a town of Spain, in Asturias, near the bay of Biscay, 16 m. N. of Oviedo.

Avis, a town of Portugal, in Alentejo, seated on an eminence, with a castle, near the river Avis. Hence the military order of the knights of Avis have their name. It is 25 m. N. W. of Estremoz.

Aviso, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, 6 m. E. of Sora.

Avon, a river of England, celebrated for its association with the name of Shakespeare. It rises from several springs in Naseby Field, in the county of Northampton; its most elevated source springs from under the wall of a farm yard, a few paces north of the church, in the village of Naseby, and within a quarter of a mile from the source of the Nez, which flows east, and in a contrary direction to the Avon, falling into the German Ocean; whilst the Avon pursues a westerly course, a short distance from its source, dividing the county of Northampton from that of Leicester, until it enters the county of Warwick, in which it ornaments the fine domain of Stoneleigh Abbey, afterward washing the rocky foundation of Warwick castle, from whence it proceeds to Stratford, the birth-place of Shakespeare, and where it becomes navigable for barges of 30 to 50 tons burthen, running past Evesham to Tewkesbury in Gloucestershire, where it falls into the Severn. It has numerous corn and paper mills on its banks. There is also another river of the same name in England, which rises in the north of Wiltshire, runs past Malmesbury and Chippenham to Bath, falling into the Bristol Channel, this is contradiction to the other is called the Lower Avon. Avon, another river which rises near Bedwin, in Wiltshire, running past Salisbury, and skirting the edge of the New Forest, falling into Christ Church bay, in the English Channel.

Avon, p.t. Somerset Co. Me. Pop. 745.

Avon, p.t. Livingston Co. N. Y. 236 m. W. Albany. Pop. 2,362.

Avon, p.t. Lorain, Co. Ohio. 146 m. N. E. Columbus.

Avogellas, a parish in the western district of Louisiana, between the Mississippi, Red and Atchafalaya rivers. It produces great quantities of cotton. Pop. 3,488. Markville is the chief town.

Avanches, a town of France, in the south of the maritime department of La Manche. It is situate on an eminence, about 2 miles from the sea, in a fine agricultural district. It was formerly a bishop's see, to which Henry II. of England went to obtain absolution from the pope's nuncio, for the murder of Thomas a Becket in 1172. Although much declined in importance, the cathedral, episcopal palace, and castle, give it some consequence; and it contains about 6,000 inhabitants; 10 m. E. of St. Malo.

Aw Loch, a lake of Scotland, in Argyshire, 30 miles long, and in some parts above 2 broad. It contains four little islands, tufted with trees, on one of which are the ruins of an ancient castle; and on a peninsula of a lake are the noble ruins of Kilchurn castle. At the north extremity rises the mountain of Cruachan, elevated 3,390 ft. above the surface of the lake; and near its top is the spring which forms this beautiful expanse of water. The river Aw, the outlet of this lake, runs into Loch Etive, at the village of Bonaw.

Awatscha. See Awatscha.

Awari, or Owero, a kingdom of Africa, dependent on Benin, with a town of the same name, on the river Formosa. Long. 5. 10. E. lat. 6. 10. N.

Awon, a town of Suabia, on the river Cochen, 20 m. W. S. W. of Oeting.

Azbridge, a town in Somersetshire, Eng. seated on the river Ax, under the Mendip hills, 10 m. N. W. of Wells, and 130 W. of London.

Azel, a town of the Netherlands, in Flanders, seated in a morass, 10 m. N. of Ghent.

Azim, a territory of Guinea, on the Gold Coast, with a river of the same name flowing through it, and a town on the east side, at its entrance into the ocean. The country is fertile, and well cultivated, producing palm-oil, cocoas, oranges, pine-apples, yams, water-melons, and a prodigious quantity of rice. The Dutch have a fort and factory here, called St. Anthony. Long. 1. 3. W. lat. 4. 42. N.

Azminster, a town in Devonshire, Eng. on the river Ax. King Athelstan established a minster here to the memory of the princes slain in his army, when he defeated the Danes in this neighbourhood. Here is a manufacture of leather gloves, &c. and a famous one of carpets. It is 27 m. E. by N. of Exeter, and 147 W. of London.

Azum, a town, anciently the capital of Abyssinia. Its ruins are very extensive, among which are many obelisks of granite, with sculptures, but no hieroglyphics. It is 70 m. N. W. of Ausen. Long. 38. 45. E. lat. 14. 10. N.

Aylmouth, Aline, or Alenmouth, a town in Northumberland, at the mouth of the Aline, 4 miles east of Alnwick. It has a good harbour for fishing vessels. In the reign of queen Elizabeth the French held it and fortified it, as it was the first port near Scotland, where they could safely land their supplies for Mary of Guise, the queen regent. It is said that the bones of giants are often dug up in the neighbourhood. It exports considerable quantities of grain for the London market.

Ayamonte, a seaport of Spain, in Andalusia, with a castle on a rock, at the mouth of the river Guadiana, opposite Castro-Marino, 80 m. N. W. of Cadiz. Long. 7. 15. W. lat. 37. 12. N.

Aylesbury, a borough in Buckinghamshire, Eng. It is the centre of the business of the fertile vale of Aylesbury. Many people here derive their support from a peculiar manner of rearing ducks for the London market; and the making of lace is carried on to a great extent. It is 17 m. S. E. of Buckingham, and 33 N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,400.

Aylesford, a town in the county of Kent, Eng. situate on the west bank of the Medway river. Pop. in 1821, 1,136.

Aylesham, a town in Norfolk, Eng. 11 m. N. of Norwich, and 118 N. E. of London. There is a spring about a mile from the town, very efficacious in chronic disorders. It is seated on the south bank of the river Bure, which is navigable to Yarmouth. Pop. in 1821, 1,853.

Ayr, a county, parish, royal burgh, and river of Scotland. The county extends for about 56 miles along the S. W. coast, and is about 20 in mean breadth. It is one of the most productive counties in Scotland, and exports considerable quantities of grain to Liverpool; and the north part of the county participates largely in the cotton manufacture. It also abounds in coal and iron, and has some veins of copper and antimony, and some kelp is made on the coast from sea weed, which is also extensively used as manure. It has been proposed to intersect the north part of the county with a canal from Adrossan to the Clyde at Glasgow, but after having been completed for about 12 miles from the Clyde, the work has been suspended. Agates, porphyry, jasper, and calcareous petrifications are found in various parts of the county; whilst lime, and freestone abound, and on the river Ayr is obtained the whetstone, so useful in sharpening of agricultural cutlery. The principal towns beside Ayr, are Kilmarnock, Kilwinning, and Irvine, N., St. Quivox, Mauchline, Muirkirk, in the centre, Maybole, Kirkmichael, Daily, Girvan, and Ballantrae, S.

The Royal Burgh of Ayr is situate in the parish, and at the mouth of the river of the same name, on the sea coast, the light-house being in lat. 54. 35. N. and 4. 26. W. long. It is a place of considerable antiquity, having been a royal burgh as far back as 1202; its commercial importance declined with the rise of Glasgow, but has revived somewhat since the commencement of the present century. Its export of coal is very great. About 6,000 tons of shipping belong to the place, a portion of which is employed in the timber trade, to British America. Its buildings do not merit any particular notice. Pop. in 1821, 7,425, and New Town Ayr, immediately contiguous, 4,027 more. The Ayr river as well as the Don, affords a considerable supply of salmon.

Aysgarth, a parish and village of North Yorkshire; the parish contains 12 townships, and a population of 5,620; the village contains 293 inhabitants; and is seated on the Eure, four miles east of Askrigg. Here is a grand picturesque waterfall, called Aysgarth Force; and a bridge of one arch, 72 feet in the span, overgrown with ivy.

Azamor, a town of Morocco, on the river Morbeys, near the sea, 80 m. N. of Morocco.

Azaredo, a sea-port of Brazil, in the bay of Spirito Santo, celebrated for sugar. Long. 40. 10. W. lat. 20. 18. S.

Azores or Western Islands, a group of islands in the Atlantic, between 25. and 30. W. long. and 37. and 40. N. lat. 900 m. W. of Portugal. They are nine in number, viz. St. Maria, St. Michael, Terceira, St. George, Graciosa, Fayal, Pico, Flores, and Corvo. They were first discovered in 1439, by John Vanderberg, a merchant of Bruges, who was driven here by stress of weather. On his arrival at Lisbon, he boasted of his discovery; on which the Portuguese set sail, and took possession of them, which they have retained ever since. They have all a clear sky and salubrious air; are extremely fertile in corn, wine, and various fruits; and breed great numbers of cattle. It is said they are quite free of venomous animals; but they are subject to earthquakes and volcanic eruptions. They are seen at a great distance, one of them having a very high mountain, called the Pico, or Peak of the Azores. The governor-general resides at Angra, in Terceira; but St. Michael is the largest island. In the year 1819 they exported to Great Britain 51,706 boxes of oranges, and in 1824-5 a still greater quantity.

Azoth, Azotus, or Ashdod, one of the five cities of the Philistines, and a celebrated seaport of the Mediterranean. It was in this city that the idol Dagon fell down before the Ark; and so strong a place it was, if we may believe Herodotus, that it sustained a siege of 29 years, by Psammetichus, king of Egypt. It was, however taken by the Maccabees, in a much shorter time, who burned both city and temple, and with them about 8,000 men. The town is now called by the Arabs Hasaeyen. It is but thinly inhabited, though the situation is very pleasant. The town is about a mile and a half in circumference, and has in it a mosque, a public bath, a market-place, and two inns. Here is an old structure with fine marble pillars, which the inhabitants say was the house that Sampson pulled down; and to the S. E. just out of the town, is the water where Philip baptized the Ethiopian eunuch. There are several ancient buildings, with capitals and pillars standing. It is situated about 14 or 15 m. S. of Ekron, between that and Ascalon.

BAAL BECK, or the Valley of Baal, a fertile country of Asia, between Lebanon and Antilibanus, about 30 miles from Damascus, where there was formerly a magnificent temple of the Sun, the ruins of which are still admired by travellers. Some geographers make it a part, and others the whole of Coelosyria; but all agree, that it was one of the most pleasant spots on the earth.

Baba, or Babadag, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, celebrated for its knives and sword blades. It stands on a gulf of its name, in the Black Sea, 90 m. N. E. of Silistria. Long. 28. 38. E. lat. 44. 40. N.

Babelmandel, a strait between the coast of Abyssinia and Arabia, uniting the Red Sea with the Indian Ocean. In it is a small island and a mountain of the same name. Long. 43. 50. E. lat. 12. 50. N.

Babenhausen, a town of Suabia, in Germany, 5 m. N. of Tübingen.

Babie, or Bababeg, a town of Persia, on the confines of the Desert of Kerman, situate at about an equal distance from the cities of Kerman, Shiraz and Zed.

Babingley, a village of Norfolk, Eng. is noted as being the place where Felix the Burgundian first landed, to instruct the East Angles in the doctrines of the gospel, and where the first church is said to have been erected. It is 4 m. N. E. of Lynn.

Babuyones, a cluster of six or seven small islands in the North Pacific Ocean, 10 leagues N. of the isle of Luconia. The chief produce is wax, ebony, bananas, coconos, and plantains.

Babylon, the capital of the ancient kingdom of Babylonia or Chaldea. Semiramis is said by some, and Belus by others, to have founded this city. But by whomsoever it was founded, Nebuchadnezzar embellished it, and made it one of the wonders of the world. The most famous works in and about it were, the walls of the city, the temple of Belus, Nebuchadnezzar's palace, the hanging gardens, the banks of the river, the artificial lake, and the canals. The walls were 87 feet thick, 350 feet high, and 60 miles in circumference, forming an exact square, having 100 gates of solid brass, 25 on each side, with a street running from each in a straight line to the opposite gate; so that there were in all 50 great streets, each 15 miles long. It is supposed to have stood on both banks of the Euphrates, in long. 44. 0. E. lat. 32. 0. N. Alexander of Macedon died here April 21, B. C. 323.

Baca, or Baza, a town of Spain, in Granada, 15 m. N. E. of Guadix. Pop. about 7,000.

Bach, or Batha, a town of Hungary, formerly the see of a bishop, seated near the Danube, 30 m. E. N. E. of Funfkirchen, and 85 S. of Buda.

Bacharach, a town of Germany, in the palatinate of the Rhine. It is famous for its wine, and stands at the foot of a mountain, near the Rhine, 24 m. S. by E. of Coblenz. The Counts palatine had formerly a castle here, and levied toll on the produce and merchandize passing up and down the Rhine, which, from the extent of the exaction, was denominated the golden toll. It at present forms part of the Prussian territory.

Bachesserai, a town of Russia, in the province of Taurida. It was lately the residence of the Tartar clans of the Crimea, and the palace is a curious species of painted Chinese structure. Near this place, on a high rock, is an old fort called the Jews' Citadel, so named as having been from time immemorial inhabited by about 200 families of Jews. Bachesserai is seated in a deep valley, on the rivulet Katsa, 18 m. S. S. W. of Sympheropol.

Bachian, an island, the largest and most southern of the proper Moluccas. It is 70 m. in circumference, and the interior rises into woody hills. It is governed by a sultan, who is also sovereign of Ouby and Ceram; and he receives a pension from the Dutch, either for the destruction or supply of nutmegs. The Dutch first formed a settlement here in 1610. Zabonga is the chief town. Long. 127. 0. E. lat. 0. 25. S.

Bachu, or Baku, a city of Shirvan, in Persia, situate on the shore of a fine haven on the W. side of the Caspian Sea. It was taken possession of by Russia at the commencement of the last century; ceded back to Persia in 1736, and repossessed by Russia, since 1801. The country round abounds in petroleum, and, in some places, constantly emits flame, but without producing any very sensible degree of heat. It was probably this district that gave rise to the sect of the Parsees, Guebres, or Fire Worshipers, by whom it was formerly much resorted to. A similar phenomenon of ignited petroleum prevailed near Brosely, in Shropshire, Eng. from 1711 to 1750, since when the flame has entirely ceased. What was more singular at Brosely was, that the flame emitted from a spring of water. There are a number of inflammable springs in the western part of N. York. See Burning Springs. Baku is now an inconsiderable place; it is in 40. 5. N. lat. and 50. 10. E. long.

Badajoz, a town of Spain, capital of Estremadura, and a bishop's see. It is famous for a bridge built by the Romans over the Guadiana. On this bridge the Portuguese were defeated by don John of Asturias, in 1661. Badajoz was taken by the French in 1809, and retaken by the allied army, under Lord Wellington, by storm, on the 6th of April, 1812. It is a frontier town toward Portugal, and well fortified. It is 14 m. E. of Elvas, and 175 S. by W. of Madrid. Long. 6. 40. W. lat. 38. 45. N.

Badakshan, a city of Usbec Tartary, or Great Bucharia, capital of the province of Kilan. Gold, silver, and rubies are found in its vicinity; and caravans pass by this city to Cabul and China. It is seated on the main branch of the Gihon, about 100 miles from its source, at the foot of the Belur mountains, 120 m. E. of Balk. Long. 68. 50. N. lat. 37. 10. E.

Badbury, a village in Dorsetshire, Eng. on a considerable eminence, 4 m. N. W. of Wimborne. It was a summer station of the Romans, and many of their coins, urns, &c. have been found. Here is also a Saxon camp, which consists of three oblong ramparts.

Badelona, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, seated on the Mediterranean, 10 m. N. E. of Barcelona.

Baden, or Baaden, formerly a margravate, in the circle of Suabia, stretching along the east bank of the Rhine, from the canton of Basle, in Switzerland, on the south, in the lat. of 47. 30. to the bishopric of Spire, in the lat. of 49. 10. N. bounded on the E. by the Black Forest. It was divided into upper and lower, or Baden-Baden and Baden-Durlach, from the names of the chief towns of the two divisions. Under Napoleon's formation of the Rhenish confederacy in 1806, Baden was constituted a grand duchy, with some change of territory, divided into three parts of the Upper, Middle, and Lower Rhine; but receiving a further accession of territory of Brisgau, &c. in 1809, it was divided into the 10 following circles, viz. The Lake Danube, Weisen, Treisam, Kinsig, Murg, Pfutz and Enz, Neckar, Odenwald, and Main and Tauber, being names of so many rivers intersecting the territory; the code Napoleon was adopted as the constitution of the state, and the seat of government, established at Carlsruhe, about two miles from Durlach. The whole territory contains about 5,600 square miles, and a population of about 925,000, from the productive portion of whom a revenue of about £600,000 annually is collected for military and state purposes. That portion of the territory bordering on the Rhine, including the old margravate, is exceedingly fruitful, and contains about 180,000 inhabitants. The forests yield abundance of materials for building and fuel.

Baden, the capital of Upper Baden, with a cas-

Bas, on the top of a hill, where the prince often resides. It is remarkable for its hot baths, and is seated between the Murg and the Rhine, 40 m. W. of Stuttgart, and 20 S. of Carlsruhe. Long. 8. 22. E. lat. 48. 43. N.

Baden, a town of Switzerland, in Argau, capital of the county of the same name. Near it are some warm baths, mentioned by the ancients under the names of Aquæ and Thermae Helveticæ. In 1714, a treaty was concluded here between Germany and Spain. It is seated on the Limmat, 10 m. N. W. of Zurich. Long. 8. 24. E. lat. 47. 26. N.

Baden, a town of Austria, famous for its numerous hot baths; seated on the Suechat, 15 m. S. S. W. of Vienna. Also of a village in the Valais, Switzerland, with a hot bath of a sufficient degree of heat to boil an egg.

Badenweiler, a town of the grand duchy of Baden, in the circle of Weissen, much frequented for its hot baths, seated near the Rhine, 5 m. S. S. W. of Sulzburg.

Badgeworth, a village in Gloucestershire, Eng. 7 m. N. E. of Gloucester. Here is a mineral spring called Cold Pool, nearly the same in quality as that of Cheltenham.

Baeza, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, seated near the source of the Guadalquivir. It was once the residence of a Moorish king, and was since a bishop's see, and seat of an university, but is now deemed of little importance, although its population is still considerable. It lies four leagues E. of the great post road from Madrid to Cadiz by Cordova, and about 10. N. of Jaen.

Baffa, a seaport town at the west end of the Isle of Cyprus, with a fort, near the ancient Paphos, of which considerable ruins remain, particularly some broken columns, which probably belonged to the temple of Venus. Long. 32. 30. E. lat. 34. 50. N.

Baffin's Bay, a vast expanse of sea, so called from an English captain of the name of Baffin, who navigated it in 1616. It is entered from the Atlantic by Davis's Straits, between the long. of 54. and 67. W. and in the lat. of the Arctic Circle. It is still questionable whether it be a bay or not; and the English government, since the general peace of Europe in 1814, have sent several expeditions, to endeavour to penetrate in the direction of that sea into the Pacific Ocean.

Bagdad, a celebrated city of Asiatic Turkey, the capital of a pachalic of the same name, or, as it is now more commonly called, Irac Arabi; Bagdad is finely seated on the east bank of the noble river Tigris, and previous to the route to India by the Cape of Good Hope, it was the centre of a very extensive commerce. It was the capital of the Saracen empire, till taken by the Turks in the 13th century; since which it has often been an object of contention between the Turks and Persians, until it was taken the last time by the Turks, in 1631. It still continues to be a place of considerable resort, for all the commodities of Natolia, Syria, Persia, and India; but has lost much of its ancient splendour, and is not so opulent as when in the possession of the Persians. The tomb of the Jewish prophet Ezekiel is still shown here. It has several manufactories of silk, cotton, wool, and leather, and has a cannon foundry. The city is surrounded by a wall about five miles in circumference, and contains some commodious houses, but its general character is mean and dirty. Its markets are abundantly supplied with all kinds of provisions; but the great heat of its climate renders it uncomfortable; the summer season. It is about 50 miles north of the site of the ancient Babylon, 250 north of Bassora, and 8 deg. due east of Damascus. Lat. 33. 20. N. and 44. 46. E. long. Pop. estimated at from 60,000 to 90,000, three-fourths of whom are Turks, the remainder are Jews, Persians, and of various nations.

Baglana, a country of the Deccan of Hindoostan, bounded on the north by Guzerat, east by Candish and Dowlatabad, south by Visiapour, and west by the ocean. It is exceedingly mountainous, but fertile in many places.

Bagnalucca, or Banjatuka, a town of European Turkey, in the N. W. corner of Bosnia, on the border of Croatia, 55 m. N. W. of Serai.

Bagnara, a seaport of Naples, in Calabria Ulteriore. Here are several high waterfalls: and among the rocks are the ruins of the former town, in which 3,017 persons perished by an earthquake in 1783. It is situate near the straight of Messina, 15 m. N. N. E. of Reggio. Long. 16. 8. E. lat. 38. 15. N. Pop. about 5,000.

Bagnarea, a town of Italy, in the patrimony of St. Peter, 5 m. S. of Orvieto.

Bagnères, a town of France, in the department of Upper Pyrenees, famous for its baths and mineral waters; seated on the river Adour, 10 m. S. of Tarbes.

Bagnols, a town of France, in the department of Gard, near the river Cese, 8 m. S. of Pont St. Esprit. It has manufactures of silk.

Bagshot, a village in Surrey, Eng. 12 m. N. by E. of Farnham. It is surrounded by an extensive heath, bordered on the west by Windsor park. Since 1800 a considerable portion has been enclosed and brought under cultivation.

Bahamas, or Lucayos Islands, a group of Islands, forming part of the British West Indies, extending from the long. of 79. W. in the lat. of 28. in a S. E. direction, to the long. of 70. in the lat. of 21. N. The northern part lies contiguous to the coast of Florida, and the southern contiguous to the north end of St Domingo. The greater portion are mere rocks and uninhabited; the following are the principal islands: Bahama, Abaco, Andreas, New Providence, Eleuthera, Exuma, Cat Island, Long Island, Crooked Island, Mariguana, Great Caycos, Grand Turk, Inagua, Square Handkerchief. Of these Cat Island first deserves notice, as being the first land of the western hemisphere, discovered by Columbus on the 12th of Oct. 1492, by whom it was called Guanahana. New Providence is the best cultivated, producing a little sugar, coffee, and cotton, and exporting large quantities of fruit to the U. S. of America. Exuma and Turks Islands have exported 30,000 tons of salt annually; but the chief occupation of the inhabitants, is the turtle fishery. The passage between the northernmost island and the coast of Florida is called the Bahama channel, and another passage between Long and Crooked islands is called the windward passage, and forms the route of the ships bound from Jamaica to Europe: the Jamaica packet touches at Crooked Island homeward-bound as the point of departure. The number of slaves upon the whole islands according to a return made to parliament in 1823, was 10,108, and the white population probably amounts to about 4,000.

Bakar, an interior province of Hindoostan, west of Bengal; bounded on the north by Nepaul, west by Oude and Allahabad, and south by Bezar and Orissa. It is intersected by the Ganges from west to east, which receives several tributary streams in its course through the province, the most considerable of which are, the Coosey from the north, and the Soane from the south. It is an exceedingly fertile district; its rice is the finest of all Hindoostan; sugar, silk, indigo, cotton, and salt petre are produced in great abundance. Patna on the south bank of the Ganges, is the chief town. The town of Bahar, formerly the capital, is about 35 m. S. E. of Patna. The whole province is subject to the English East India Company.

Bahia, one of the 12 captaincies of Brazil, lying south of Pernambuco, and extending from the 11th to nearly the 16th deg. of S. lat. and west from the Atlantic Ocean in the long. of 40. to a ridge of mountains in 44. which bound it on the west; it is intersected by another ridge of mountains, its whole extent from south to north in the long. of about 42. and the river St. Francisco runs from south to north between the two ridges of mountains, to the north extremity of the territory; when it abruptly changes its course to the east forming the boundary between Bahia and Pernambuco. Bahia contains a surface of about 50,000 sq. miles, and is the most extensively cultivated district of all Brazil; sugar, coffee, cotton, and tobacco are all produced in great abundance, and the culture is progressively extending. The forests abound in a variety of wood, and are so dense as to be almost impenetrable. The chief town of the same name, or as it is sometimes called, St. Salvador, is situate in lat 12. 45. S. and 38. 25. W. long. on the east bank of a noble bay, called the bay of All Saints, which runs up from south to north about 40 m. being about 8 m. wide at its mouth. Baltic, an inland sea, in the N. W. of Europe, between the coasts of Sweden, Russia, Courland, Prussia, Germany, and Denmark, extending from the 54th to the 60th deg. of N. lat. the Gulf of Bothnia running up to the lat. of 66. and lying between the 16th and 22nd deg. of W. long. the Gulf of Livonia extending 2 deg. further west, and that of Finland as far as 30. Its surface is estimated at 120,000 sq. miles, it contains a great number of islands, the principal of which are Åland, Dago, Oesel, Gothland, Öland, Bornholm, Rugen, and Laland; and the islands of Zealand and Funen separate it from the Cattegat, by which it communicates with the ocean. There are three navigable channels into the Baltic from the sea called the Cattegat, which communicates with the German Ocean: 1st. which is the most northerly and most frequented, is called the Sound, between the coast of Sweden N. and the coast of the Isle of Zealand S. This passage is about four miles across, and is navigated by 8,000 to 9,000 sail of vessels annually, which pay a trifling tax to the Danish government, for the maintenance of the light-houses on the coasts of the several channels. The middle channel between the south side of the Isle of Zealand, and the Isles of Funen and Laland is called the Great Belt; and the most southerly, between the isle of Funen and Laland, and the coast of Jutland, the Little Belt; but the navigation of both is circuitous and intricate compared with the Sound, and they are only passed under very particular circumstances. There is little or no tide within the Baltic, and the channels and harbours are generally frozen up three or four months in the winter. Amber is found on the coast of Prussia.

Baltimore, a County of Maryland, on Chesapeake Bay. Pop. 120,876. The city of Baltimore is the seat of justice.

Baltimore, the chief city in Maryland, near the mouth of the river Patuxent on the western side of Chesapeake Bay, is a place of great commerce and wealth. It was founded in 1729, but grew so slowly that in 1752 it consisted of only 25 houses. Since the revolution it has increased with astonishing rapidity and at present is one of the first American cities. It stands at the head of tide-water, 14 miles from the bay, and contains 45 churches, 5 markets, 2 theatres, 10 banks, an exchange, a public library, St. Mary's College and the University of Maryland, a lunatic asylum, an observatory, 2 museums, and several elegant public fountains. The Cathedral is an Ionic structure 190 feet in length and 127 feet high to the cross at the summit of the dome. It contains the largest organ in the United States, having 6,000 pipes and 36 stops. Here are also two splendid paintings. The Merchants' Exchange was built by private subscription, and is 255 feet in length, with a hall 86 feet by 53, lighted from the dome of the building; in this hall the merchants meet daily to transact business.

There are two splendid monuments at Baltimore. The Battle Monument is built of marble, 55 feet in height, and commemorates the defeat of the British in their attack upon the city in 1814. The Washington Monument is also of white marble, 50 feet square at the base and sustaining a colossal statue of Washington at the height of 163 feet from the ground. The City Hotel is one of the first public houses in the country. Most of the streets of the city are broad and at right angles. Fell's Point, the lower part of the city, is the quarter where most of the stores and shipping are collected. Baltimore is the greatest flour market in the United States. In the immediate neighbourhood are above 60 flour mills, a single one of which has produced 32,000 barrels in a year. In the same compass are also 12 cotton manufactories, and others of cloth, powder, paper, iron, glass, steam engines, chemical works, &c. Baltimore has 80,625 inhabitants and is the third commercial city in the United States. It is in lat. 39. 17. N. and long. 76. 36. W. 37 m. N. E. Washington, and 100 m. S. W. Philadelphia.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad extends from this city to the Ohio river at Pittsburgh, 300 miles. It was begun in 1829 and a great portion of it is already completed. There are several viaducts and embankments in its course near Baltimore, substantially built of granite, and a deep cut three quarters of a mile long and 70 feet deep. Many cars are already in operation upon the rail road

Some of them are drawn by horse power, some driven by steam and some by wind. The cars with sails go sometimes 25 miles an hour and can lie within 4 points of the wind. The whole distance from Baltimore to Pittsburgh, when completed, will be travelled according to estimation, by horse power in 30 hours, and by steam in 20. Another railroad has been commenced to extend from Baltimore to York Haven on the Susquehanna, 60 miles.

Banda, the chief of the Banda, or Nutmeg Islands in the Indian Ocean. The group comprises the isle called Lantor, and six or seven others. The nutmeg, covered with mace, grows principally on these islands. It flourishes best in a black mould, and grows also among the lavas of Gonong, the highest of all the islands, its summit being 1,940 ft. above the sea. In its general appearance the nutmeg resembles the clove tree, only it is less pointed at the top, and its branches are more spreading. Its leaves are similar to those of the pear tree, but larger, and like those of the nut tribe are dark green on the upper surface and gray beneath. After small white flowers it produces a fruit very similar in form and colour to a nectarine. When ripe it resembles a ripe peach, and bursting at the furrow, discovers the nutmeg with its reticulated coat, the mace, of a fine crimson colour. The external pulpy covering has an astringent taste. Within the mace is the nutmeg, inclosed in a thin shell of a glossy black, and easily broken. It has 8 varieties which appear to be permanent. Its cultivation is nice and difficult. The best trees are produced from the seeds voided by a blue pigeon called the nutmeg bird. These islands have been subject to the Dutch ever since 1609, when they expelled both the English and natives. They are all very small, the largest being only 20 m. in circumference, and are subject to earthquakes. Banda was taken by the English, in 1796, and restored in 1802. Retaken in 1810, and restored again at the peace in 1814. Lat. 4. 40. S. long. 121. E.

Banda Oriental, or Eastern Shore, a district of the United Provinces of Buenos Ayres, lying in the eastern part, between the river Uruguay and the sea. It is bounded N. by Brazil and S. by the bay of the Rio de la Plata, and contains about 70,000 sq. m. It is a fertile and well watered district and has been the subject of contention and warfare between the Buenos Ayrean and Brazilian governments. Monte Video is the chief town.

Bandon, or Bandon-bridge, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Cork. It is commonly a military station, and has manufactures of cotton, camlets, ticking, &c. It is situate on a river of the same name, 13 m. S. W. of Cork. It extends into three parishes, the part in the parish of Desart, contained in 1820, 10,179 inhabitants, and the remainder about 4,000 more.

Banff, a County of Scotland, bounded on the N. by the ocean, S. E. by Aberdeenshire, and W. by Murrayshire. Its greatest length is 50 miles, and its extent along the coast 22, but the main breadth is not more than 16. The south part is very mountainous, but the northern district is level and fertile. The principal rivers are the Deveron and Spey, which form a part of its east and west boundaries, and yield abundance of fine salmon. The Aven rises from a small lake at the south extremity of the county, falling into the Spey, where that river divides the county from Murrayshire. The principal towns are Gamry, Cullen, Fochabers, Keith, Aberlour, and Kirkmichael.

Banff, the chief town of the preceding county, is situate at its N. W. extremity, on the east bank of the Deveron, over which is a handsome bridge of seven arches. It has some manufactures of linen and cotton, but it is more a place of fashionable resort than either a manufacturing or commercial town. The town-hall was built in 1798, and is a handsome edifice. It is a royal burgh, governed by a provost, four bailies, and 12 councillors. 45 m. N. of Aberdeen, and 167 of Edinburgh. Pop. in 1820, 3,855.

Bangalore, a city of Hindoostan, in Mysore. It had a strong fort, built by Hyder, deemed the bulwark of Mysore, toward Arcot: it was taken by the English in 1791, and restored the next year to Tippon, who destroyed it: but since reverted to the English. The palace is composed of mud, yet not without some degree of magnificence, and there are two extensive gardens made by the two sultans. The chief manufactures are silk and cotton cloths, muslins, leather, and oil. It is 74 m. N. E. of Seringapatam. Long. 77. 37. E. lat. 13. 0. N.

Bangor, a city of Wales, in Caernarvonshire. It is situate on the east shore of the Menai Strait on the high road from London to Holyhead. It was once so considerable, that it was called Bangor the great, and defended by a castle. The principal buildings are the cathedral and the bishop's palace. The see is of very great antiquity. The church was dedicated to St. Daniel, who was bishop about the year 516. It is 36 m. W. of St. Asaph, and 251 N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,579.

Bannbridge, a town of Ireland, in the county of Down, on the river Bann, 14 m. N. by E. of Newry, on the road to Belfast. Pop. in 1821, 1,715.

Bannockburn, a village of Scotland in the parish of St. Ninians, on the river Bannock, two miles south of Stirling. It is noted for a battle between Edward II. and Robert Bruce, in 1314, in which the former was defeated. Here also James the III. in 1487, was defeated by his subjects, wounded, and soon after murdered by a priest taking his confession.

Bannow, a town of Ireland, in the county of Wexford, seated on the east shore of a bay to which it gives name, 20 m. S. W. of Wexford. Long. 6 50. W. lat. 52. 12. N. Pop. in 1821, 1,298.

Bantam, a town on the N. W. coast of Java, capital of a kingdom of the same name, with two forts. It is divided into two parts by a river. The English and Danes had factories here till 1682, when they were expelled by the Dutch. The chief produce of the country is pepper, of which vast quantities were formerly exported by the Dutch, who deposed the kings of the ancient race, and monopolized the entire traffic of the country. Bantam, once populous and flourishing, is now a poor place, its harbour being so choked up that it is inaccessible to vessels of burden; its commerce is transferred to Batavia. Long. 105. 26. E. lat. 6. 20. S.

Bantry, a capacious bay, at the S. W. extremity of Ireland, on the coast of Cork, capable of containing all the shipping of Europe; but somewhat exposed to the swells of the Atlantic Ocean. A French fleet endeavoured to land succours of arms in this bay to the adherents of James II. 1689, and they made another unsuccessful attempt to effect a landing with a formidable force 1796. It is 26 miles long, 3 broad, and 40 fathoms deep in the middle. There is a town named Bantry, at the head of the bay on the east side, the spacious harbour of which is defended from the swells of the ocean by the island of Whiddy. It is 46 m. W. by S. of Cork, and 163 from Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 3,659.

Banwell, a village in Somersetshire, Eng. four miles N. N. W. of Axbridge. Here was a monastery, founded by one of the Saxon princes, which was destroyed by the Danes. On its site an episcopal palace was erected, some remains of which are to be seen near the church. Pop. 1,430.

Barbadoes, the most easterly of the Windward islands, in the West Indies, 25 m. long and 15 broad, subject to Great Britain. The soil is beautifully undulated, and yields most of the productions common to the climate, but the chief object of culture is the sugar cane, the produce of which is about 15,000 tons of sugar annually, which, with some ginger and arrow-root, form its main exports. The island suffered greatly by the storm, on the 10th of October, 1780, when upwards of 4,000 persons perished by its violence, and at the commencement of the 19th century was considerably on the decline, the soil indicating symptoms of exhaustion, until the year 1813, when a very singular phenomenon occurred, which contributed essentially to its resuscitation; a vast dense cloud of matter from the eastward, composed apparently of volcanic eruption, fell, and covered nearly the whole surface of the island, which tended greatly to its fertility. Barbadoes was constituted an ecclesiastical see over the whole of the Carribee Islands in 1824. It is also the chief seat of commissariat for the same, which occasions the internal commerce of the island to be considerable. It was first settled by the English in 1624; after the restoration of Charles II. a duty of 41-3 per ct. was exacted upon all produce exported, under the pretext of maintaining and keeping in repair the forts of the island, and for other protection. The duty has continued 150 years, and in 1820 amounted to £18,637, but wholly converted into pensions, and the expenses of the island defrayed out of the taxes levied in England. It is divided into five districts and 11 parishes. Bridgetown, the chief town, is in lat. 13. 5. N. and 59. 43. W. long. Charles's, James's, and Speight's towns are the other towns of the island; the free population amounts to about 20,000.

Barbarea, St. a town on the west coast of North America, capital of a jurisdiction of its name. It stands in a rugged, barren country, but has a good roadstead. Long. 119. 17. W. lat. 34. 54. N.

Barbareen, a village of Ceylon, on the west coast, 35 m. south of Colombo. It has a harbour for ship-boats, and a considerable manufacture of cordage and cables from the cocoa tree.

Barbary, or the Barbary States, comprise the whole northern coast of North Africa, bordering on the Mediterranean Sea from the Atlantic Ocean to Egypt; bounded or rather intersected, on the south by the Atlas chain of mountains and bounded by the deserts of Sahara, Tuarick, and Lybia, extending in length from the long. of 10. W. to 25. of E. and varying in breadth from 300 to 600 or 700 m. between the lat. of 29. and 37. N. divided into the six following sovereignties, or states: viz. first, beginning with the west; Morocco, bordering wholly on the Atlantic Ocean, Fez, forming the north-west corner of the African continent, and Algiers, Tunis, Tripoli, and Barca, all bordering on the Mediterranean. This extensive territory was known to the ancients by the name of Mauritania, Numidia, Africa Proper, and Lybia, and at one period contended with Rome for the empire of the world; and although at the present day its inhabitants are among the most unsocial and illiterate of the communities of civilization, they were at one period as distinguished for their attainments in art, as in arms. The whole country abounds in local beauties, and possesses all the advantages of soil and climate which man can desire: the soil yields great crops of maize and corn, and all the choice fruits, such as lemons, oranges, the vine, olives, figs, almonds, and dates are in great profusion; the mountains are rich in mineral substances, and all the domestic animals common to Europe abound over the whole country; the horses are much esteemed for their fleetness and beauty. The lion, panther, and hyæna, and other ferocious animals are numerous in the mountains, and frequently make inroads into the plains. Reptiles are also very numerous, and the Boa-Constrictor, the most ferocious of the serpent kind, is common on the borders of the deserts. The external commerce of the country is limited, but will be more particularly adverted to when treating of the respective divisions. Mahometanism, in its utmost degree of personal indulgence and wantonness of power, prevails alike in all the states, and restrains all rational and social advancement.

Barberino, a town of Tuscany, at the foot of the Apennines, on the river Sieva, 12 m. N. of Florence.

Barbezieux, a town of France, in the department of Charente, with a mineral spring, and a manufacture of linen cloth. It is 45 m. N. E. of Bordeaux. Pop. 2,750.

Barca, one of the six Barbary states, the ancient Cyrenaica, on the south coast of the Mediterranean, between Tripoli and Egypt. The south part is a barren desert, inhabited by wandering Arabs. The north part along the coast is fertile and well peopled. It belongs to the Turks, and is governed by a sangiac, dependent on the bashaw, who resides at Tripoli. Derne is the capital.

Barcelona, a city of Spain, capital of Catalonia, and a bishop's see, with a good harbour, on the Mediterranean. It is of an oblong form, defended by a strong fort, called Montjuich, which stands on a rocky mountain, a mile west of the town. It has double walls on the north and east, and the sea on the south, with a mole for the security of ships. It is divided into the new and old town, by a wall and a ditch; and the sea having retired considerably from the portgates, a whole quarter of the town now stands on the sands that were once the bottom of the harbour. It has a fine university, an inquisition, a cathedral with two lofty towers, a palace for the viceroy, a large exchange, an extensive cannon foundry, an arsenal containing arms for several thousand men, and docks for the building of galleys. It has various manufactures, but is more particularly distinguished for those of fire arms of all kinds, swords, cutlery, and soap, and there are several very extensive distilleries of brandy; its commerce is general. In 1705 it was taken by the earl of Peterborough, after a siege of three weeks. In 1706, Philip V. invested it with a numerous army, but was obliged to raise the siege. In 1714, it was taken by the French and Spaniards, and a citadel built to keep it in awe. The French took this city by treachery in 1808. In 1823 it held out to the last in favour of the constitutionalists, and did not yield until all hope or expectation of successful resistance was obviously useless. It is 250 m. E. by N. of Madrid. Long. 2. 12. E. lat. 41. 23. N. Pop. of the city and the new town or suburb of Barceloneta 120,000.

Bas, a small island off the N. coast of the department of Finisterre, France, in N. lat. 48. 46. W. long. 4. 2.

Basaritschick, a town of European Turkey, in Rumania. It has a great trade, and is seated on the river Meritz. Long. 24. 40. E. lat. 42. 19. N.

Basel, Basle, or Bale, a canton of Switzerland, 24 miles long and 21 broad; bounded on the north by Briegau, east by the Forest towns, south by the canton of Soleure, and west by the bishopric of Basel and France. It contains about 38,000 inhabitants, and is of the reformed religion.

Basel a bishopric in the N. W. part of Switzerland; bounded on the east by the canton of Basel, south by that of Soleure, and west and north by France. The bishop was a prince of the German empire. In 1798 the French seized on this territory, annexed it to France, and made it a new department called Mont Terrible.

Basel, the capital of the canton of the same name, and the largest town in Switzerland, is situate at the north extremity of the canton, and on the frontiers of France on the west, and the duchy of Baden on the east. It is surrounded by thick walls, flanked by towers and bastions; and is divided into two parts by the Rhine, which communicate by a handsome bridge. The largest part is on this side of Switzerland, and the least on that of Germany. The larger has five gates, six suburbs, numerous streets and fountains, and is partly seated on a hill; the other stands on a plain, and has but two gates, with several streets and fountains. The principal church is an elegant gothic building but disfigured by rose-coloured paint spread over the whole edifice. Under a marble tomb in it is interred the great Erasmus, who died in 1536. The town-house, and fine paintings in fresco are much admired. The University founded in 1459, has a fine library and a rich cabinet of medals. The clocks here are always an hour too fast, because the town-clock went so on a day appointed to murder the magistrates, by which the conspiracy was disconcerted. Basel has several manufactures, particularly of paper, ribands, and cottons; and it carries on an extensive trade. Three treaties of peace were concluded here in one year, 1796, with the French republic; namely, by Prussia, Spain, and Hesse Cassel. The allies passed through this city, when they invaded France, in December, 1813. Basel is capable of containing 100,000 inhabitants; but the number is scarcely more than 14,000. It is 174 m. N. by E. of Geneva, and 250 E. by S. of Paris. Long. 7. 30. E. lat. 47. 35. N.

Bashee, an island in the China Sea, the most eastern of a cluster called from this, the Bashee islands, lying to the South of Formosa. The productions are plantains, bananas, pine-apples, sugar-canes, potatoes, yams and cotton. The quadrupeds are goats and hogs. Bashee is of a circular form, six miles in diameter, and has a town of the same name. Long. 121. 50. E. lat. 20. 30. N.

Basilicata, a maritime province, in the south of Naples, bounded on the north by Capitanata and Bari, east by the gulf of Taranta, south by Calabria Citeriore and west by Principata Citeriore and Ulteriore. It has some mountains continually covered with snow, but is fertile in corn, wine, oil, cotton, honey and saffron. Arcoerenzia is the capital.

Basiliotamo, a river of European Turkey, in the Moera, which flows into the gulf of Colocythia. It was called Eurotas by the ancients.

Basingstoke, a town in Hampshire, Eng. It has a great trade in corn and malt, a manufacture of druggets and shallons, and a navigable canal to the river Wey, near its entrance into the Thames; and being situate at the junction of several great roads, from all parts of the West of England, it is a place of considerable bustle. Pop. in 1821, 3,615. It is 18 m. N. N. E. of Winchester, and 45 W. by S. of London.

The village of Old Basing, which is a township in the parish of Basingstoke, situate about two miles in the east, is distinguished for the determined stand which it made against the forces of Cromwell, by whom it was ultimately taken, when he put nearly the whole garrison to the sword, and razed the fortress, which was the residence of the marquis of Winchester, to the ground. Pop. 1073.

Baskenridge, p.t. Somerset Co. N. J. 8 m. S. W. Morristown. General Lee was taken prisoner here by the British during the revolutionary war.

Basques, a late territory of France, which included Lower Navarre, Labourd, and Soule, and now forms with Bearn, the department of Lower Pyrenees.

Bass, an insulated rock near the coast of Scotland, at the entrance of the Frith of Forth, between the towns of North Berwick and Dunbar. On the south side it is almost conic, on the other it overhangs the sea in a tremendous manner. It is inaccessible on all sides, except the south-west, and there it is with difficulty a man can climb up by the help of a rope or ladder. In May and June it is quite covered with the nests, eggs, and young birds of the gannets and solan geese. The rock is one mile in circumference, and has a rabbit warren and pasture for a few sheep. A ruinous castle, once the state prison of Scotland, stands at the edge of the precipice. The garrison in 1694, surrendered to king William, and the fortifications were demolished.

Bass Islands, a group of islands in Lake Erie, comprised in Huron county, Ohio. There are 3 large and several smaller ones. The southernmost contains the haven of Put-in-Bay, near which Commodore Perry engaged and captured the whole British squadron, Sept. 10th, 1813.

Bass's Strait, a channel about 40 leagues wide, which separates Van Diemen's Land from the south extremity of New Holland. It contains a chain of islands that run north and south. This strait was discovered, in 1796, by surgeon Bass, in an open whale-boat and passed through by him and lieutenant Flinders, in the Norfolk, in 1799.

Bassano, a town in the north of Italy, in Vincenzino, on the east bank of the river Brenta, in a country productive of excellent wine and oil. The French defeated the Austrians at this place in 1796. It is 18 m. N. of Vicenza.

Basses, or La Basse, a town of France, in the department of Nord, formerly of great strength, but dismantled by Louis XIV. It is seated on the Deule. 18 m. S. W. of Lisle.

Basseen, a town of Hindoostan, in the country of Baglana. It was taken by the English in 1780, but restored to the Mahrattas in 1783. It stands on the sea-coast, opposite the N. W. point of the island of Salsette, 30 m. N. of Bombay. Long. 72. 40. E. lat. 19. 20. N.

Bassenthwaite-water, a lake in Cumberland, three miles N. W. of Keswick. It is four miles long, bounded on one side by high hills, wooded, in many places, to their bases; on the other, by the fields and the skirts of Skiddaw. The river Derwent flows through its whole length. There is a village named Bassenthwaite on the east bank of the lake, containing 264 inhabitants.

Basseterre, the capital of St. Christopher, built by the French, when this part of the island was in possession, before it was ceded to the English in 1713. It is situate on the S. E. end of the island, and is defended by three forts. Long. 63. 13. W. lat. 17. 10. N.

Basseterre, the capital of Guadaloupe, on the S. W. part of the island, defended by a citadel and other fortifications. Long. 61. 59. W. lat. 15. 59. N.

Bassien, or Persaim, a city of Pegu, capital of the province of Bassien. It is a trading place; situate on a river of the same name, which is the west branch of the Irrawaddy, 110 m. S. W. of Pegu. Long. 94. 53. E. lat. 16. 22. N.

Bassorah, or Barra, a city and seaport of Asiatic Turkey, in Irac Arabi. It stands on the west bank of the Euphrates, or Shat-ul-Arab, navigable for ships of 500 tons burthen up to the town, about 65 m. above the entrance of the river, into the Gulf of Persia. Bassorah appears to have been founded about the middle of the seventh century, and progressively advanced into importance until it became the most considerable trading town of all western Asia; and previous to the route to India by the Cape of Good Hope, it was the medium through which a great portion of the commerce of Asia passed to Venice and Genoa, and from thence over western Europe. It was taken possession of by the Turks, in 1688, since which period it has continued to decline, having been alternately exposed to the interruptions of the Persians, Arabs, and Turks; and since the commencement of the 19th century, when the tide of commerce began to set from the west to the east, Smyrna has become what Bassorah was, for so many centuries, the emporium of the greater portion of the commerce of that part of the world. Bassorah however still continues to be a place of considerable traffic, which is participated in, more or less, by most of the trading nations of both Europe and Asia. The city is surrounded by a wall of clay, said to be six miles in circumference, mounted with a great number of cannon; the streets are bad and narrow, and the houses constructed of bricks have a mean aspect. It is nominally under the dominion of Turkey, but governed by an Arab chieftain, with little deference to the Ottoman authority. The great desert of Arabia runs up nearly to the town; the immediate vicinity, however, is very fertile. A wall of several miles in extent has been constructed on the side of the desert, as a check on the predatory incursions of the Arabs, who frequently commit depredations under the very walls of the town. The population is estimated at about 60,000, among whom are a considerable number of Jews, Armenians, and Arabs, and natives of the more eastern parts of Asia. It is about 210 m. S. W. of Isphahan, in lat. 30. 30. N. and 47. 45. E. long.

Bastia, a seaport of European Turkey, in Albania, opposite the island of Corfu, at the mouth of the Calamu. Long. 20. 20. E. lat. 39. 40. N.

Bastia, a city on the N. E. coast of the Island of Corsica, capital of the island, with a good harbour and a strong castle. It was taken by the English in 1794. It is 80 m. S. S. W. of Leghorn. Long. 9. 20. E. lat. 42. 38. N. Pop. about 11,500

Bastimentos, small islands near the isthmus of Darien, at the entrance of the bay of Nombre de Dios, with a fort and a good harbour. Long. 79. 45. W. lat. 9. 30. N.

Bastogne, a city of the Netherlands, in Luxemburg, near the forest of Ardennes. It was fortified by the French in 1688, and commonly known among them by the name of Paris in Ardennes. It is 23 m. N. N. W. of Luxemburg.

Barnaspattana, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a fort and a celebrated mosque, 60 m. E. by N. of Nagura.

Batabano, a town on the south coast of Cuba, situate on the north side of a large bay, opposite Pinos Island, 55 m. S. S. W. of Havannah. Long. E. 0. W. lat. 23. 30. N.

Batacole, a town of Hindoostan, on the coast of Canara. The country produces a great quantity of pepper. It is 10 m. N. of Barcelore.

Batacole, a small fortress on the east side of Ceylon, built by the Dutch. It is of great importance, an account of the extreme fertility of the adjacent country, which, during a war, or times of scarcity in the district of Trincomale, can supply the garrisons there with all kinds of provisions. It surrendered to the English in 1796; and is situate at the head of a deep bay, 54 m. S. S. E. of Trincomale.

Batalha, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, celebrated for its rich monastery, founded, in 1386, by John I. who is interred here, with his queen Philippa. It is 8 m. S. S. W. of Lorida.

Batavia, the ancient name of an island in Holland, whence the Dutch are sometimes called Batavians.

Batavia, a city and seaport, on the N. E. part of the island of Java, capital of all the Dutch settlements in the East Indies, finely situate in the bosom of a spacious bay. The fort is built of coral rock, brought from some of the adjoining islands, and has a fortification of brick. A part of the town wall is built of dense lava from the mountains in the centre of Java. No stone, of any kind, is to be found for many miles beyond this city; but marble and granite are brought here from China. The harbour is excellent, and there are canals in the principal streets, planted on each side with trees, after the manner of the towns in Holland. The inhabitants are composed of natives from nearly all the countries and islands of Asia and the Indian Ocean, as well as of most of the chief trading parts of Europe and America, amongst whom the number of Chinese is considerable.

The city was founded in 1619, and rose rapidly into importance; during the eighteenth century it was deemed the finest European settlement in all Asia; and although considered unhealthy, from the influence of the heat of the climate on the mud and stagnant waters of the canals and streams by which it is intersected, it was vainly denominated by the Dutch, the "Queen of the East." The houses of two streets, forming the European part of the town, are handsome and commodious, and vie with if they do not excel in capaciousness and convenience those of the best towns in Holland; but the parts occupied by the Javanese, Chinese, and other natives of the east, like most of the Asiatic towns, are crowded, mean, and dirty. Batavia was very sensibly affected by the war of 1793, and became almost deserted, until its capture, with the whole of the Island of Java, by the English, in 1811, when it became again the centre of an extensive commerce. It was ceded back to the Dutch on the peace of 1814, who having relaxed somewhat from their former system of proscription and monopoly in their commercial regulations, Batavia continues a flourishing and important place. The stadthouse is the principal edifice deserving of notice. The natives of the several nations and countries who compose the population, which amounts to about 50,000, have each their churches, mosques, and temples, but there are none that merit any particular notice. The nature of its commerce will be more fully elucidated under the head of Java. The observatory is in lat. 69. S. and 106. 52. E. long.

Batavia, p.t. Genesee Co. N. Y. 36 m. N. E. Buffalo. Pop. 4,271. It is a handsome town, with considerable trade.

Bath, a city of England, in the east corner of the county of Somerset, on the confines of Gloucester and Wilts; it is bounded on the north by a range of hills, up the declivity of which buildings have been constructed in varied, ornamental, and tasteful styles of architecture, terraces, crescents, &c. of a beautiful white stone, dug on the spot. The city is beautifully situated on the river Avon. Its foundation is generally ascribed to the Romans. A rude tradition, however, exists which would carry its origin back into more distant times, and attribute the honour of its commencement to one of the earliest British kings, who, being expelled while a prince from his father's court, cured himself of leprosy by accidentally washing in its waters. But rejecting what appears most fabulous in this tale, it is not improbable that the inhabitants of the district were well acquainted with the virtue of the spring before the arrival of the invaders, and that the elements of a town or village existed there from very early times. The Romans, characteristically luxurious in their baths, and choosing their situations with the most scrupulous care, were not likely to neglect the advantages which such a neighbourhood presented. The mildness of the air, and the lovely amphitheatre of hills which surrounds this valley of waters, would tend still farther to delight them with the station,—the best counterpart of their own Italy which the uncultivated land afforded,—and we accordingly learn from the best accredited accounts, that it shortly became the favourite residence of the Roman governors, and sometimes of the emperors. The form in which the city was first built was a parallelogram, extending from east to west about 400 yards, and from north to south about 390. It was fortified by a wall twenty feet high, and of a thickness varying from sixteen feet at the base to eight at the top. Several strong towers supported its angles; and its four gates stood one at each extremity of the two grand streets, which intersected each other, and divided the city into four parts. Near the centre of the town were built those splendid baths, of which the ruins were discovered in 1756 at the depth of twenty feet below the surface of the ground. Several other Roman relics have been also dug up in late years; and among them a head of Minerva, reckoned one of the most valuable remains of antiquity. In the time of William the Conqueror it was named as one of the royal demesnes; and in that of Rufus it was erected into a see by John de Villulo, who removed thither from Wells. After undergoing several changes during the political convulsions of the following centuries, it received a charter from queen Elizabeth in 1590, which was renewed and modified in 1794. According to this charter, it is governed by a mayor, eight aldermen, and twenty-four common councilmen; and sends two members to parliament.

The situation of Bath affords every advantage for architectural effect; and the arrangement of its streets and terraces, the splendour and richly ornamented character of the buildings, together with the luxurious beauty of the intervening gardens and villas, form one of the loveliest scenes that can be found in any city of these northern climes. The hills on which it is built open on the two opposite sides to admit the Avon, which, flowing through the valley, and being the principal channel for the trade of the neighbouring counties, adds greatly to the beauty and liveliness of the prospect. As the streets rise one above the other, according to the gradual elevation of the hills, the principal part of the city at a distance has a close resemblance to the interior of a mighty theatre, which gave rise to Smollet's well-known sarcasm, "an antique amphitheatre turned inside out." The opinion of the novelist has not been unsupported by others; and it is argued by persons of the best taste, that however imposing the prospect of Bath is at a distance, the architecture, when more closely inspected, is greatly defective in taste and correctness of design.

The city is divided into four parishes—St. Peter's and St. Paul, St. James's, St. Michael's, and Walcot; besides which there are some out-parishes, now closely connected with the more ancient part of the town. The abbey church is regarded as one of the most beautiful specimens of the richly ornamented style of Gothic architecture that exists, but its numerous windows, amounting to fifty-two, have gained it the appellation of the lantern of England. Some of the monuments it contains are very much admired; and the oratory of prior Bird, who died in the early part of the sixteenth century, is extremely rich in monumental beauties. Among the tombs which generally attract attention in this church, are those of lady Waller, wife of the celebrated sir William Waller; of the noted comedian Quin, of bishop Montague, and Beau Nash, the well-known originator of most of the regulations of Bath etiquette. There are few names connected with the history of the city better known to fame than that of this celebrated master of fashion; and his fortunes are well calculated to point a moral for the place of which he was the hero. He was born in 1674, at Swansea in Glamorganshire, and was intended for the law, but entered the army; which, taking disgust at the discipline and his subordinate rank, he soon forsook, and took chambers in the Temple. Here he devoted himself entirely to pleasure and fashion; and when king William visited the Inn, he was chosen as master of the pageant with which it was customary to welcome the monarch. So pleased was William with the entertainment, that he offered him the honour of knighthood; but Nash refused it, saying, "Please your majesty, if you intend to make me a knight, I wish it may be one of your poor knights of Windsor, and then I shall have a fortune at least equal to support my title." In 1704 he was appointed master of the ceremonies at Bath; and immediately instituted a set of regulations, as remarkable for their strictness as for their judicious adaptation to the wants and society of the place. While in the plenitude of his power and popularity, Nash lived in the most splendid style of elegance, supporting his expenses by a long run of success at the gaming table. His dress was covered with expensive lace, and he wore a large white cocked hat. The chariot in which he rode was drawn by six grey horses, and attended by a long cavalcade of servants, some on horses, others on foot; while his progress through the streets was made known by a band of French horns and other instruments. His common title was the King of Bath; and his reign continued, with undiminished splendour, for more than fifteen years. His health then began to decline, and his resources grew less plentiful. As the change in his spirits and circumstances became more evident, his former acquaintances gradually forsook him; and he died at the age of eighty-eight, in comparative indigence and solitude. His character, however, was so estimated by the corporation of the city, that he was buried with great magnificence at its expense, and his epitaph, a neat tribute to his memory, was written by Dr. Harrington.

The Crescent, the North and South Parades, the Circus, and Pulteney-street, are the principal public avenues; but the great points of attraction for the visitors of Bath are the pump and ball-rooms: the former is 85 feet long; the interior is surrounded by three-quarter Corinthian columns, crowned with entablatures and surmounted by a five-feet coving. At the west end is a music gallery; and a recess at the east is occupied by a statue of Nash. In the centre of the south side stands the marble vase, from which the water is taken by an attendant and handed to the company.

The public baths are, the king's and queen's, the hot bath, and the cross bath; besides which, there are the duke of Kingston's, the corporation's, and some other private ones. The king's is on the south side of the pump-room, and is rather more than 65 feet long and 40 broad, containing, when filled, more than 346 tons of water: it is surrounded by a Doric colonnade; and in the centre, where the spring rises, is a brass hand-rail. In the hottest part of the bath the thermometer stands at 111; in the coolest, at 100. The hot bath raises it to 117.

There are several public charities in this city of great utility. The general hospital, which was founded at the benevolent instigation of Nash, receives poor persons, to whom the waters are likely to be beneficial, from all parts of the kingdom. Two or three establishments also exist for the support of aged men and women; and early in the last century the venerable Robert Nelson founded a charity school for fifty boys and fifty girls. Nor is Bath wanting in provisions for literary and scientific pursuits: it has a large public library, a society for the promotion of agriculture, and a philosophical society.

Bavaria, Palatinate, Duchy, Electorate, Circle, and Kingdom of. The former circle of Bavaria lies between the 47th and 50th deg. of N. lat. and the 11th and 14th of E. long., is bounded on the north-east by Bohemia, south-east and south by Austria and the Tyrol, south-west by Suabia, and north-west by Franconia; and comprises the palatinate, and principalities of Sulzbach and Neuberg, in the north; the duchy, which constituted the greater portion of the circle, divided into Lower and Upper, the county of Werdenfels in the south-west; the bishopric of Passau on the east; the provostship of Berchtolsagen, insulated in the archbishopric of Salzburg, which formed the south-east part of the circle, forming together an area of about 16,500 sq. miles, and containing a population of 1,300,000.

The Duchy of Bavaria, which formed about two-thirds of the circle, was part of the ancient Noricum, peopled from ancient Gaul, from which they were driven about 590 years B. C. It was constituted a duchy in the early part of the 10th century of the Christian era, under which title it continued uninterrupted until the reign of the emperor Ferdinand of Germany, who raised Bavaria into an Electorate of the Germanic confederacy; but Maximilian Emanuel, grandson of the first elector, forfeited his possessions, by violating his allegiance in entering into an alliance with France, against the emperor. He was however reinstated in his possessions in 1714, and the succeeding elector, Charles, introduced numerous salutary regulations into the social institutions of the state, under which it rose in prosperity and reputation, and continued to make advances in social improvement, and to retain its influence in the Germanic diet, until Napoleon interposed his power, at the commencement of the 19th century, when the elector was again induced to withdraw from the Germanic confederacy under the pledge of being vested with regal authority, and guaranteed in an accession of territory at the expense of Austria; hence the Kingdom of Bavaria, which was acknowledged by the emperor of Austria at the peace of Presburg in 1805: the accession of territory obtained with the regal title, lay on the side of Franconia, Suabia, and the Tyrol. The disaster experienced by Napoleon at Moscow in the winter of 1812, 1813, induced the new king to conclude a secret treaty with the confederate powers against his former patron, on condition of being guaranteed in the integrity of his newly acquired dominions, and at the congress of Vienna, in 1818, the boundaries of the Bavarian kingdom were finally adjusted, when the territory was divided into the eight following circles, with the chief towns of each annexed as follows: viz.

1 The Rhine,	W.	Spires.
2 Lower Maine,	N.	Wursburgh.
3 Upper ditto,	N.	Bayreuth.
4 Rezat,	N. W.	Anspach.
5 Upper Danube,	S. W.	Augsburg.
6 Iser,	S.	Munich.
7 Lower Danube,	E.	Passau.
8 Regen,	N. E.	Ratisbon.

Of these divisions the 1st lies on both sides of the Rhine, at the northern extremity of the territory of the grand duke of Baden, and is detached from the other seven. Nos. 2, 3, and 4, formed part of the circle of Franconia, and No. 5 of Suabia. The last three previously forming the grand duchy and the palatinate, the archbishopric of Salzburg having been ceded to Austria. The whole of this territory comprises about 32,000 sq. miles, and a population of about 3,600,000. The frontier parts of the kingdom of Bavaria are in general rugged and mountainous, but the inland parts are fertile in corn and pasture; all the various branches of manufacture of flax, wool, some silk, leather, and working of metals, are followed more or less as domestic occupations over most parts of the country; having but little surplus produce of any kind for external traffic. Bavaria may be regarded as possessing within itself all the means of domestic and social comfort. It is exceedingly well watered; the Danube, which rises on the border of the Black Forest in Suabia, runs from west to east through the heart of the country, passes Dillingen, Donauwerth, Neuberg, Ingolstadt, and Ratisbon to Passau, where it enters the archduchy of Austria. The Inn, Iser, Lech, and Iller, run from south to north into the Danube, and the Maine runs from east to west, past Schweinfurth and Wurtzburg into the Rhine. Four-fifths of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics, and the remainder Protestants: the latter however not only enjoy the unrestrained exercise of their worship, but are eligible to civil offices and military appointments. Like all the other Germanic states, military pretension and parade is the ruling passion of the government, and from 40,000 to 50,000 men are held under military discipline, to sustain which and other expenses of the state, taxes, equal to about 11,000,000 dollars American money, are levied annually on the produce of the labour of the people. Munich is the capital of the whole kingdom, and the seat of government, which is unlimited, and vested in the king, the title to which is hereditary. The power has however been exercised with discretion, prudence, and mildness, although not with all the wisdom and efficiency to be desired. Education has of late years been widely diffused through the Bavarian states; academies, lycæums, and universities, have been multiplied; productions of foreign literature have been imported; and the effects are already apparent in the improved condition of society and the gradual advance of moral and physical renovation. Bavaria may now be considered as holding the first rank among the secondary class of European states.

Bayonne, a city and seaport of France, in the department of Lower Pyrenees, and a bishop's see. The Nive and Adour unite their streams in the middle of the city, and proceed to the sea, at the distance of a mile. The first, which is deeper and more rapid than the Adour, divides the town into two unequal parts, the smallest of which is called the Bourg neuf, or new town. They have a communication by three timber bridges. A bank of sand, at the mouth of the Adour, renders the entrance of the harbour difficult. The citadel is the strongest in France, and the cathedral is remarkable for the height of the nef, and the delicacy of the pillars which support it. The military weapon, the bayonet, bears the name of this city, in which it was invented. The chocolate of Bayonne is famous; and it also exports wines, woollen cloths, silks, cottons, &c. The chief trade arises out of its relation with Spain; and it is a kind of emporium for the merchandise of that country. The court of France was held here for some time in 1808, when the king of Spain and his son, the prince of the Asturias, were invited here to settle their differences before Bonaparte, the result of which was, that they were made to sign a treaty, resigning the crown of Spain into his hands. Bayonne was besieged by the English in 1814, during which the French made a sally, and attacked the English with success, but were at length driven back. The loss of the British in this affair was considerable, and their commander wounded and taken prisoner. It is 25 m. S. W. of Dax and 518 S. by W. of Paris. Long. 1. 29. W. lat. 43. 29. N.

Bedford, an inland county of England. At the time Britain was invaded by the Romans, Cassibelinus, the chief of the inhabitants of this part of the country, was appointed to the command of all the forces of Britain, against Cæsar; and under the heptarchy of the Saxons, it formed part of the kingdom of Mercia, and the county-town is supposed to have been the burial-place of king Offa; it was afterwards the scene of many contests between Britons, Saxons, and Danes and at later periods became involved in the collisions between king John and the barons; and in 1642 it took the side of the people against the kingly authority of Charles I. The river Ouse intersects it by a very winding course from west to east; and the Ivel, with several tributary streams, waters the south part. The face of the country is varied with small hills and valleys; and on the south is a range of chalky hills, which, rising to a considerable elevation, and projecting irregularly over the valleys, give the landscape a bold and remarkable appearance. From the south-east corner to the middle of the county runs a line of good meadowland; and the north and east portions have a deep soil, which is well cultivated and produces large crops of corn. The mineral productions are limestone, coarse marble, and imperfect coal; and fuller's earth is obtained in considerable quantities. Mineral springs are found in different parts of the county, but they have not acquired much celebrity. The manufactures are chiefly confined to the making of lace and preparing straw plat for bonnets, baskets, toys, &c. The remains of both Saxon and Gothic architecture are to be seen in several of the churches, as also a few specimens of stained glass in their windows. Roman antiquities have also been frequently discovered in the county; and it is intersected by three Roman roads.

Bedford, the chief town of the preceding county, is situate about the centre of the county, on a spacious plain, north of the Chiltern hills, which run across the south part. The river Ouse, over which there is a beautiful stone bridge of five arches, divides the town into two parts. It has five churches, a county hospital, and the lunatic asylum, a well endowed public school, and about 50 almshouses, liberally endowed by Sir William Harpur, knight, a former inhabitant of the town. It is a borough town, governed by a mayor, recorder, aldermen, two chamberlains, and 13 common council, and returns two members to parliament, by the suffrage of the male inhabitants at large. It is the seat of assize, and of election for the county. Pop. in 1821, 5,466, 27 m. E. by N. of Buckingham, and 50 N. by W. of London.

Belfast, a town in the county of Antrim, Ireland, situate at the head of a spacious bay, about 15 miles in length, which forms a safe and commodious harbour. Vessels drawing more than eight or nine feet of water load and unload by lighters, about seven miles below the town. Belfast is a regular well-built town; the principal street runs in a straight line from the head of the bay, and is very handsome. It is the entrepot for a great portion of the linens manufactured in the north of Ireland, for the storing of which there is a spacious edifice called the Linen Hall, on the plan of the cloth halls in Leeds. It has a theatre and an exchange, over which is an assembly-room; two handsome churches, and several meeting-houses, and in 1806 a public school on an extensive scale was founded; there are also very extensive barracks on the north side of the town; the river Lagan, over which there is a bridge of 21 arches, falls into the bay, on the S. E. side, and communicates with Lough Neagh by a canal. The markets are exceedingly well supplied with all kinds of provisions, and large quantities of linens, in small parcels, are brought in for sale by the country people, for whose accommodation there is a separate market. In addition to large quantities of linens, butter, salt provisions, and grain, shipped to Great Britain, partly in exchange for manufactures and partly in payment of rent, to a non-resident proprietor, Belfast carries on a direct trade to the West Indies, Spain, America, and the Baltic; builds and owns a considerable extent of shipping, and has several manufactures of leather, chemicals, glass, &c.; and the cotton manufacture, is endeavouring to establish itself in Belfast and its vicinity. It is 88 m. N. of Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 37,277, and returns one member to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Belgrade, a celebrated town and fortress of European Turkey, capital of Serbia, and a Greek bishop's see, seated at the confluence of the Sava with the Danube, immediately contiguous to the Slavonian fortress of Semlin. It was first possessed by the Turks in 1522, retaken by the confederated German powers in 1688, but again taken by the Turks in 1690. It was taken by prince Eugene in 1717, and kept till 1739, when it was ceded to the Turks. It was again taken in 1789, and restored at the peace of Reichenbach, in 1790, and in 1806 it surrendered to an insurgent force of Servians, in opposition to the wanton authority of the Janissaries. In addition to its eminence as a fortress, it is one of the most considerable trading towns in Western Turkey. It is about 440 m. N. W. of Constantinople, and 160 S. E. of Pest.

Belmont, the name of two inconsiderable towns in France, one in the department of Loire, and the other in Aveiron.

Belover, a town in the N. E. part of Croatia, near the frontiers of Slavonia.

Beloochistan, a country of Asia, lying between Persia and the Indus, the boundaries of which are very imperfectly defined; the inhabitants consisting wholly of pastoral tribes, extend their territory wherever pasture and fertility invite, and the power of their arms prove sufficient to defend them against interruption; in fact, instead of Beloochistan being designated a country, it would be more proper to consider it as the eastern part of Persia, inhabited by numerous predatory and lawless tribes, possessing peculiar Mahometan tenets, from which the name of Belooches has been derived, and which will be more fully described under the head of Persia.

Belluza, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a citadel, both of them strongly fortified with a mud wall and a ditch. In the vicinity is much fine rice ground, and a great number of sheep are bred.—It is 38 m. N. of Seringapatam.

Belper, a town in Derbyshire, Eng. Here are several large cotton-mills, a bleaching mill and an iron-Forge, and about a dozen large establishments for the manufacture of nails. It is seated on the Derwent, 8 m. N. of Derby, 134 N. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 7,235.

Belpre, p.t. Washington Co. Ohio, on the N. W. bank of the Ohio, opposite the mouth of the Little Kanawha, 14 m. S. W. of Marietta, and 46 N. E. of Gallipolis.

Belpuig, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, with a famous convent, 18 m. E. N. E. of Lerida.

Belt, Great, a strait of Denmark, between the islands of Zealand and Funen, which forms a communication between the Cattegat and the Baltic. Owing to its more circuitous course it is not so much frequented as the Sound. (See Baltic.) In 1658 the whole strait was frozen so hard, that Charles Gustavus, king of Sweden, marched over it, with a design to take Copenhagen.

Belt, Little, a strait, west of the Great Belt, between Funen and North Jutland. It is one of the passages from the Cattegat to the Baltic, though not three miles in breadth, and very crooked.

Belturbet, a town in the north part of the county of Cavan, Ireland, it is in the parish of Annagh, which in 1821 contained a population of 10,488, and is sometimes called Belturbet. The town contains about 1,800 inhabitants, 9 m. N. N. W. of Cavan, and 61 of Dublin.

Bena, or Bene, a fortified town of Piedmont, in the north-west part of the province of Mondovi, 23 m. S. by E. of Turin. Pop. about 5,000.

Benares, an exceedingly fertile district of Hindoostan, in the north-east part of the province of Allahabad, between those of Bahar and Oude. It contains the circars of Benares, Jionpour, Chunar, and Gazypour; and was ceded to the English in 1775. It is very productive in rice, sugar, silk, cotton, and indigo.

Benares, the chief town of the district, is one of the finest and most populous towns of all Hindoostan. It is beautifully situated on the north bank of the Ganges, and celebrated as the ancient seat of Brahminical learning. Several Hindoo temples embellish the high banks of the river; and many other public and private buildings are magnificent. The streets are narrow, the houses high, and some of them five stories each, inhabited by different families, but the more wealthy Gentoos live in detached houses, with an open court, surrounded by a wall. Nearly in the centre of the city is a considerable Mahomedan mosque, built by the emperor Aurungzebe, who destroyed a magnificent Hindoo temple to make room for it. There is also a very superb temple, built by the rajah Cheytsing, who was driven from Benares for exciting an insurrection against the British in 1781, and who was finally deposed in 1783. There are ruins of several Hindoo temples in the vicinity, destroyed by the intolerance of Mahometans. In addition to the consequence derived from the vast congregation of persons occasioned by the priestcraft of Benares, it is the centre of a very extensive traffic for all the productions and manufactures of the east, and is distinguished for its trade in diamonds, and works in gold and jewelry. It is the seat of a British jurisdiction, and is about 130 m. W. by S. of Patna, and 460 W. by N. of Calcutta. Pop. about 600,000.

Benatek, a town in the circle of Bunzlau, Bohemia, situate on the west bank of the Iser River, about 30 m. N. E. of Prague. Tycho Brahe died here in 1601.

Benavari, a town of Spain, in Arragon, 17 m. N. of Lerida.

Benavente, a town of Spain, in Leon, on the river Esla, 35 m. S. S. W. of Leon.

Benavente, a town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, on the river Soro, near its confluence with the Tagus, 30 m. E. N. E. of Lisbon.

Benbecula, an island of Scotland, one of the Hebrides, between North and South Uist, from the last of which it is separated by a narrow channel, nearly dry at low water. It is of a circular form, including the inlets of the sea, 9 miles in diameter. The soil is sandy and unproductive, but much kelp is made from the sea-weed thrown on the coast.

Bencoolen, a settlement of the English East India Company, on the south-west side of the Island of Sumatra. The settlement was first formed in 1690, after the valiant Dutch drove all the English from Batavia. The unhealthiness of the spot first chosen, destroyed in 1692, nearly the whole of the European population: a new site was chosen, and the fort called Fort Marlborough, has proved more congenial to the physical constitutions of Europeans, but it is still considered the most disagreeable place in all the British dominions of the east. The town is inhabited by natives from all parts of Asia. The chief occupation of the people of the country is the culture of the pepper plant, the extent of the produce of which is very great, and constitutes its exclusive means of external commerce. Fort Marlborough is in lat. 3. 48. S. and 102. 28. E. long.

Bencoolen, a town at the south-west extremity of the island of Sumatra, about 120 m. S. E. of Bencoolen.

Bencorse, a town of Algiers, in the province of Constantine, 25 m. S. S. E. of Setcef.

Bendala, a town of Bornou, North Africa, about 200 m. E. of the capital.

Bender, or Teken, a fortified town of European Turkey, capital of Bessarabia. Here Charles the XII. of Sweden resided, after his defeat at Pultowa in 1709. Previous to 1770, when the Russians took Bender by storm, and totally destroyed the town, and afterwards abandoned it, it contained about 30,000 inhabitants. In 1780 it was taken again by the Russians almost without a struggle, but restored to the Turks in the following year; again taken by the Russians, to whom with the whole of Bessarabia and all that part of Moldavia east of the Pruth, it was confirmed by treaty in 1812. It is seated on the west bank of the Dniester, about 100 m. E. by S. of Jassy, and 410 N. of Constantinople. Present pop. about 10,000.

Bender Major, Bagh, and Risher, three towns on the north-east shore of the Persian gulf.

Bendorf, a town on the east bank of the Rhine, about 5 m. N. of Coblenz.

Beneadi, a large town of Upper Egypt, on the west side of the Nile, in lat. about 27. 30 N.

Benedetto, St. a town of Italy, in the Mantuan, near the river Po, 15 m. S. S. E. of Mantua, distinguished before the revolution, for one of the richest and finest convents in all Italy. There is also another town of the same name in Piedmont, 12 m. E. of Bena.

Benedict, a town of Maryland, in Charles County, situate on the Patuxent, 16 m. W. of Port Tobacco.

Benedict, St. a market town of Hungary, on the west bank of the Gran, about 5 m. W. of Pukanz.

Beneschau, a town in the south-west part of Silesia, on the frontier of the principality of Troppan. Also the name of four small towns in Bohemia.

Bensouef, a town of Egypt, noted for its hemp and flax; seated on the Nile, 60 m. S. of Cairo.

Benevento, a town of France, in the department of Creuse, 10 m. N. N. W. of Borgeaneuf.

Benevento, a city of Naples, and an archbishop's see, capital of Principato Ulteriore, and of a small duchy of its name, lately belonging to the pope. Benevento has suffered greatly by earthquakes, particularly in 1688, when the archbishop was dug out of the ruins alive. Except Rome, no city in Italy can boast of so many ruins of ancient sculpture as are to be found in this place. It is seated near the confluence of the Sabato and Caloro, 35 m. N. E. of Naples. Long. 14. 47. E. lat. 41. 8. N. Pop. about 14,000.

Benfelden, a town of France, in the department of Lower Rhine, on the river Ill, 12 m. S. S. W. of Strasburg.

Bengal, a maritime province forming the north-east extremity of the great promontory of Hindoostan, lying between the lat. of 22. and 26. 30. N. and the 86th and 92nd deg. of E. long. It is bounded on the north-east and north by Meckley, Assam, and Bootan, countries at present but little known; north-west by Bahar; south by Orissa; and south-east by the ocean or bay of Bengal, and contains an area of upwards of 100,000 sq. miles. The river Ganges intersects the province from north-west to south-east, dividing into numerous channels before it falls into the sea, between the

to set heavy engines in motion, to carry on their broad backs the purple tent where a nabob reposes on his gilded cushions; or to hunt the tiger in the thick jungle which overspreads the plains. The tigers are numerous among the underwood of the marshes. The rhinoceros lives in the mud and water, and is especially common upon the islands at the mouth of the Ganges. Buffaloes and horned cattle are numerous, and horses of various kinds are common. Birds and domestic poultry of all kinds are very abundant. Previous to the commencement of the 13th century, Bengal was inhabited by an unmixed and feeble race of Hindoos, who at that period yielded their authority to a horde of Mahometan marauders from the confines of Persia and Tartary. They established their seat of empire at Dehli, and Bengal continued tributary for about 140 years, when it regained, and preserved its independence for nearly two centuries. It was invaded again by Sher Shah, and afterwards by the emperor Akbar, who again rendered it tributary to Dehli, to which it continued subject until the year 1756, when the whole province became subject to the authority of the English East India Company, who for half a century previously had established settlements on the banks of the Ganges, and progressively extended their influence. They have since divided it into three districts for civil and judicial purposes: viz. Calcutta, Decca, and Moorshedabad, and formed six great military stations of which Calcutta is the chief, as well as the seat of government of the whole British empire in Asia. The total population is about 3,000,000, of whom about nine-tenths are native Hindoos, and the remainder a mixed race of Mahometans, descendants of of the early conquerors, by intermarriages with the natives; and a few Europeans. Manufactures of cotton, or silk, are carried on in almost every town of the province, and in the principal cities the works in gold and jewelry are very extensive. The nature and present extent of the commerce of Bengal will be more fully elucidated under the head of Calcutta, and the nature and extent of revenue under the head of Hindoostan.

Benguela, a maritime district on the west coast of South Africa, lying south of the Congo river, between the lat. of 10. 30. and 16. S. There are two towns or settlements of the Portuguese on the coast, called Benguela, Old and New, the former in the lat. of 10. 50. and the other in about 12. 30. S. from whence the Portuguese and Brazilian ships obtain a considerable portion of their slaves.

Beni, a large river of South America, rising near the south extremity of La Paz, running north, parallel with, and within the most easterly ridge of the Andes, and forming the east branch of the Ucayale, which falls into the Amazon after running from south to north through the whole interior of Peru. The Jesuits founded some settlements on the banks of the Beni, of which St. Francisco, Trinidad, and Reyez, in the lat. of 12. to 14. S. are the chief.

Benicarlo, a town of Valencia, Spain, a few m. north of Peniscola. It is celebrated for its wines, of which considerable quantities are exported.

Benigno, St. a populous village of Piedmont, situate on the high road to the Alps, about 10 m. N. of Turin. Pop. about 4,500.

Benihassen, a maritime province of Fez, bordering on the Atlantic, of which New Salee or Rabat, in lat. 34. 5. N. is the principal outpost.

Benin, a country in North Africa, towards the east extremity of Upper Guinea, lying principally north and west of the river Formosa, the entrance to which is in lat. 5. 33. N. and 4. 35. E. long. It is bounded on the west by Dahomey; on the east by Warea; and north by undefined boundaries and countries but little known. Benin exhibits many beautiful landscapes; but the air is noxious near the coast, on account of the gross vapours from the marshes. Oranges and lemons grow on the side of the roads, and the cotton and pepper plants are indigenous to the soil, but both are very imperfectly cultivated. Among the animals are elephants in great number, leopards, stags, wild boars, civet and mountain cats, horses, hares, and hairy sheep; a vast number of serpents and other reptiles; and the principal birds are parrots, pigeons, partridges, storks, and ostriches. The dress of the natives is neat. The rich wear white calico or cotton petticoats, but the upper part of the body is commonly naked. The women use great art in dressing their hair, which they reduce into a variety of forms. The people are skillful in making various sorts of dyes; and they manufacture some cotton into cloths. Polygamy is allowed, and the number of wives is limited by the state of their circumstances only. Though jealous of each other, they offer their wives to Europeans. Their religion is paganism, the king himself being fetiche, and as such the chief object of adoration in his dominion. The chief town, called also Benin, is one of the most populous of all Western Africa, containing about 15,000 inhabitants. It is situate inland about 40 m. from Gatto, a town standing at the head of a large inlet of the Formosa river. The road from Gatto to Benin is over a level country, in some places swampy and thickly wooded, and the country around the town of Benin is also thickly wooded. Like all other African towns, Benin is very unequally laid out. The houses are all built with clay, and covered with reeds, straw, or leaves. The royal palace is of vast extent, but neither elegant nor commodious. All male slaves here are foreigners; for the inhabitants cannot be sold for such, only they bear the name of the king's slaves. Since the restriction of the slave-trade to the south of the equator, Benin, in common with the whole extent of the western coast of Africa, from the river Gambia, in lat. 13. N. to Malemba, in lat. 5. S. has shewn itself capable of affording all the means requisite for the formation of an intercourse, as social and reciprocal, as the slave traffic was debasing, partial, and vicious. The commerce of Great Britain with this part of Africa is inconsiderable.

Benin-Dazy, St. a town of France, in the department of Nièvre, having several iron mines in its vicinity. Pop. 1,600.

Benisuef, a town of Egypt, with manufactures of carpets, and woolen and linen stuffs, seated on the Nile, 60. m. S. of Cairo.

Benkenstein, or Benneckenstein, a town of the Prussian states, in the duchy of Saxony, 11 m. S. W. of Halberstadt.

Benningen, a village of Wirtemberg, on the Neckar, where the remains of a Roman town were discovered in 1597.

Bennington, a village in Hertfordshire, England near Stevenage. Here the Mercian kings had a palace; and the castle, in which a council was held in 850, still remains near the church. Pop. 658.

Bennington, a County forming the south-west part of the state of Vermont, bordering on the state of New York. Pop. 17,470.

Bennington, the chief town of the preceding County. Though the largest and oldest town in the state, the judicial courts are commonly held at Rutland and Windsor alternately. Near this town, General Stark gained two battles, on Aug 16th, 1777, which contributed to the subsequent surrender of general Burgoyne's army. Bennington is situate at the foot of the Green Mountains near the S. W. corner of the state, 30 m. E. by N. of Albany and 129 S. S. W. of Montpelier. Pop. 3,419.

There are also towns of this name in New York, Pa., Ohio and Alabama.

Birmah, an extensive empire in Asia, to the east of the Bay of Bengal; containing the kingdoms of Birmah, Cassay, Aracan, and Pegu, and all the west coast of Siam, to the promontory of Malay, extending from the 10th to the 24th deg. of N. lat. The kingdom of Birmah, frequently called Ava, from the name of its ancient capital, has Pegu on the south, and occupies both sides of the river Irrawaddy, or Errabatty, to the frontiers of Assam on the north; on the west it has Arracan and Cassay, and on the east China and Upper Siam. This kingdom was conquered in 1752, by the king of Pegu, who carried the Birman monarch prisoner to Pegu, and caused him to be murdered there in 1754; but Alompra, a Birman of low distinction, who was continued by the conqueror as chief at Monchaban, a small place to the north of Ava, revolted against the Peguese, got possession of Ava in 1755, and after continued battles, with various success, became the conqueror of Pegu, in 1757. This deliverer of his country continued in a state of warfare to his death, in 1760; and his successors have since added the other countries, which now form the Birman Empire. The climate of Birmah is very salubrious; the seasons being regular, and the extremes of heat and cold seldom experienced. The soil is remarkably fertile, producing rice, sugar canes, tobacco, indigo, cotton, and all the tropical fruits in perfection; and on the banks of the Irrawaddy, which runs south through the whole country, is produced pure amber, and the finest teak timber in the world. The kingdom of Birmah abounds in minerals; it has mines of gold, silver, rubies, and sapphires; and affords amethysts, garnets, chrysolites, jasper, load-stone, and marble. The general disposition of the Birman is strikingly contrasted with that of the natives of Hindoostan, though separated only by a narrow ridge of mountains, in several places admitting of an easy intercourse. The Birman are a lively, inquisitive race, active, irascible, and impatient; but the character of their Bengal neighbours is known to be the reverse. The passion of jealousy which prompts most eastern nations to immure their women, and surround them with guards, seems to have little influence on the minds of the Birman; for their wives and daughters have as free intercourse with the other sex as the rules of European society admit. The Birman are extremely fond both of poetry and music. Their religion is, in fact, that of the Hindoos, though they are not votaries of Brama, but sectaries of Boodh. Their jurisprudence is distinguished above that of any other Hindoo community for perspicuity and good sense. The emperor of Birmah is a despotic monarch, and like the sovereign of China acknowledges no equal. The prevailing characteristic of the Birman court is pride. There are no hereditary dignities or employments in the government, for all honours and offices, on the demise of the the possessor, revert to the crown. The capital was formerly Ummerapoor, but this city is now deserted, and the old capital Ava rebuilt. The chief seaport is Rangoon.

Birmingham, a large, inland, populous and important town of England, in Warwickshire, bordering on the counties of Worcester and Stafford. It is a place of great antiquity, and has long been celebrated for its works in every kind of metal, and the manufacture of hardware, fire-arms, cutlery, japanned wares, and trinkets. The era of its pre-eminence however is comparatively recent, its commencement may be dated subsequent to the war of 1776—1783; since when it has more than doubled in extent and population. The number of its inhabitants, including Aston, immediately contiguous, in 1801 was 72,522, and in 1821 106,722, and the adjacent country, on the borders of the counties of Stafford and Worcester, contains from 80,000 to 100,000 persons more, chiefly occupied in the manufacture of articles brought to Birmingham, for sale and distribution. The Staffordshire border abounds in iron and coal of the finest quality, which contributes essentially to the excellence and facility of most of its manufactures. The town is considered peculiarly healthy, the chief part being built along the ridge of a hill, having a dry, sandy soil. The streets are regular, and the buildings spacious. The church of St. Philip, built in 1711, is a stately and fine edifice, and since 1800 two other churches have been built, both equally handsome. It has several sectarian meeting houses, a well-endowed public school, a handsome theatre, and an extensive suite of baths. The perspective of the town, especially on the east side, is very imposing, and independent of its innate importance, being nearly in the centre of the kingdom, it is a place of vast intercourse. It has a canal basin at its highest level, from whence cuts diverge in every direction, and by which the manufactures of the district are conveyed to all the ports of the kingdom, for distribution over every part of the habitable globe. The surrounding country is very fertile, and its market is in consequence exceedingly well supplied with all the essentials of subsistence. Birmingham is not an incorporated town, and, notwithstanding its size and importance, has at present no representation in parliament, though this evil will probably be soon removed. It is governed by two bailiffs and two constables, and there are several resident magistrates who are chosen annually from the most respectable part of the community. In 1643 Birmingham was besieged and taken by prince Rupert, and ordered to be burnt to the ground, but, owing to some propitious circumstances, the conflagration did very little damage. In 1665, or 1666, the town suffered severely from the plague. It began shortly after this period to be considerably enlarged, though in 1700 it consisted of only 30 streets, whereas there are now upwards of 300. It is 109 m. N. N. W. of London, by way of Coventry or Warwick, from each of which it is distant 18 m. and 116 by way of Oxford, from which it is distant 58 m.

There are 3 towns in Pennsylvania by the name of Birmingham.

Birnam, a hill of Scotland, in Perthshire, celebrated by Shakespeare in his Macbeth, 1580 feet above the level of the sea. It was anciently a forest and part of the Royal domain of Scotland.

Biron, a town of France, department of Dordogne, 73 miles E. of Bordeaux.

Biron, a town in the department of Lower Charente, 12 m S. E. of Saintes.

Birr, a parish and town of Ireland, in King's county, near the borders of Tipperary. The town is sometimes called Parsons Town: it is 34 m. N. E. of Limerick, and 34 N. N. W. of Kilkenny. Pop. in 1821, 5,406; and the parish 2,972 more.

Birse, a town of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, seated on the Dee, 28 m. West of Aberdeen. Pop. 1,505.

Birtley, a village in the county of Durham, Eng. 10 m. N. of Durham. Pop. in 1821, 1,386. There is a village of the same name in Northumberland, having a salt spring, at which great quantities of salt were formerly made.

Birriesca, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, 13 m. N. of Burgos.

Birza, a town of Poland, in Samogitia, 42 miles S. E. of Mittau.

Bisaccia, a town of Naples in Principato Ulteriore, 15 m. N. E. of Conza.

Biscara, a town of Algiers, in the province of Constantina, and the chief place of the district of Zaab. It is an ancient town, 120 m. S. S. W. of Constantina. Long. 5. 12. W. lat. 33. 35. N.

Biscay, a maritime province on the N. coast of Spain, extending from the Bidassoa, which divides Spain from France in the long. of 1. 40. W. to Santona, in 3. 18. W. lying on the shore of the Bay of Biscay, nearly in a straight line, in the lat. of 43. 20. N. extending inland, in nearly a pyramidal form, to Logrono, in Old Castile; its area being 248 square leagues, and in 1810 contained a pop. of 283,450. It is bounded on the W. by Asturias and Old Castile, and E. by the Navarre. The river Ebro, which runs S. into the Mediterranean, rises nearly in the centre of the province, and afterwards forms part of its western boundary. It is divided into three parts viz. Alava, S. containing 90 leagues of area, and 67,523 of the pop. chief town Vittoria; Guipuscoa, E. containing 52 leagues of area, and 104,491 of pop. chief town St. Sebastian; this, it will be perceived, is the most populous part; Biscay Proper, on the W. containing 106 leagues of area, and 111,436 of pop. chief town Bilbao. The country is in some parts mountainous, but well covered with wood, and yielding abundance of iron and lead. The plains and valleys are well cultivated, yielding ample supplies of all that is essential to the comfort of the inhabitants. The Biscayans are a brave choleric people, possessing a character and speaking a language distinct from that of every other part of Spain; and through all the mutations to which Spain has been exposed during a period of 2000 years, by the irruptions of Romans, Carthaginians, Moors, &c. Biscay has retained its ancient Cantabrian laws and independence, and at the present time forms an independent republic under the protection of Spain, rather than an integral part of the kingdom. It admits a corregidor and commissary appointed by the crown, but permits no taxes to be levied without the sanction of the province, and yields none to the crown but as gratuitous donations, and sanctions no title of the king but that of lord.

Biscay, Bay of, a large bay of the Atlantic Ocean; formed by the Isle of Ushant, N. in lat. 43. 22. N. and Cape Ortegal S. in lat. 43. 47. N. and 7. 14. W. long. washing the N. coast of Spain, from Cape Ortegal to St. Jean de Luz, in lat. 42. 23 N. and the W. coast of France, on a line of longitude from St. Jean de Luz, in 1. 40. to Ushant in 5. 3. W. During a prevalence of westerly winds, the swell of the Atlantic Ocean sets into this Bay, and renders the approach to the British channel by vessels from the S. and S. W. exceedingly difficult, and if the gales are powerful, quite impossible, until they subside; there being however, plenty of sea-room, it is a position of tediousness and labour, rather than of danger.

Biscay, New, a name given by the Spaniards to a part of the W. coast of Mexico; now incorporated with the intendency of Sonora, Durango, and Guadalajara (all of which see.)

Bischofsstein, a town of Prussia Proper, about 50 m. S. of Königsberg, and 5 S. E. of Heilsburg.

Blackburn, an extensive parish and town in the centre of the county of Lancaster, England, intersected by the Leeds and Liverpool canal. It is divided into 23 townships, and in 1821, contained a population of 53,350, chiefly employed in the various branches of the cotton manufacture. Parts of the parish are bleak and dreary, but it is partly situate on the great coal strata, which supplies abundance of fuel. The town of Blackburn is seated in a valley, on both sides of a stream called the Derwent, over which there are four bridges, and it is skirted by the Leeds and Liverpool canal. Next to Manchester, it is one of the principal focuses of that wide occupation, the cotton manufacture, there being about a dozen large establishments for spinning, forty more largely occupied in the manufacture of calicoes, twenty large establishments for printing of ditto, with all the attendant occupations of bleaching, dyeing, iron founding and machine and reed making. It has three public breweries. In 1821 it contained 21,940 of the above population. 12 m. E. by S. of Preston and 23 N. W. of Manchester. It has a free grammar school, with an endowment of about £150 per ann. and also a female charity school, with nearly a similar endowment; four churches, two of them handsome, and several meeting-houses.

Black Forest, a mountainous and woody district of Germany, part of the ancient Hercynian Forest, extending N. from the frontiers of Switzerland, for about 100 m. parallel with the N. course of the Rhine. The principal part lies within the territory of the Duchy of Baden, bordering on Bavaria, the N. part running into the territory of Wurtemberg. It is in some places rich in iron and other metals, and its wood is very valuable as well for fuel as for building both of houses and vessels for navigating the Rhine.

Blackheath, an elevated and spacious plain, the ascent to which is 5 m. E. of London Bridge. It is partly in the parish of Greenwich, and the upper part of the park of the hospital of Greenwich is part of the plain. It is intersected by the great high road from London to Dover, and is celebrated in several periods of English history. The Danes encamped upon it in 1012. In 1390 the celebrated Wat Tyler assembled 100,000 men against the government, to avenge an insult offered to his daughter by a petty tax-gatherer at Dartford. In 1450, Jack Cade assembled his forces on the same spot; and in 1497, it was the scene of a contest between Henry VII. and Lord Audley. It is surrounded by detached houses, and ranges of handsome buildings, residences of some of the more opulent classes connected with the transactions of London. It commands some fine prospects, and in the summer season, especially, is a beautiful and interesting spot. In the side of the ascent from London is a cavern consisting of seven large rooms, which communicate by arched avenues; the sides and roofs of rocks of chalk; and it has a well of clear water, 27 feet deep.

Blackwall, a suburb of London, situate in a nook at the S. E. extremity of the county of Middlesex. It is bounded on the E. by the river Lea, which divides it from the county of Essex, at its junction with the Thames, which from Blackwall towards London Bridge, makes a considerable detour, the distance by the course of the river being about 10 miles, and more than double the distance of the meridional line. This has led to the construction of a tide canal, nearly a mile in length, for ships of 600 to 800 tons burthen, across the isthmus formed by the detour of the river; and also to the construction of basins or docks for the reception of all the ships arriving from the West and East Indies. The West India dock establishment is the most magnificent and complete work of the kind in the world: it consists of two outer basins from the river at Blackwall, which lead to the grand receiving basin, an oblong square, 1,200 yards in length, affording quay room for about seventy sail of large vessels to discharge their cargoes at one time, with moorings for 100 to 200 vessels more in the centre. On the S. side is a range of magnificent store houses, alternately of two and five stories, of sufficient capacity to warehouse 100,000 tons of merchandize. The N. side has a covered quay, and a low range of warehouses over vaults, for the storing of 50,000 puncheons of rum, dye-woods, &c. &c. After discharging their cargoes, the vessels leave the receiving basin at the W. end through an outer basin that communicates again with the river, or to the outward bound basin on the S. in a line parallel with the grand receiving basin, taking their departure through the outer basins at Blackwall. The quays of the grand receiving basin are all of stone, and the conveniences for unloading stores, and distributing of the merchandize, with the swing-bridges over the entrance to the outer basins and the dock gates, are all as complete as labour and art can make them, whilst a suitable taste pervades the whole. It was first opened in 1802. Between the West India Docks and the river Lea are two spacious basins for the reception of all ships from China and the East Indies with store-houses for the ships' stores, salt-petre, and some of the more bulky productions.

but all the more valuable articles are stored in warehouses in different parts of the E. side of London. There is also the largest private ship-building yard in the world, where eight or ten ships, averaging 1,000 tons each, are occasionally on the stocks, or repairing, at one time. Blackwall commands a very extensive view down the river, which draws a constant succession of visitors to witness the unrivalled passing scene of vessels from and to all parts of the world, which almost every flood and ebb of the tide presents. The pop. of this appendage of London in 1821 was 12,223.

Bogota, a large city and the capital of Colombia. During the rule of the Spaniards in S. America, it was the capital of the viceroyalty of New Granada, and was then more commonly called Santa Fe. Since the organization and establishment of the republic of Colombia, it has been more commonly called Bogota, and made the chief town of the province of Cundinamarca, and seat of the whole republican government of Colombia. It is situate on a spacious and fertile plain, on the most easterly ridge of the Andes, in the lat. of 4. 36. N. and 73. 30. of W. long. at an elevation of upwards of 8,000 feet above the level of the sea, which, notwithstanding its contiguity to the equator, renders its climate comparatively temperate and agreeable. It is intersected by a small river called the Bogota (hence its recent appellation) which falls into the Magdalena, W. of the ridge of mountains on which the town is situate. The town is tolerably well laid out, having four squares, containing some handsome buildings; and, although its remoteness from the sea, and destitution of water communication, will operate against its becoming a place of the first magnitude, should it continue to be the seat of government, it will doubtless considerably increase both in extent and population, which at present amounts to about 40,000.

The most convenient points of debarkation for Bogota from Europe, are either Lagaira or Carthagena, the distance from the former about 600 miles N. W. and from Carthagena about 450 N. E.; but the routes usually taken will in both instances, greatly exceed those distances. It is about 450 m. N. E. of Quito, about 15 m. S. W. of the town, at a place called Tequendama; the river Bogota falls down a precipice with considerable fury, and is an object of great attraction to the strangers who visit Bogota.

Bogwanpoor, a town of Bahar, Hindoostan, a few m. S. E. of Benares.

Bohemia, a kingdom and very compact territory in the centre of Europe, supposed to have derived its name from a tribe of Celts called the Boii. It was originally more extensive, including Lusatia and Silesia on the N. E. and Moravia on the S. E. Previous to 1547, it was an independent kingdom, having an elective form of government, the popularity of which excited the jealousy of the Emperor of Germany, Ferdinand I. who obtained at that period the consent of the Germanic diet, to declare it an hereditary appendage of the dominion of Austria. This union was severely contested on the part of the Bohemians for about seventy years, but since 1690 they have implicitly yielded to the Austrian yoke. Bohemia, in its present extent, is in the form of a diamond, and lies between the lat. of 48. 35. and 51. 5. N. and 12. 20. to 16. 30. of W. long. Its southern point borders on Upper Austria, and it is bounded by Bavaria on the S. W., Saxony on the N. W., Lusatia and Silesia on the N. E., and Moravia on the S. E., its extreme length and breadth will be about 180 by 190 m., but each of the four sides of its quadrilateral figure will not average more than about 125, and as such give a superficial extent of 15,625 sq. m.

Since 1751 it has been divided into the 12 following circles, named after 12 of the principal towns, (exclusive of Prague, the metropolis of the whole territory, which has a separate jurisdiction:) viz. Leutmeritz, Bunzlau, Koniggratz, Chrudim, Tschaslau, Bechin, Prachin. Bohemia is considered the most elevated part of Europe, no rivers running into it. The Spree, the Neisse, and the Bober, running north through Lusatia and Silesia, have their source on the frontiers of the circles of Bunzlau and Koniggratz, and the Elbe has its source in the latter circle near the frontier of Silesia, running south into the circle of Chrudim, and then takes a north-west course, bounding the circle of Bunzlau on the south, intersecting Leutmeritz towards Dresden in Saxony. The Moldau rises near the frontier of Austria at the south extremity of the circle of Bechin, and runs nearly due north past Prague, into the Elbe at Melnik in Bunzlau. Several streams have their sources in the circle of Pilsen, which unite near the town of that name, and there form the Beraun, which runs into the Moldau a little below Prague. The Eger intersects the circle of Saaz from south-west to north-east, falling into the Elbe a little below the town of Leutmeritz. These rivers, with their several tributary streams, contribute alike to the diversity and fertility of the country. There are also several small lakes in the south part of the circle of Bechin. The frontiers on all sides, except on that of Moravia, are mountainous and woody, whilst the whole of the interior possesses a soil of great capability; but as a species of feudal tyranny pervades the whole territory, it naturally precludes all excitement to social exertion, and its productions are consequently confined to a bare means of subsistence. It grows a considerable quantity of flax, which, as well as their wool, is manufactured into linens and cloths, for domestic use, and some on the side of Lusatia and Silesia for exportation. Almost every kind of mineral is found in one part of the country, or the other, and having but little external intercourse, every branch of manufacture is carried on as domestic occupations for internal supply. It has several mineral springs, but it is deficient in the essential article of salt, part of the supply being obtained from external sources.

On the subjugation of Bohemia by Austria, the ancient form of government was retained, but it was merely the form: and absolute and despotic dictation nullified whatever was calculated to justify or vindicate the rights of man, and the conduct of blind, passive obedience, may now be considered as firmly established in Bohemia, as in any part of Europe, or the world. The established religion of Bohemia is the Roman Catholic, and before the year 1781 the Protestants were not permitted the free exercise of their worship: at present all religious creeds are tolerated. Out of a population of about 3,000,000, the dissentients from Catholicism do not exceed 100,000, about half of whom are Jews. In time of peace, about 50,000 men are maintained in arms, to support whom, and other state pretensions, exactions, equal to about 9,000,000 American dollars, are imposed on the productive labours of the people. The original language of Bohemia seems to have been Slavonic, a dialect of which is still common in the country; but the German or high Dutch is spoken with considerable purity.

Bohmerwald, a dense mountain forest, forming the south-west boundary of Bohemia. The term implies Bohemian Forest, Baum in German signifying wood; Bohm is probably a corruption of that term in Bohemia, and may have given name to the country, signifying a woody country, and the two following places as situated in woods.

Bohmisch Riehe, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Bunzlau, 20 m. N. of Jung Bunzlau.

Bohmisch Brod, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Kaurzim, 14 m. E. S. E. of Prague.

Bohol, one of the Philippine islands, to the north of Mindanao. Long. 124. 5. E. lat. 10. 0. N.

Bohol, or Bool, a town at the mouth of a river of the same name, falling into the Sooloo Sea, on the north coast of the isle of Celebes.

Bohus, or Bakus, a small district of West Gothland, Sweden, bordering on the Cattegat, north of Gottenburg. Stromstadt, on the coast, in lat. 58. 56. N. and 11. 15. E. long. is the principal town.

Bojador, a cape on the west coast of Africa, doubled by the Portuguese in 1433. Long. 14. 27. W. lat. 26. 12. N.

Boiano, a town of Naples, in the Molise, at the foot of the Apennines, on the east, near the river Tilerno. In 1808 it suffered greatly by an earthquake, and most of the inhabitants were destroyed. It is 45 m. N. N. E. of Naples.

Bois Blanc, an island in Michigan Territory, in Detroit river, opposite Amherstburg.

Bois le Duc, a fortified city of Dutch Brabant, capital of a district of the same name, which contains also the towns of Helmont, and Eyndhoven. It has a castle named Papen-briel, and a little to the south are two forts, called Isabella and St. Antony. It was taken by the French in 1894. It is situate among morasses, on the river Dommel, where it receives the Aa, 22 m. E. by N. of Breda, and 45 S. S. E. of Amsterdam. Pop. about 13,000.

Boiscommun, a town of France, in the department of Loiret, 25 m. N. E. of Orleans.

Boitzenburg, a town of Lower Saxony, in Mecklenburg, at the confluence of the Boitze with the Elbe, 30 m. S. W. of Schwerin.

Boitzenburg, a town of Brandenburg, in the Ucker Mark, 10 m. W. of Prenslow.

Bokhara, a city of Usbec Tartary, in Bokharia. It stands on a rising ground, surrounded by a slender wall of earth, and a dry ditch, on the south side of the river Sogd. The houses are low, and mostly built of mud; but the caravanseras and mosques, which are numerous, are all of brick. The bazars, or market-places, have been stately buildings, but the greatest part of them are now in ruins. Here is also a stately building for the education of the priests. Great numbers of Jews and Arabians frequent this place; and the trade with Russia and Persia is considerable. In 1220, Bokhara was taken by Jenghis Khan, with a numerous army, who burnt the city, and demolished the castle; but after the city had remained in ruins some years, he at length ordered it to be rebuilt. It is 138 m. W. by S. of Samarcand. Long. 63. 56. E. lat. 39. 4. N.

Bokharia, or Bucharia, a country of Usbec Tartary, bounded on the north by Turkestan, east by Cashgar, south by Hindoostan and Persia, and west by Chorasan and Charism. It is fertile in corn and fruit, and the best cultivated of any part of Tartary. This country comprehends the ancient district of Bactriana, the native country of the two-humped camel. The one-humped camel, or dromedary, is a much more common animal.

The inhabitants are in general tawny, with black hair, but some are white and well made. They are cleanly in their food, which often consists of minced meat, and tea is the general drink. They are not warlike, but use the bow, lance, and sabre. Samarcand is the capital.

Bokharia, Little. See Cashgar.

Bolabola, one of the Society Islands, in the Pacific Ocean, 4 leagues N. W. of Otaha. Long. 151. 52. W. lat. 16. 32. S.

Bolcheresk, a town of Kamtschatka, on the river Bolchoireka, 22 miles from its mouth, in the sea of Okotsk. Long. 156. 37. E. lat. 52. 54. N.

Bolingbroke, a town in Lincolnshire, Eng. It was the birth-place of Henry IV. and has a manufacture of earthen ware. It stands at the source of a river which runs into the Witham, 29 m. E. of Lincoln, and 133 N. by E. of London.

Bolivia, a Republic of South America, formed out of the province of Upper Peru in 1825. It is bounded N. W. by Peru, N. E. and E. by Brazil, S. by Buenos Ayres, and W. by the Pacific Ocean and Peru. The territory is mountainous, and many of the streams which fall into the Amazon and La Plata had their origin here. It contains many silver mines, among other the celebrated mine of Potosi. Its principal towns are Potosi, Charcas, Orpesa, Oruro, La Paz, Cochabamba, and La Plata or Chuquisaca which is the capital. The population is estimated at something more than a million. The government consists of a President, and a legislative body of three chambers. The battle of Ayacucho which established the independence of this territory, was the last effort made by the Spaniards to retain a footing in their ancient dominion of South America. This battle was fought Dec. 9, 1824. The Colombian army under General Sucre, gained a complete victory over the Spaniards, commanded by the Viceroy La Serna. Sucre was made President of Bolivia, but was afterwards assassinated.

Bolkenhayn, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Schweidnitz, a few miles west of the town of Schweidnitz; the inhabitants chiefly employed in the linen manufacture.

Bolkowitz, or Polkwitz, a town of Silesia, 12 m. S. of Glogau.

Bologna, a city of Italy, capital of the Bolognese, and an archbishop's see. It is about 5 miles in circumference, and contains 80,000 inhabitants. It has long been distinguished as a school of science; the university being one of the most ancient and celebrated in Europe. An academy of arts and sciences was founded in 1712, and contributed greatly to that fame which the city has acquired. As a school of painting, it is immortalized by the number of masters it has produced. There are here 169 churches, and these, as well as the numerous mansions of the nobles, are most munificently furnished with their best productions. Nor have the exertions of art been confined to the sphere of painting; the city exhibits some of the finest monuments of architecture, such as the palace of Capraria, the marble fountain in the Piazza-del-Gigante, and in fact, almost every building of any note. The academy of arts and sciences is a building of great magnificence, and the public theatre is one of the largest and most beautiful in Italy. The church of St. Petronius is the largest in Bologna, but is more remarkable for its pavement, where Cassini drew his meridian line, 180 ft. long. The trade of Bologna is very considerable, being situated in a fertile country, and having an easy conveyance of its produce by a canal to the Po. The exuberance of the adjacent country enables the inhabitants to furnish all Europe with the greatest delicacies in confectionary, distilled waters, essences, &c. oil, wine, flax, hemp, and silk, also furnish abundant sources of trade and employment. The Reno, which passes by the city, turns no less than 400 mills for silk-works. It is situated at the foot of the Apennines, 22 m. S. E. of Modena, and 175 N. W. of Rome. Long. 11. 21. E. lat. 44. 30. N. It was taken possession of by the French in 1796, but restored to the states of Rome at the general peace.

Bolognese, a province of Italy, bounded on the north by the Ferrarese, west by Modena, south by Tuscany, and east by Romagna. It is watered by many small rivers, and produces all sorts of grain and fruit, particularly rich muscadine grapes. Some miles before the entrance into Bologna, the country seems one continued garden. The vineyards are not divided by hedges, but by rows of elms and mulberry-trees; the vines hanging in festoons, from one tree to another. There are also mines of alum and iron. Bologna is the capital. There are about 300 other towns, containing a population of about 200,000.

Bolsena, a town of Italy, in the patrimony of St. Peter, on a lake of its name, 18 m. N. N. W. of Viterbo.

Bolsover, a town in Derbyshire, Eng. It has a spacious castle on the brow of a hill; and is noted for the manufacture of tobacco pipes. It is 6 m. E. of Chesterfield, and 145 N. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,245.

Bolswoart, a town of Holland, in Friesland, near the Zuyder Zee, 10 m. N. of Sloten. Near this town, which is about two miles in extent, was formerly an abbey of the Cisterians, where the Munster Anabaptists took refuge in 1534, and where William, count of Holland, was buried in the 14th century.

Bolton-le-Moors, a large and populous town in Lancashire, Eng., consisting of two townships, Great and Little Bolton. It is so called from its situation amidst several extensive moors, and also to distinguish it from another town in the north part of the county, called Bolton-le-Sands. It is 11 miles N. W. of Manchester, on the mail-coach road to Preston and Glasgow, and, next to Manchester, is one of the most considerable stations of the cotton manufacture, the branches more particularly pursued being those of muslins, dimities and counterpanes. The canal to Manchester, from which there is a branch to Bury, has added materially to the prosperity of the place; and the new railway to Leigh, by affording facilities for an additional supply of coal, has reduced the price of that indispensable fuel. Besides the parish church, here are two other episcopal churches of recent erection, a Roman Catholic chapel, and about sixteen meeting houses for dissenters, with various schools and charitable institutions. A town hall, for the transaction of public business, has been recently erected. Pop. in 1821, 89,197, of which Little Bolton contained 9,258. The earl of Derby was executed here, in 1651, for proclaiming Charles II.

* There are 12 other towns and villages named Bolton, besides Bolton on the Sands, in different parts of England; viz. three in Cumberland, one each in Northumberland and Westmoreland, and seven in Yorkshire.

Bolton, p.t. Worcester Co. Mass. 33 m. W. Boston. Pop. 1,258. The town abounds in lime-stone.

Bolton, p.t. Chittenden Co. Vt. 24 m. N. W. Montpelier. Pop. 452.

Bolton, p.t. Tolland Co. Conn. Pop. 744.

Bolton, p.t. Warren Co. N. Y. 69 m. N. Albany. Pop. 1,466.

Bomal, a town of the Netherlands, in Luxemburg, on the river Ourt, 20 m. S. of Liege.

Bombay, an island on the west coast of the Decan of Hindoostan, 7 miles in length, and 20 in circumference. It came to the English by the marriage of Charles II. with Catherine of Portugal, and was made over to the East India Company in 1688, when it was made the seat of government of all their possessions on that side of Hindoostan, which was previously at Surat. It is now one of the three presidencies by which their oriental territories are governed. It contains a strong and capacious fortress, a city, dockyard, and marine arsenal. Here the finest merchant ships are built all of teak, supplied from the neighbouring countries, which is more durable than the best English oak; and in 1810, the Minden, 74 gun ship, was launched, having been built entirely under the superintendence of a Persee. The ground is in general barren, and good water scarce; but it has abundance of cocoa-nuts, and its markets are well supplied with every delicacy. The population of the territory of Bombay is estimated at 225,000, three-fourths of whom are Hindoos, the remainder Mahometans, Armenians, and Jews and about 8,000 Persees or fire worshippers. (See Bachu.) The city of Bombay, next to Calcutta, may be considered the most commercial place in Hindoostan; its intercourse with China is very great, the export of cotton sometimes amounting to 350,000 bales per annum. It is much resorted to, by traders from Persia, Arabia, Abyssinia, Armenia, and all parts of western Asia, as well as from most of the islands of the Indian Ocean, and all the eastern parts of Asia, and the commercial transactions are conducted with more integrity than is usual in Asiatic cities. It is about 180 m. S. of Surat, and 1,300 W. by S. of Calcutta. The lighthouse, which is a very prominent object, and visible for 20 miles out at sea, is in lat. 18. 53. N. and 72. 53. E. long.

Bomene, a seaport of Holland, in Zealand, on the north shore of the Island of Schowen, 3 m. E. of Brouershaven.

Bommel, a town of South Holland, in the isle of Overfrakke, 7 m. W. of Williamstadt.

Bommel, a strong town of Holland, in Guelderland, in the island of Bommelwert, on the river Waal, 21 m. S. by E. of Utrecht, and 7 N. of Bois-le-Duc. Pop. about 3,000.

Bommelwert, an island of Holland, formed by the junctions of the Waal and Maese. It lies in the province of Guelderland, except a small district at the west end, which belongs to South Holland. It is 15 miles in length, from Lowestein to Fort St. Andrew, and is not more than 4 in the broadest part. It was taken by the French in 1672, and again in 1794.

Bona, a seaport of Algiers, in the province of Constantina. Near it are the ruins of the ancient Hippo Regius. It has a trade in corn, oil, wax and wool, and is 270 m. E. of Algiers. Long. 7 45. E. lat. 36. 52. N.

Bonair, or Buen Ayre, a fertile island in the Caribbean Sea, to the E. of Curacao. It is 60 m. in circuit, and has a good harbour and road on the S. W. side. Long. 68. 18. W. lat. 12. 10. N.

Bonavista, one of the Cape Verd islands, so called from its beautiful appearance to the first discoverers, in 1450; but is now become barren, through the extreme idleness of the inhabitants. Long. 22. 47. W. lat. 16. 6. N.

Bonavista, a cape on the east side of the island of Newfoundland. Long. 52. 32. W. lat. 48. 15. N.

Bond, a County of Illinois or the Kaskaskias. Pop. 3,124. Greenville is the chief town.

Bondorf, a town of Suabia, in the Black Forest, capital of a county which joins the Brisgau. It is 7 m. S. by W. of Furstenburg, now included in the territory of the Duchy of Baden.

Bondou, an interior country of North Africa, lying between the rivers Senegal and Gambia, inhabited by the Foulah race of negroes, who are industrious and social in their habits, and Mahometans in religion.

Boness, or Borrowstonnes, a town of Scotland, in Linlithgowshire, with a safe and commodious harbour on the frith of Forth. It has a considerable trade in ship-building and coal, and extensive manufactures of salt and stoneware. It is 5 m. N. of Linlithgow. Pop. in 1821, 3,018.

Bonhomme, t. St. Louis Co. Missouri.

Bonnefemme, t. Howard Co. Missouri.

Boni, or Bony, a spacious bay between the two southern promontories of the Isle of Celebes. It has numerous shoals and rocks, and is commonly called Bugges Bay by Europeans. Near the upper end of the bay, on the shore of the western promontory is the town of Boni, which is the capital of a kingdom of the same name, but little known. The inhabitants are partly Mahometans. It is in the lat. of 3. S. and 120. 30. of E. long.

Bonifacio, a fortified seaport of Corsica, with a good harbour and a coral fishery. It stands on a small peninsula, at the south extremity of the island, 37 m. S. of Ajaccio. Long. 9. 20. E. lat. 41. 25. N. Pop. about 3,000.

Bonn, a city of Germany, in the territory of Cologne. It has a flourishing university, four parish churches, and several religious foundations. It was taken by the Duke of Marlborough, in 1703, and by the French in 1794. It is seated on the Rhine, 14 m. S. by E. of Cologne.

Bonnat, a town of France, in the department of La Creuse. Pop. about 2,000.

Bonnetable, a town of France, in the department of Sarthe, 15 m. N. E. of Mons. Pop. 4,500.

Bonneval, a town of France, in the department of Eure and Loire, seated on the Loire, 8 m. N. of Chateaudun.

Bonneville, a town of Savoy, capital of Faucingay, seated on the river Arve, at the foot of a mountain called the Mole, 20 m. S. E. of Geneva.

Bonny, a kingdom of Guinea, N. Africa, lying between Warce and Callabar. The inhabitants are less social than their neighbours, and live in constant collision with those of Callabar.

Bonthain, a seaport at the S. extremity of the western promontory of the island of Celebes, seated on the shore of a large bay, where ships may lie in security during both the monsoons. The town has a palisaded fort, and stands on the south side of a small but deep river. Long. 120. 32. E. lat. 5. 31. S.

Boogebooge, a town of Hindoostan, capital of the country of Cutch, 140 m. S. E. of Tatta, and 230 W. by N. of Amedabad. Long. 69. 2. E. lat. 23. 16. N.

Bool. See Bohol.

Boom, a town of Brabant, on the north bank of the river Nethe, 10 m. S. of Antwerp. Pop. about 3,500.

Boone, a frontier country of the state of Kentucky, nearly encircled by the Ohio River, which divides the north end from the states of Ohio and Indiana, opposite to where the Miami River falls into the Ohio. Pop. 9,012. Burlington, 90 m. N. by E. of Frankfort, is the chief town.

Boonsboro, p.v. Washington Co. Maryland, 16 m. N. W. Fredricktown.

Boonsborough, a town of Kentucky in Madison county, seated on Red River, which runs into the Kentucky, 38 m. E. S. E. of Lexington.

Boornah, a town of Hindoostan, in Bengal, 98 m. N. E. of Calcutta.

Bootea, a mountainous country of Hindoostan Proper, lying between the province of Bengal and Thibet. It is a feudatory province of Thibet, and abounds in mountains covered with verdure, and rich with abundant forest trees; there is scarcely a mountain whose base is not washed by some torrent, and many of the loftiest bear populous villages, amid orchards and plantations, on their summits and on their sides. The southernmost ridge of the Bootan mountains rises near a mile and a half above the plains of Bengal, in a horizontal distance of only 15 miles; and from the summit the astonished traveller looks on the plains below as on an extensive ocean. The Bootas are much fairer and more robust than their neighbours the Bengalees, with broader faces and higher cheek-bones: their hair is invariably black, and cut short; their eyes small and black, with long pointed corners; and their skins remarkably smooth. The houses are built on props, though the country is hilly, and ascended by a ladder: the lower part, closed on all sides, serves for holding stores, and accommodating hogs, cows, and other animals. The capital is Tassasudon.

Boothbay, p.t. Lincoln Co. Me. between Sheepscut and Damariscotta river. Pop. 2,290.

Bootle, a village in Lancashire, Eng. contiguous to Liverpool, which it supplies with fine fresh water, from abundant and never-failing springs near the sea-shore.

Bopfingen, a town of Suabia, on the river Eger, 19 m. N. W. of Donawert.

Boppard, a town of Germany, seated at the foot of a mountain, near the Rhine, 8 m. S. of Coblenz.

Boraks, a town of W. Gothland, Sweden, about 10 m. E. of Gottenburg.

Borcholz, a town on the west side of the bishopric of Paderborn, Westphalia, now part of the Prussian States.

Bord, or Boit, a town of France in the department of Correze. It was the birth-place of Marmontel.

Borba, a town of Alemtejo, Portugal, lying between Estremoz and Vitra-Vicosa.

Bordeaux, a city of France, an episcopal see, and chief town of the department of the Gironde, lies on the left bank of the Garonne, in a semicircular or oval form, corresponding with the curve of the river which constitutes its port. The date of its foundation, like those of many other cities, is lost in the distance of time. It is mentioned by Strabo and some of the Augustine historians. The etymology of its Latin name, Burdigala, is doubtful, and throws no light upon its founders. Under Augustus it was regarded as a great city, and was further aggrandised and embellished by him. Adrian made it the metropolis of the second Aquitaine. In the third century it became an episcopal see, and in the fourth was distinguished for the cultivation of arts and letters. The Roman dominion gave way to barbarism and the Visigoths, who were themselves soon driven out by the still more barbarous Clovis and his Franks. Henceforth it was an integral part of France, and capital of Guienne, with the exception of the periods during which it was under English dominion. The Saracens ravaged it in the eighth century, and the Normans in the tenth.

The long and violent rather than sanguinary contests between the French and English, for the inheritance of Eleanor of Guienne, bore directly upon Bordeaux, the capital, which, alternately French and English, and more indebted to the latter, retained for them a strong partiality for which it was severely mulcted by Charles VII. in 1451. From that period it has continued an integral part of the kingdom of France, partaking, but in a less degree than other cities, the troubles of the Reformation, the League, the Fronde (during the regency of Anne of Austria), and the Revolution. Bordeaux sent to the national assemblies several of the most eloquent and virtuous men of the popular party, called 'Girondists,' from the department of which it is the chief town. Deprived almost wholly of its foreign commerce by the wars and decrees of Bonaparte, it was the first place to open its gates to the Bourbons.

The most striking objects upon approaching Bordeaux are the port and the stupendous bridge, projected and partly executed by Bonaparte, over the Garonne, an arm of the sea rather than a river. The practicability of such a bridge was long doubted, from the breadth of the river—nearly a quarter of a league—and the violence of the current. The port should be viewed from La Bastide, a village opposite Bordeaux, on the right bank: it then presents its magnificent curve round the corresponding segment of the river, its facade, uniform and noble; the quays, crowded and animated; and the river, covered with vessels, generally in a state of gentle movement, heaving with the waves. The town is semicircular; but the port is an elliptic curve, near two leagues in diameter between its extremities. Bordeaux, like so many other cities, is divided into the old and new town, on the right and left. The "course" or avenue of Tourny, leading to the fauxbourg de Chartrons, is remarkably beautiful. The theatre, in the rue de Chapeau-rouge, is a noble building, surpassing in its exterior, but not interior, most other theatres of Europe. Its peristyle consists of twelve Corinthian columns surmounted by a balustrade, with a statue to each column. The vestibule is majestic and ornamented, having a double staircase lighted from a cupola. The exchange, at the extremity of this street, is a vast and imposing structure, with interior arcades round the walls; the central space covered in, and lighted from the top; and a grand door opening into the Place Royale, one of the handsomest squares of Bordeaux, and deficient only in extent. This place merits particular description: its form is that of a horseshoe, opening upon the river, with a fine quay between. It is lined by the exchange and the custom-house, with corresponding fronts; all the façades richly ornamented, and bearing allegorical figures in relief.

The cathedral is the principal Gothic edifice of Bordeaux, but by no means of France, as some have described it. It is remarkable chiefly for the two bold, light, and lofty spires which rise above the portal. The English built it, in part at least, during their occupation of Guienne. There are three other large Gothic churches,—those of St. Michael, St. Croix, and St. Sturin,—which contain some good pictures. The ancient Roman remains called the "Palais Gallien," without any good reason for the name, have nearly disappeared, to make way for modern elegance and avarice. The Roman remains, called the "Palais de Tutelle" gave way to the chateau de Trompette; which, in its turn, has recently made room for new and beautiful edifices, and the spacious Place de Louis XVI. It was in the chateau de Trompette that general Clausel held out so long against the Bourbons. This was probably the main cause of its demolition upon their re-establishment. It is well supplied by the place, new streets, and market, which occupy its site, but which will take some time to be finished. Count Lynch, mayor of Bordeaux, at the fall of Bonaparte, and chiefly instrumental in opening its gates to the Bourbons, erected in this quarter a small museum, in which are preserved all the antiquities discovered in or about Bordeaux: they are scanty. The house of Montaigne still exists as a curiosity in the street bearing his name, and his monument is in a church in the same street.

The communications open to Bordeaux by the Atlantic with the north, America, and the Indies, and by the canal of Languedoc with the south and the Levant, afford to it the greatest facilities for maritime commerce. It accordingly, has an extensive and the most various trade of any port, in every species of produce and manufacture. But the difference of peace and war, especially war between England and France, is to it the difference between prosperity and ruin. Its commercial relations (it has been said) have no other limits in time of peace than those of the world; in time of war they do not extend beyond the lighthouse at the mouth of the Gironde, except smuggling and privateering. The quay of Chartron was grass-grown during the continental blockade: it is, since the peace, the most busy and crowded, especially with the export of wines. The merchants of Bordeaux are hospitable and polite; and the higher orders emulate the capital in luxury, the love of pleasure, and what is called fashion. The women are considered to come nearest to those of the capital in accomplishments, graces, and the love of amusement.

It contains the same establishments as the other great towns, but not on the same scale or with the same degree of cultivation, for the purpose of knowledge and the arts; a branch university, an academy, a library containing an old copy of Montaigne's Essays corrected and noted by himself, a cabinet of natural history, a museum of antiquities and painting, an observatory, but without an observer or instruments of observation.

The ancient parliament of Bordeaux was distinguished for eloquence, learning, and philosophy.—Montaigne, Montesquieu, and the president Dupaty, were among its ornaments. The modern bar has maintained its ancient reputation for eloquence in Ferrière, some years dead; Deseze, Laine, and Ravez—all three peers of France. In the second national or legislative assembly the palm of eloquence was born away by Vergniaud, inferior only to Mirabeau of all the orators of the Revolution. Guadet, Gensonne, and Ducos, who perished by suicide or the guillotine, also eloquent members of the national assembly and convention, were of the bar of Bordeaux. Among the other distinguished natives of Bordeaux are the two Dupatys, sons of the president; the engraver Andrieux; the two musical composers Garat and Rode, the former the first singer—by the way, an equivocal distinction,—the second, the first violin player—of France,—and consequently of Europe. Lais, who was the first singer at the Parisian grand opera for several years, and since the restoration, was also a Bordelese. Berquin, the author of "L'Ami des Enfants;" the grammarian Lebel, several Jesuit controversialists, whose memory has passed away with the controversy respecting that order; and the Latin poet Ausonius, who lived in the time and in the court of Adrian, were natives of Bordeaux.

The city of Bordeaux, especially the new town, is beautiful, rather as a uniform whole, than from any detached or single objects. There are no very striking beauties in its environs, with the exception, perhaps, of the verdant and picturesque banks of the Gironde.—The chateau of Brede is visited rather as the residence, and in some measure the creation, of Montesquieu, than for its intrinsic merits. It is situated in a plain, well wooded; a simple hexagonal building, with a drawbridge, and approached by a long avenue of oak trees. The Tour de Cordouan, at the mouth of the Gironde, is the finest lighthouse in France.

A natural phenomenon called the mascaret, observed at the mouth of the Dordogne, and in no other river of Europe, should not be passed over. When the waters of the Dordogne are low, and especially in summer, a hillock of water, about the height of an ordinary house, is observed at its confluence with the Garonne. It suddenly rises and spreads, rolls along the bank, ascends the river in all its sinuosity, with extraordinary rapidity and a fearful noise. All that comes in its way, on the bank by which it moves, yields to its fury. Trees are torn up, barges sunk, and stones are driven to the distance of fifty paces; all fly from it in consternation; cattle even, with a strong and fierce instinct. It sometimes takes the centre of the river, and changes its shape. The watermen are able by their observations to discover its approach, and thus escape certain destruction. A similar phenomenon was observed by the French traveller Condamine in the Amazon river, and by the English Rennell in the Ganges. Its cause is known, and simple,—the tide flowing with a disproportionate quantity and impulse into the Dordogne, which is right in the direction of the Gironde, whilst the course of the Garonne is angular or divergent. The impediments which the mascaret meets as it ascends the Dordogne from sand banks, the sinuosities, and the rapidity of the opposing current, all tend to increase, and it may be said to enrage, its force. Such is its velocity, that a second must not be lost by him who would escape it.

The population of Bordeaux fluctuates with its commerce between 60,000 and 100,000. From the most recent calculations, in 1828, it appears between 93,000 and 96,000. Its distance from Paris is, by Orleans and Poitiers, 155 1-2 leagues; by Tours and Angouleme, 154 1-2 leagues; by Chateauroux and Perigueux, 153 1-2 leagues. Lat. 44. 50. N. long. 0. 40. W.

Bordentown, a town of New Jersey, in Burlington county, on the west side of the Delaware, 6 m. below Trenton, and 23 N. E. of Philadelphia.

Borge, a town of Denmark, the chief place in the island of Femern, with a fort, on Femern Sound. Long. 11. 17. E. lat. 54. 27. N.

Borgentryck, or Bergentryck, a town on the S. W. side of the Bishopric of Paderborn, Westphalia.

Borghetto, a town on the E. bank of the Adige, at the southern extremity of the bishopric of Trent.—Also the name of a village in the vicinity of Mantua, where a severe battle was fought between the French and Austrians in 1796.

Borgholm, a fortified town on the west side of the isle of Oland, in the Baltic, part of the province of East Gothland.

Borg, Barg, or Бергштадт, a town in the county of Ravensburg, Westphalia.

Borgne, a large lake or inlet of the sea, between the states of Mississippi and Louisiana, communicating with the Gulf of Mexico, and inland with lake Pontchartrain.

Borgo, a seaport town of Russian Finland, lying between Helsingfort and Lovisa. In lat. 60. 21. N. and 25. 45. E. long.

Borgo Rusz, Prunt and Pass, three towns contiguous to each other, near the source of the Bistritz River on the eastern frontier of Transylvania, bordering on the Bukowine. They have salt springs and some manufactures of earthenware. The population is considerable, principally Wallachians.

Borgo, signifying a market town, is prefixed to twelve towns in different parts of Italy.

Borgo, St. Donnini, a town in the duchy of Parma, so called from the martyrdom of Donnini, who was beheaded here in 304. It is a bishop's see, and is situate about midway, on the road from Piacenza to Parma.

Borgo di St. Sepolcro, a town of Tuscany, in the Fiorentino, with a fort, seated near the source of the Tiber, 12 m. N. E. of Arezzo. In 1789 about 1,000 of the inhabitants were destroyed by an earthquake.

Borgoforte, a town of Italy, in the Mantua, on the river Po, at the influx of the Oglio, 10 m. S. of Mantua; and nine others, all inconsiderable.

Borgo, or Burgo D'Osma, a town of Spain, surrounded with walls, and containing about 200 families. 33 m. W. of Soria, and 40 S. E. of Burgos.

Burgo di St. Angelo, a fortress of the island of Malta, a little to the east of Valetta.

Borja, or Bergosa, a town of Spain, in Arragon, in a fruitful spot, near Mount Cayo, at the foot of the Pyrenees, 42 m. W. N. W. of Saragossa.

Borja, a town of Colombia, situate on the head waters of the river Amazon, 300 m. E. by N. of Paita and 90 W. by N. of Jaen. Long. 76. 36. W. lat. 4. 15. S.

Borja, a town in the province of Buenos Ayres, near the frontier of Brazil. It was founded by the Jesuits.

Borisoglebsk, a town of Russia, situate on the banks of the Verona, near the south end of the province of Tamboy, about 300 miles S. E. of Moscow.—It is also the name of a town in the province of Jaroslav, on the west bank of the Volga, a few miles north of the city of Jaroslav. Pop. of each about 3,000.

Borissow, a town of Russian Poland, on the banks of the Berezina, about 35 m. E. of Minsk.

Borkelo, a strong town of Holland, in the county of Zutphen, remarkable for having been the subject of two wars: one in 1665, against the bishop of Munster, and the other with France, in 1672. It is seated on the river Borkel, 15 m. E. N. E. of Zutphen.

Borken, a town of Westphalia, in the principality of Munster, with a collegiate church, seated on the Aa, 38 m. W. of Munster.

Borkum, an island of the kingdom of Hanover, lying between the east and west channels of the Ems river. It is partly inundated at high water. It has a town of the same name, the inhabitants subsisting chiefly by fishing.

Bormio, a town of Switzerland, capital of a county of its name, on the confines of Tyrol. About a mile from the town are medicinal baths. It is seated at the foot of the mountains, on the river Fredolso, near its confluence with the Adda, 40 m. S. E. of Coire. Long. 10. 20. lat. 46. 17. N.

Bormio, or Bormida, a large river of Piedmont, which rises in the territory of Finale, runs north, intersecting the duchy of Montferrat, falling into the Tanaro a little below Alessandria.

Borna, a town of Upper Saxony, in the circle of Leipzig, with a manufacture of stuffs; seated near the river Pleysse, 13 m. S. E. of Leipzig, on the road to Altenburg.

Borneo, an island of Asia, in the Indian Ocean, discovered by the Portuguese in 1521, lying between the lat. of 4. 10. S. and 7. N. and 109. 15. to 119. 25. W. long. being in its extreme length 775 geographical miles of 69 1-2 to a degree, and 650 in extreme breadth; but, as the north part converges into a promontory, if resolved into a square, the sides would not exceed 600 miles; which, however, will give a surface greater than that of any island in the world, except New Holland, being about 360,000 sq. m. or nearly five times larger than Great Britain. Although under the equator, the air is not so excessively hot as might be expected, being frequently refreshed with showers and cool breezes, the thermometer varying from 82. to 94. of Fahrenheit. In the monsoon, from April to September, the wind is westerly, and the rains are constant and heavy, attended with violent storms of thunder and lightning. The rainy season continues for eight months, and during that time all the flat country, from ten to twenty miles from the coast, is overflowed, and the air rendered very unhealthy. For this reason the inhabitants build their houses on floats, which they make fast to trees. They have but one floor, with partitions made with canes; and the roofs are covered with palmetto-leaves, the eaves of which reach within four or five feet of the bottom. Some of their houses are built upon pillars, a sufficient height from the surface not to be deluged.

The countries on the coast are inhabited by a mixture of Malays, Javanese, and Macassars. The aborigines of the island, however, live in the interior, and are called Biadjoos, Biayos, or Diak-kese, &c., who are represented as the most uncouth and unsocial of the human race. Indeed it seems to be here where nature has united the chain of animated creation, and placed the orang outang as the connecting link between the articulating, modulating, and inventing, and the instinctive; or, in other words, between the biped and the quadruped race of animals. On one side of the orang outang, which seems to be a native of the soil of Borneo, are apes, monkeys, bears, goats, deer, horses, buffaloes and other horned cattle, tigers, and the elephant; whilst on the other side is a class of beings with apparently no other claim to the character of man but that of the power of articulation; and yet, amidst this unsocial and unappreciating race of beings, nature seems to have bestowed in lavish profusion all her most delectable gifts; with iron, tin, and various other metals for purposes of utility; gold, diamonds, and various other precious gems, for ornament, abound. It is here that the salangane, a species of swallow, constructs its edible nest, which is exchanged to gratify the luxurious palates of the Chinese, at a rate double its weight of silver. In the vegetable kingdom, in addition to rice and maize for substantial subsistence, the sensations of taste and smell are here to be gratified in the highest possible degree. Cassia, cinnamon, frankincense, and myrrh, are indigenous productions of the country. The laurus camphoratus yields an endless abundance of its fragrant and inflammable substance; whilst agaric, musk, aloes, and various other substances and plants, are dispersed over the country in endless profusion to aid the domestic and social economy of man, and to serve as alternatives in case of accident or disease. On the other hand, the pernicious and poisonous class of plants and reptiles are also common, and the natives appear equally adept at applying them in revenge against their enemies, as in the application of medicines to avoid their consequences. Thus, whilst the soil of Borneo appears susceptible by social arrangements and due cultivation to sustain in a high degree of comfort and enjoyment, a fourth of the whole population of the globe, the total number of inhabitants is supposed not to exceed 3,000,000, divided into numerous petty sovereignties. With the exception, however, of the coast, very little is known as to the extent and condition of the population. The English East India Company formed some settlements upon the coast towards the close of the 17th century; but, in 1706, the Dutch, in the prime of their valour, drove the English entirely from the country, and for more than a century were the only European nation that maintained any direct intercourse with the island. Their grovelling policy has ever been, and still continues to be, to preclude the world from all knowledge of the position, people, condition, and resources of the countries with which they trade, as far as it is possible for them to do so. During the war, subsequently to the peace of Amiens in 1802, when in their turn the Dutch were driven from all their positions in Asia, the English again established themselves on the coast of Borneo, and were making progress in the arts of cultivation and social economy, when, by treaty in 1816, the Dutch were re-instated in their possessions, and Borneo again exposed to their confined and exclusive line of policy. As far as our knowledge of the country does extend, whilst the coast on all sides is low and swampy, the interior seems much intersected by mountains; a river called the Banjar has its source in the centre of the country, about two degrees north of the equator, and runs south into the sea of Java. There are two or three rivers running from E. to W. falling into the sea on the west side, but the north and east coasts appear deficient in good navigable rivers for internal communication by water. There are, however, several fine harbours and roadsteads round the coast; the principal is Bandermassing, at the mouth of the Banjar; Sambar at the south-west point; Sambas on the west coast; Borneo at the north-west; and Passir at the south-east.

Borneo, the principal city, and capital of a kingdom of the same name at the north part of the above island, is situated up a river about 10 m. from the sea, in the lat. of 4. 55. N. and 114. 15. E. long. Like most or all the other towns on the coast, the houses are built on piles driven into the swamp, inundated at high water, and the trading transactions, which are here very considerable with the Chinese and other eastern nations, are carried on in boats and wherries.

Bornheim, a town in the electorate of Cologne, about 15 m. W. by N. of Bonn. Pop. about 1,100. —Also, a town of the Netherlands, about 10 m. N. E. of Dendermonde.

Bornholm, an island of Denmark, just within the Baltic, of an oval form, about 20 miles in circumference, and nearly surrounded by rocks. The soil is stony, but fertile, with excellent pasture; and there are mines of coal, and quarries of marble. It lies 10 m. S. E. of the southern extremity of Sweden. The chief town is Rone, on the west side; the north end is in lat. 55. 18. N. and 14. 49. E. long.

Bornos, a town of the province of Seville, about 15 m. N. E. of Cadiz. Pop. about 3,000.

Bornou, an extensive empire in the interior of North Africa, having Cassina or Kashna on the W. and Nubia on the E. It consists of a number of oases, or fertile spots, interspersed with arid wastes. The climate is said to be characterized by excessive, though not by uniform, heat. Two seasons, one commencing soon after the middle of April, the other at the same period in October, divide the year. The first is introduced by violent winds from the south-east and south, with intense heat, a deluge of sultry rain, and such tempests of thunder and lightning as destroy multitudes of the cattle, and many of the people. At the commencement of the second season, the ardent heat subsides; the air becomes soft and mild, and the weather perfectly serene. Maize, rice, the horse-bean, cotton, hemp, and indigo, are cultivated; and there are figs, grapes, apricots, pomegranates, lemons, limes, and melons. The most valuable tree is called redeynah, in form and height like an olive, the leaf resembling that of a lemon, and bearing a nut, the kernel and shell of which are in great estimation; the first as a fruit, the last on account of the oil it produces. Horses, asses, mules, dogs, horned cattle, goats, sheep, and camels (the flesh of which is much esteemed) are the common animals. Bees are so numerous, that the wax is often thrown away as an article of no value. The game consists of partridges, wild ducks, and ostriches, the flesh of which is prized above every other. The other animals are the lion, leopard, civet cat, wolf, fox, elephant, buffalo, antelope, and the camelopard or giraffe, one of the tallest, most beautiful and most harmless animals in nature. Its neck is very long and its fore legs much longer than the hinder ones, at least in outward appearance. It sometimes feeds upon the grass, which however is scarce in this country, and its ordinary food is the leaf of a sort of mimosa. Within a few years, several of these animals have been transported to Europe. Here are also great numbers of the hippopotamus. They abound in Lake Tchad and the waters of the neighbourhood. Major Denham in his travels in this country saw a whole troop of them in the water following a band of martial music in a negro army marching along the shore. In this country are also many snakes, scorpions, centipedes, and toads. The complexion of the natives is black, but they are not of the Negro cast. The dress of the greater part consists of shirts of blue cotton manufactured in the country, of a red cap brought from Tripoli, and a white muslin turban from Cairo. Nose rings of gold are worn by the principal people. But the only covering of the poorer sort is a kind of sirdle for the waist. In their manners the people are courteous and humane: they are passionately fond of play; the lower classes of draughts, and the higher excel in chess. More than 30 different languages are said to be spoken in Bornou and its dependencies; and the reigning religion is the Mahometan. The monarchy is elective. The sultan is said to have 500 ladies in his seraglio, and that his stud contains likewise 500 horses. His dominions extend beyond the desert into the fertile country of Negroland, of which he possesses a large portion. He has a vast army, which consists almost entirely of horse: the sabre, pike, and bow, are their weapons of offence, and a shield of hides is their armour.

Bornou, the capital of the empire of the same name, with a palace like a citadel. The whole city is surrounded by a high wall, encompassed with a ditch; but the other towns of the kingdom are open. The principal trade is in gold-dust, slaves, horses, ostriches' feathers, salt, and civet. It is seated on the Gazel, 750 m. E. N. E. of Kashna. Long. 25. 5. E. lat. 19. 45. N.

Boro Budor, the chief temple of the Javanese, situate about 60 m. from Samarang, nearly in the centre of the island. It is dedicated to Boodh, and contains several hundred subordinate idols.

Borodino, a village of Russia, near the river Moskwa, about 90 m. W. of Moscow. It will long be memorable in the annals of Russia, for the desperate conflict between the French and Russian armies, during the march of the former towards Moscow, on the 7th of September, 1812, when about 30,000 men on each side were either killed or wounded.

Borough, t. Beaver Co. Pa.

Boroughbridge, a borough in W. Yorkshire, Eng. It has a trade in hardware. Here Edward II. in 1322, defeated the rebel earl of Lancaster. It is seated on the Ure, over which is a stone bridge, 18 m. N. W. of York, and 206 N. by W. of London. It is immediately contiguous to Aldborough; each place returning two members to parliament. Pop. 860.

Borovitchi, a town of Russia, on the south east side of the province of Novogorod, bordering on Twer, seated on the south bank of the Mata river, about 170 m. S. E. of St. Petersburg. Pop. 2,600.

Borovitsk, or Boroosk, another town of Russia, about 60 m. S. W. of Moscow.

Borrano, or Borrial, a town of Spain, in Valencia, near the mouth of the Manjares, 21 m. N. of Valencia. Pop. about 4,000.

Borris, in Ossory, a village in the parish of Aggaboe, Queen's County, Ireland, 63 m. W. by S. of Maryborough. Pop. in 1821, 919.

Borros, a parish in Queen's County, Ireland, which includes the town of Maryborough, by which name the parish is sometimes called. Pop. of the parish, exclusive of the town, 2,032, and of the town, 2,877. See Maryborough.

Borroudale, a village in Cumberland, Eng. six miles south of Keswick. It stands at the end of a narrow and crooked valley, and is famous for mines of plumbago or black-lead, a substance almost peculiar to England and the vicinity of Malaga, Spain.

Borroustones. See Boness.

Borrod, a county in the north part of Upper Hungary, bounded on the east by the Shajo branch of the Sheif river. It is one of the most fertile districts of the country. Pop. about 95,000. Mishkoltz is the capital.

Bosa, a seaport on the west coast of Sardinia, and a bishop's see, with a castle, on a river of the same name, 17 m. S. S. E. of Argeri. Long. 8. 50. E. lat. 40. 29. N.

Boscaven, p.t. Merrimack Co. N. H. 68 m. from Boston: 52 from Portsmouth. Pop. 2,093.

Boscawen Island, an island in the Pacific Ocean, about 10 m. in circumference. Long. 175. 10. W. lat. 15. 50. S.

Bosco, or Boschi, a town of Italy, in the Milanese, seated on the Orbe, 5 m. east of Alexandria.

Boscobel, a village in Shropshire, Eng. 9 m. south east of Newport, where Charles II. was concealed in an oak, after the battle of Worcester.

Boshuana, or Boothuana, an extensive tract of country in the interior of South Africa, extending through about 5 deg. of lat. from 25. to 20. south, inhabited by numerous tribes of people, of whom at present very little is known. They seem physically considered, to be of the same stock as the Caffres, but somewhat more advanced in social economy, which seems to improve northwards. Hence it may be inferred, that civilization and improvement in Africa gradually extended itself from the north. The chief town, as far as the country is at present known, is Lattakoo, represented to have contained about 15,000 inhabitants, reduced to 7 or 8,000 during the present century, by the continued intestine broils of the different tribes. They cultivate various kinds of grain, and look upon fish, as an article of food, with horror. As far as pretension to worship prevails, the people are idolaters; but they seem indifferent to worship of any kind: polygamy is general; the elder men have usually one young wife, and another who is past child bearing. Mahomedism appears not to have reached them. Their dress is principally of skins, which they tan into leather; and, in the more northern parts, they appear to have made some progress in the smelting and working of iron.

Bosnia, a compact and naturally fertile district of European Turkey, lying between the lat. of 43. 18. and 45. 10. N. and the 17th and 20th of W. long. It is bounded on the west by the Austrian province of Croatia, north by the Saave river, which falls into the Danube, and divides it from Slavonia; on the east by the Turkish Province of Servia, and south by the north end of Albania and Dalmatia. It has some mountain districts, and is intersected by several rivers, running from the north into the Saave; and the Narenta, which rises in the south part of the province, runs south through Dalmatia, into the Adriatic at Narisi, a few miles north of Ragusa. Its area may be stated at about 15,000 square m.; yet the population is supposed not to exceed 80,000. As a frontier district, it is principally occupied by Turkish soldiery, who subsist upon the products of the occupiers of the soil; and as the soldiery of the province amount to 40 or 50,000, they of course tend to subdue all excitement to agricultural exertion; and thus, although the vine and the olive would yield fruit in abundance, one of the finest districts in Europe is kept a wilderness, by an undisciplined, lawless, and ruthless horde of soldiery. The principal towns are, Sarajo, the capital; Banjaluka, Sworniek, Trauruk, (the seat of the pacha,) and Prisrendi. As far as any external commercial intercourse is maintained with Bosnia, it is principally through Dalmatia from Ragusa. The greater part of the province formerly belonged to Hungary. The inhabitants are principally Slavonians, speaking the Slavonic with great purity, and professing the formulary of the Greek church.

Bosphorus, the narrow strait, 20 miles in length, and from 1 to 1.2 broad, which unites the Black Sea with the sea of Marmora. It is sometimes called the strait of Constantinople.

Bosra, a town of Syria, where Mahomet is said to have received much information from a Nestorian monk, towards founding his religious doctrines. It is 100 m. S. of Damascus.

Bossiny, or Trevenna, a borough in Cornwall, Eng. seated near the Bristol channel, 17 m. N. W. of Launceston, and 233 W. by S. of London. See Tintagel.

Bost, a strong town of Persia, capital of Sigistan or Seistan. It is seated on the Heermund, and on the route of the caravans, from Ispahan to Caubul, about 170 m. W. S. W. of Candahar. Long. 64. 15. E. lat. 32. 30. N.

Bostan, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in the north part of the province of Aladeul, situate near the eastern confines of Carmania, and near the source of a river which falls into the Levant Sea, at Adanah.

Boston, a borough and seaport town of Lincolnshire, Eng. When the idle, the crafty, and the vicious, sought subsistence and refuge, and the oppressed and indigent relief, from monastic institutions; and when monasteries, abbeys, priories, and convents, with their pointed windows and archways, and varied styles of tasteful architectural display, were spread over the country, as barracks, gaols, and workhouses, are at the present day, Boston ranked among the most important towns in the country, having had not less than ten fraternal establishments; all of which were annulled, and the inmates dispersed under the general demolition of those institutions by Henry VIII. After this reverse, when England exchanged her agricultural productions and raw materials for the haberdashery and other manufactures of Germany and Holland, Boston became one of the principal markets in the kingdom for wool, which used to be exported in large quantities to Holland, and the Hanse Towns: but, on the exportation of wool being totally prohibited, Boston was doomed to a further reverse, and gradually declined until towards the close of the last century, when a paper circulating medium subverted that of gold and silver, and the modern system of creating ideal wealth by funding had doubled and trebled the money rate of all articles of subsistence, thereby exciting an unusual degree of enterprize in agricultural pursuits, a great portion of the pasture lands of Lincolnshire were converted into tillage, and Boston became the principal port through which the surplus produce found its way to market, and it has, since the commencement of the present century, gradually been rising in population and importance. The number of inhabitants, which in 1801 was only 5,926, in 1821 amounted to 10,330. The town is situate on both the banks of the river Witham, over which is a handsome bridge, of one arch, of cast iron, eighty-six feet in span, a few miles above the entrance of the river into the sea, called Boston Wash, with which river, and by canals, it communicates with a considerable portion of the interior of the country, and, in addition to its very considerable trade in crisis for the London market, it carries on a direct trade with the Baltic for deals, hemp, tar, &c. The parish church founded by St. Botolph in 1309, is a very stately edifice, being 300 feet in length, supported by Corinthian pillars, lighted by pointed windows, and its steeple ascended by steps, corresponding in number with the months, weeks, and days, in the year. The steeple or tower is 246 feet in height, surmounted with a lantern, which serves as a beacon for many miles out at sea, and the country being very level inland, it forms a beautiful and interesting object in the perspective many miles distant. The town is governed by a mayor, recorder, twelve aldermen, and eighteen common councilmen, with subordinate officers, who are vested with the admiralty jurisdiction of the adjoining coasts. The corporation, since 1800, have erected a commodious fish market, which is abundantly supplied, and large quantities are conveyed into the interior counties of Nottingham and Leicester. It has four fairs annually, and two endowed schools, and returns two members to parliament. It is 36 m. S. E. of Lincoln, and 116 N. of London. Lat. 52. 48. N. Long. 0. 2. W.

Boston Deep, is the sea channel of the inlet called the Wash, leading from the German Ocean by the Lincolnshire coast, up to the port of Boston. The opposite side, which washes the coast of Norfolk is called Lyna Deep. The body of the Wash is a large shoal, partly dry at low water, and even the Deep is the reverse of what their name implies, not admitting at the most, vessels of more than 200 tons burthen.

Boston, the capital of Massachusetts, and the chief city in New England, stands upon a peninsula in a capacious harbour, at the western extremity of Massachusetts Bay. Its situation is noble and commanding, the site being elevated and the city nearly surrounded by water, so that to the eye of the spectator its lofty domes and spires seems like those of Venice to rise out of the waves. In the interior, there is much irregularity, and many crooked and narrow streets, but there are also in Boston a greater number of elegant buildings, beautiful sites, and objects that display the wealth, taste, and public spirit of the inhabitants, than in any other city of the United States. The beautiful common in the western part, occupies the southerly slope of Beacon Hill. It is a quarter of a mile in extent, surrounded by a mall planted with elms, with an open prospect to the west and fronted in other parts by elegant buildings. The State House, which stands on the summit of the hill overlooking the common, and indeed the whole city, is a spacious brick edifice, painted of a stone colour and surmounted by a lofty dome. The finest ornament of its interior, is a statue of Washington in white marble, by Chantry. Fronting the mall, is also St. Paul's church, built of hammered granite with a façade of freestone, exhibiting six massy Doric columns. The effect of the simple elegance of this structure is much injured by the contrast of a huge gothic pile at its side, the Masonic Temple, whose lofty front, however, exhibits an imposing specimen of that order of architecture. The Stone Chapel is the name given to a church of considerable antiquity; it is a plain edifice, with a square tower, surrounded by a Doric colonnade, and the style is both chaste and dignified. Trinity church is of rough granite, in the mixed gothic style, with a lofty tower, and its whole appearance is massy and imposing. The congregational church in Bowdoin street, is another edifice in the same style, but smaller. The church, in Church Green, is of white granite, octagonal in shape and supporting a tall and slender spire; it is much admired by many, but is rather finical. The Brattle Street church is worthy a stranger's notice for displaying in its front the cannon ball shot into it during the siege of Boston in 1775. The Old South church, which the British soldiers turned into a hippodrome while they held possession of the city, still remains, but its locality is now central and not southerly. Park Street church at the head of the mall, has a spire that towers above every other in the city. There are besides these, many houses of worship, not without claims to notice.

But the structure which most strikes the attention of the stranger, is perhaps Faneuil Hall Market. This pile is 536 feet in length, two stories high, and is built of white granite, with porticoes of columns cut from a single stone. This is probably the handsomest market-house in the world, and is fronted on both sides by solid blocks of stone stores in a uniform architecture. The street on the north front is 65, and that on the south, 102 feet in width. In the halls of the upper story, are annually held the great sales of American manufactures. Old Faneuil Hall, immortal in the annals of our country as the 'cradle of Liberty,' stands west of the market, and is an ancient pile of brick, containing a spacious hall, in which popular assemblies are still held and public dinners, celebrations, &c. are performed. The Post Office and City Hall are in the Old State House, at the head of State Street. Many of the banks are elegant stone edifices. The County Court House is stone and of handsome proportions, but its situation is unfavourable for display, and the spot it occupies would be more serviceable for a public square. The Massachusetts General Hospital is large, and elegantly built of stone; it is a monument of the philanthropic munificence of private citizens.

Here also the finest hotel in the United States displays the public spirit and liberality of the Boston people. This edifice is called the Tremont House, and occupies a beautiful situation; its main body is granite, with an elegant portico of fluted columns cut from a single stone. The wings in the rear are brick with stone basements, and with the front, form three sides of a quadrangle. This hotel contains nearly 200 apartments, and is unrivalled in the country for the excellence of its accommodations. There are other structures for public objects worthy of attention, as the prisons, houses of industry, &c., these are generally of Quincy or Chelmsford granite, an excellent building stone, of which there is an abundance in the neighbourhood of the place.

Alterations and additions have of late years vastly improved the appearance of Boston. The streets which were formerly almost without an exception, narrow and crooked, have been in a great degree rendered wide and commodious; the old wooden structures, have in the greater part of the city been replaced by handsome buildings of stone or brick. In the western part, particularly, there is much neatness and elegance. The splendour of the private buildings here, is not equalled in any other part of the Union.

The literary institutions of this city are of the first order. The public libraries contain 70,000 volumes. The Boston Athenæum is the finest establishment of its kind in the United States; its library contains above 25,000 volumes, and a reading room, in which the most esteemed periodicals, from all parts of the world, may be found. If we add to these the library of Harvard College, in the neighbourhood, of 40,000 volumes, making the number of books within the reach of the citizens 110,000, it must be allowed that Boston offers to the scholar a more advantageous residence than any other spot in the western world. The literary character of the citizens corresponds to these advantages; Boston is distinguished for the number and talent of its periodical works: the North American Review, which is allowed to be the most able of all the literary journals of our country, and the only one that has gained a reputation in Europe, is published here. The Christian Examiner, which has now enlarged its plan, and assumed more of a purely literary character, is ranked among the first publications of the day. The periodicals of the city are more than 60, including 31 newspapers, 7 of which are daily. The public schools are not equalled in any other city in the world. The ambition of the scholars is excited by annual rewards to the most worthy, in the shape of a public dinner at Faneuil Hall in company with the Mayor and officers of the city; and the distribution of gold and silver medals, the product of a fund for this purpose established by the great Franklin, who was born in this city. In the department of the fine arts, there is much taste and liberal patronage displayed here. The annual exhibitions of paintings in the gallery of the Athenæum is the best in the country, and a fund is collecting from its proceeds for the encouragement of the arts.

This city is distinguished for the early and resolute stand which it made in favour of American liberty. It was, in fact, the birth-place of our independence, and the first American blood shed by the British, was in the skirmish between the citizens of Boston and the soldiery, in State Street, on the 5th of March, 1770, which is known by the name of the Boston Massacre. The animosity occasioned by this occurrence never subsided, and six years afterward the British were driven from the place.

In commerce, Boston is the second city in the union, and its trade is carried on with every quarter of the world. The yearly imports are 13,000,000 dollars, and the exports 9,000,000. The shipping of the port amounted in 1828, to 161,583 tons. The wharves here are the finest in the United States. Long Wharf and Central Wharf are each nearly a quarter of a mile in length, and covered with stores; those of the latter are a solid pile, with an observatory in the centre, where signals are received by telegraph from the islands in the bay. India Wharf has a solid pile of buildings, of large extent. All these form spacious docks, and are furnished with broad carriage ways.

The manufactures of the city and suburbs, consist of glass, iron, cordage, leather, &c.; the finest cut and crown glass in the country is made here. The manufacturing interests are strongly supported in Boston, and a great portion of its capital lies in the establishments of Lowell, Waltham and other manufacturing towns. A railroad is in progress from Boston to Lowell, which, when completed, will give additional spirit to the manufacturing industry of the state and contribute to the prosperity of the capital. There are 8 avenues to the city, viz., 6 bridges, the neck, and the western causeway. The bridges lead from Charlestown, Cambridge and South Boston; they are of wood, and that leading to Cambridgeport is nearly two thirds of a mile in length. The western avenue is of solid earth, faced with stone, and is a mile and a half in length. The traveller who approaches the city on a dark evening, admires the brilliant and picturesque appearance of the lights upon the avenues, stretching in long lines across the wide bay that embosoms the city. The western portion of the bay is enclosed by the causeway above mentioned, and serves for a mill-basin.

The wealth of Boston is computed at 92 millions of dollars; probably no other city of its size can be found equally rich. The inhabitants, although distinguished for being 'full of notions,' yet have more of a settled and permanent character than those of any other American city. The high degree of wealth, education and literary talent which prevails here, has imparted to the upper classes a portion of that exclusive feeling, which, for want of a more precise definition is called aristocracy, although there is no wider distinction of classes than such as the natural operations of society mark out. The rich, the gifted, and the well-bred, are self-complacent in the possession of their power, or superiority, but their pride is tempered with urbanity and never wears a repulsive shape. No people are more tolerant in religion, and they have long since discarded every thing offensive in the strait-laced puritanism of their ancestors; yet no where is the state of moral feeling more correct. There are all sects in religion, but the Unitarians are the most numerous, and their clergy can boast of some of the ablest heads of the day. The people are noted for their love of parade, pomp, and public celebrations, but the occasions are generally well chosen, and the performances seldom offend good taste.

The facilities for travelling in the neighbourhood of Boston are very great. There are more stage coaches running to and from this city than any other in America. Hourly and half-hourly stages carry passengers to the neighbouring towns at a very low rate. The number of daily arrivals and departures is about 250. In summer there are steamboats running to Hingham, Nahant and the coast of Maine. The roads about Boston are excellent, and the public houses of the first order. The country here is exceedingly varied and picturesque, adorned with every graceful variety of hill and dale, garden and grove, and abounding in beautiful villages and elegant country seats. From the dome of the State House, the spectator may look down upon the whole city, the country around it, the harbour and bay sprinkled with beautiful islands and the ocean beyond, forming a panorama not surpassed by any view of its kind in the world. The harbour is capacious, safe, and impregnable to an enemy. The heights of Dorchester, which command the city and harbour and whose batteries drove the British from Boston in 1776, are now within the limits of the city.

A city government was first adopted in 1821; the officers are a Mayor, eight Aldermen, and a Common Council of 48, all elected by a popular vote in December annually. With Chelsea, on the opposite side of the harbour, Boston composes the county of Suffolk, which has 6 Senators in the State Legislature. The city alone sends one Representative to Congress. The yearly expenses are about 300,000 dollars, of which above 50,000 are appropriated to the support of common schools; 80,000 for improving the streets and 30,000 for the poor.

Boston was founded in 1630. Its name in the Indian language was Shawmut; and it was called by the settlers Tremont or Trimountain, from its three hills. * The two-hundredth year of the city was solemnized on the 17th September 1830 by a splendid jubilee, when all the public officers, associations, &c., formed in an immense procession, marched to the Old South Church, the usual scene for such festivities, and were addressed by the President of Harvard College.

The census of 1830 gave a return of 61,392 inhabitants for the 12 wards within the jurisdiction of the city, but taking in those adjoining parts of Charlestown, Cambridge and Roxbury, which are to all practical purposes, so many portions of the capital, its whole population will amount to about 80,000. The city proper has 40 churches; 19 banks, 2 theatres, 80 public schools, 50 bookstores, and is 210 m. N. E. from New York; 300 N. E. from Philadelphia; 300 S. S. E. from Montreal, and 436 N. E. from Washington. It is in N. lat. 42. 22. and in W. long. 71. 3.

Boston, p.t. Erie Co. N. Y. 320 m. W. Albany. Pop. 1,520.

Boston, t. Portage Co. Ohio.

Boswellville, p.v. Louisa Co. Va. 20 m. N. W. Richmond.

Bosworth, Market, a town in Leicestershire, Eng. In its vicinity, in 1468, was fought the famous battle between Richard III. and the Earl of Richmond, afterward Henry VII. in which the former lost his crown and life. It is seated on a hill, 13 m. W. of Leicester, and 106 N. N. W. of London. Pop. 1,117.

Bosworth, Husband, another town in Leicestershire, 14 m S. of Leicester. Pop. 820.

Botany Bay, a bay of New South Wales, discovered by Cook in 1770, and so called from the great quantity of herbs, found on the shore. The promontories which form its entrance are named Cape Banks and Point Solander. It was originally fixed on for a colony of convicts from Great Britain, which in the sequel, was established at Port Jackson, 13 m. further to the N. See Holland New. Long. 151. 21. E. lat. 34. 0. S.

Botany Island, a small island in the Pacific Ocean, to the S. E. of New Caledonia. Long. 167. 17. E. lat. 22. 27. S.

Botesdale, a town in Suffolk, Eng. seated in a valley, 15 m. N. E. of Bury, and 56 of London. Pop. 584.

Botetourt, an interior county of the W. District of Virginia, lying between the two most easterly ridges of the Appalachian mountains. The Roanoke and James rivers have both their sources within this county; and it is bounded on the north by the valley over which is the natural bridge, 90 feet in length and 200 feet above the surface of the water. (See Cedar Creek.) Pop. 16,354. Fincastle, 194 m. W. of Richmond, is the chief town.

Bothnia, Gulf of, a large gulf of the Baltic, forming its northern continuation, extending in a north by east direction, from the Isle of Aland, in the lat. of 60. to Tornea, in the lat. of 66. N. and having an average breadth of about 3 degrees of long. between 17. and 25. E. It is bounded on the west by Sweden and east by Finland.

Bothnia, East, the northern province of Finland, extending from Finland Proper, in the lat. of 62. N. to the line of the arctic circle, which divides it from Lapland; lying on the east shore of the Gulf of Bothnia, between 21. and 30. of east longitude, bounded on the east by the Russian Province of Olonetz; containing an area of about 28,000 square miles, but having only about 70,000 inhabitants. It is generally low and marshy, intersected by lakes and small rivers, abounding with fish, some salmon. The climate is generally unfavourable to vegetation. It has, however, some herds of small horned cattle, and bears, and other furred animals are common; and it exports some fir timber, deals, tar, and pitch. It is divided into twenty-eight parishes under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the see of Abo, which favours the tenets of Luther. The inhabitants, with some little exception of Swedish, speak the Finnish language. The chief towns are Kajana on the east side, and Uleaborg, Brahestad, Carleby, Jacobstadt, Wasa, and Christianstadt all on the shores of the gulf of Bothnia. This province, with Finland, was ceded by Sweden to Russia in 1809.

Bothnia, West, a province of Sweden, lying between the west shore of the gulf of Bothnia and Lapland, extending south from Angermanland, in the lat. of 63. 50. to that of 67. N. and 19. to 25. E. long. Its area is about half that of East Bothnia, and the population does not exceed 50,000. It differs but little in character from the eastern province; it abounds somewhat more in furred animals, which serve alike for subsistence and traffic. It is intersected by numerous streams, all running from west to east into the gulf. The four principal rising from the mountains which divide Lapland from Norland, give name to as many districts and towns; viz. Tornea, at the head of the gulf, Lulea, Pitea, and Umea, at the south extremity of the province, all upon the coast of the gulf. It contains some veins of copper and iron; but its chief exports are timber, deals, and tar. It is under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the see of Hernösand.

Bothwell, a town of Scotland, in the county of Lanark, situate on the east bank of the Clyde, between Hamilton and Glasgow. It is distinguished for the battle fought in its vicinity in 1679, between the covenanters and the royal forces commanded by the duke of Monmouth, when the former were completely defeated.

Botley, a village in Hampshire, Eng. 6 m. E. of Southampton, on the river Hamble, noted for a considerable trade in flour. Pop. in 1821, 670.

Bottesford, a village in Leicestershire, Eng. on the confines of Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire, 7 m. W. by N. of Grantham. Near it, on a lofty eminence, is Belvoir castle, the ancient seat of the dukes of Rutland. In the church are several handsome monuments of that noble family; and many Roman antiquities have been found in the neighbourhood. Pop. 1,070.

Bottlehill, p.t. Morris Co. N. J. 15 m. N. W. of Elizabethtown.

Botwar, a town in the north part of the duchy of Württemberg, on a river of its name, 15 m. S. S. E. of Heilbron. Pop. about 2,000.

Botzen, a large town in the interior of the Tyrol, beautifully located near the junction of the Eich and Eisach, branches of the Adige river. It has some manufactures of silks, and has four fairs annually, numerously attended. The surrounding country produces excellent wine. It was taken by the French in March, 1797, but retaken by the Austrians immediately after. An Austrian commandant resides here. It is about 13 m. N. of Trent. Pop. about 8,000.

Botzenburgh, a town of Brandenburg, in the Ucker Mark, 9 m. S. W. of Prentzlan, and about 50 m. N. of Berlin. It has a manufacture of silk.

Bouchain, a fortified town of France, in the department of Nord, divided into two parts by the Scheldt. It was taken by the allies in 1711, under the Duke of Marlborough, but retaken the year following; and was invested by the Austrians in 1793, but soon relieved. It is 9 m. W. of Valenciennes.

Bouchart, a town of France, in the department of Indre and Loire, situate on an island in the river Vienne, 15 m. S. S. W. of Tours.

Bouchemain, a town of France, in the department of Mayenne and Loire, 4 m. S. of Angers.

Bouclans, a town of France, in the department of Doubs, 8 m. E. of Besançon.

Boudry, a town of Switzerland, in the County of Neuchâtel, 4 m. S. W. of Neuchâtel. It was the birth-place of Marat.

Bougainville's Strait, on the S. Pacific Ocean, between an island of the same name and the north end of Solomon's Island, in the lat. of 7. S. and 156. E. long.

Bouillon, a town of Netherlands, in Luxembourg, with a castle, on an almost inaccessible rock. The French took it in 1676, when Louis XIV. gave it to the duke of Bouillon. In 1794 this town was taken by storm, by general Beaulieu, after defeating a considerable body of French republicans, and given up to pillage. It is seated near the river Semois, on the frontier of France, 6 m. N. N. E. of Sedan, and 46 W. by N. of Luxembourg.

Bouilly, a town of France, in the department of Aube, 7 m. S. of Treves.

Boulay, a town of France, in the department of Moselle, 13 m. N. E. of Metz.

Boulogne, a seaport of France, in the department of Pas de Calais. It is divided into two towns, the Upper and the Lower; the former is strongly fortified; but the latter is merely surrounded with walls. The port has for a long time been so shallow that no ships of burden could enter it. But owing to some recent improvement, it is represented to hold ten feet at low water; and a large basin has lately been constructed to contain 17 feet. The harbour is protected by a mole, to which very strong fortifications have been added. Under Bonaparte, Boulogne was made a royal port, and no merchant vessel, privateers, nor even prizes were admitted, unless loaded with ordnance or military stores, being the principal depot of the armaments which he intended for the invasion of Britain. Since the peace in 1815, it has been much resorted to by the English, several hundreds of families having adopted it as their place of residence, who, subsisting on annuities paid out of the taxes raised in England, contribute essentially to the interest of the town and neighbourhood. Bonaparte commenced the erection of a tower, apparently intended to be carried to a great height; but it is left in an unfinished state, and its utility is not very obvious. It is 16 m. S. W. of Calais, in lat. 50. 46. N. and 1. 37. E. long. There is also another town of the same name in France, in the department of Upper Garonne, having several tanneries. It is 12 m. N. by W. of St. Gaudins.

Bourbon, an island in the Indian ocean, 50 m. long and 35 broad, lying 400 m. east of Madagascar. It has not a safe harbour, but there are some roads for shipping. On the S. E. is a volcano. It is a fertile island; producing, in particular, the finest cotton, and excellent coffee. The French settled here in 1672. It surrendered to the English, after the capture of the Isle of France, on the 3d of December, 1810. But Bourbon was restored at the General Peace in 1815; since when, the culture of sugar, coffee, and cotton, has been pursued with great avidity, by the aid of slaves, obtained from Madagascar. It also produces a variety of woods, resins, gums, and flints. Wild goats and hogs abound in the mountains and woods. The cattle in the plains are numerous; and the coasts supply abundance of fish. On the whole, this island affords, not only all the means of subsistence, but of enjoyment in a very high degree. The white inhabitants are supposed not to exceed 5,000; and the slaves about 20,000. St. Denis is the chief town, in lat. 20. 52. N. and 55. 30. E. long, about 100 m. S. of the Isle of France.

Bourbon, an interior County in the N. W. part of the state of Kentucky. Pop. 18,434. Paris, situate on a fork of the south branch of the Licking river, 40 m. E. of Frankfort, is the chief town.

Bourbon Lancy, a town of France, on the west side of the department of Saône and Loire, celebrated for its hot mineral waters, and a large marble pavement, called the Great Bath, which is a work of the Romans. It is 28 m. S. W. of Autun. Pop. 2,800.

Bourbon l'Archambaud, a town of France, in the department of Allier, celebrated for its hot baths and for giving name to the family of the kings of France. It is situate near the river Allier, 15 m. W. of Moulins. Pop. 2,600.

Bourbonne les Bains, a town of France, in the department of Upper Marne, famous for its hot baths, 18 m. E. N. E. of Langres. Pop. 3,200.

Bourbonnois, a late province of France, bounded on the north by Nivernois and Berry, west by Berry and Marche, south by Auvergne, and east by Burgundy and Forez. It abounds in corn, fruit, pastures, wood, game, and wine. It now forms the department of Allier.

Bourbourg, a town of France, in the department of Nord, seated near the river Aa, and on a canal, that communicates with Calais and Dunkirk, 10 m. S. W. of Dunkirk. Pop. 4,100.

Bourg, which in French signifies borough, is prefixed to the names of about 20 places in different parts of France; among the more considerable are,

Bourg-en-Brasse, the capital of the department of Ain. Near it is the magnificent church and monastery of the Augustines, which contains the mausoleum of Margaret of Austria, and of Charles V. The principal commerce is in corn, horses, cattle, and white leather. It stands in a marshy but fertile country, on the river Ressouse, 36 m. N. E. of Lyons, and 233 S. S. E. of Paris. It was the birth place of Lalande. Pop. about 7,300.

Bourg-sur-Mer, in the department of Gironde, with a tide harbour on the Dordogne, near the point of land formed by the junction of that river with the Garonne, on its north side. It has a great trade in wine, and is 15 m. N. by E. of Bordeaux. Pop. 2,700.

Bourganeuf, a town of France, in the department of Creuse. Here is a lofty tower, faced with stones cut diamond-wise, erected by Zisim, brother of Bajazet II. emperor of the Turks, when he was obliged to exile himself, after the loss of a decisive battle. Bourganeuf is seated on the Taurion, 20 m. N. E. of Limoges. Pop. about 2,000.

Bourges, a city of France, capital of the department of Cher, and an archiepiscopal see, with a university, founded by Louis XI. the Nero of France, who was born here. In extent, it is one of the greatest cities in France, but the inhabitants hardly exceed 17,000. The principal manufactures are cloth, woolen stuffs, and stockings; but the trade is inconsiderable. It is seated at the conflux of the Auron and Yevre, 25 m. N. W. of Nevers, and 125 S. of Paris.

Bourget, a town of Savoy, on a lake of the same name, near the Rhone, 6 m. N. of Chambery.

Bourgneuf, a seaport of France, in the department of Lower Loire. The chief trade is in salt, made from the adjacent salt-marshes. It stands on a bay to which it gives name, between the isle of Noirmoutier and the continent, 20 m. S. W. of Nantes. It has an oyster fishery on the coast; some ships are also fitted out from hence for the Newfoundland fishery. Pop. about 2,000. Long. 1. 51. W. lat. 47. 3. N.

Bourgoin, a town of France, in the department of Isere. Some hemp is raised in the vicinity, and it has some manufactures of chintz. Pop. about 3,600.

Bourgueil, a town of France, in the department of Indre and Loire, 23 m. W. of Tours. It has a Benedictine abbey and castle. Pop. about 2,800.

Bourlos, a large lake, or bay, lying between the Rosetta and Damietta branches of the Nile. On the East Cape is a town called Bourlos, in the lat. of 31. 36. N. and 31. 27. E. long.

Bourmont, a town of France, in the department of Upper Marne, on a steep mountain, 20 m. E. by N. of Chaumont.

Bourn, a town in Lincolnshire, Eng. It has a navigable canal to Boston, and is seated at the source of a rivulet that runs to Spalding, 35 m. S. of Lincoln, and 97 N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 2,242.

Bournabat, a village in the vicinity of Smyrna, where Homer is said to have written his Iliad.

Bowro, one of the Molucca islands, in the Banda Sea, between Celebes and Ceram, about 90 m. long and 30 broad. Some mountains in it are extremely high, and the sea on one side is uncommonly deep. It is represented as being exceedingly fertile, yielding abundance of rice. One of its peculiar vegetable productions is the melaleuca castigolia, from the leaves of which the Cajeput oil is extracted, which forms one of the principal articles of traffic. The nutmeg, clove, cocoa, banana, and ebony trees, as well as the orange, lemon, citron &c., are also common to the island. The natives, who live mostly in the interior, are represented to be as rude and unsocial as those of Borneo, to whom they bear a close affinity in feature, manner, and character. Wild boars, goats, and hog deer, range in the woods, which are also much infested with reptiles, and some of an enormous size. There is a town of the same name on the shore of a commodious bay, called Cajeli, on the north east part of the island, in lat. 3. 25. S. and 127. E. long. where the Dutch have a fort; their grovelling policy precludes alike all social improvement among the natives, whilst it constitutes a barrier to the attainment of all knowledge of the details of their numbers, economy, and resources. Some Mahometans, and natives of other islands, who live in subservience to the Dutch, inhabit the towns upon the coast.

Bourthes, a town of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, 12 m. S. E. of Boulogne.

Boussac, a town of France, in the department of Creuse, with a castle on a rock, 25 m. N. E. of Gueret.

Bouton, an island of the Indian Ocean, lying off the south east promontory of the island of Celebes, about 180 miles in length from N. to S. and 25 in breadth. It is in part mountainous and woody, but in other parts exceedingly fertile. The natives appear to be of Malayan origin, professing the Mahometan faith. It is governed by a sultan, who lives in considerable state, and whose authority extends over some small islands contiguous. Forts are constructed, on several inaccessible heights, in different parts of the island. It is said to produce cotton of a very superior quality, which the natives manufacture into cloth. The north point of the island is in lat. 4. 21. S. and 123. 5. E. long. The Dutch attempted to establish themselves upon this island; but their perfidy led to a general massacre, and they have not since renewed the attempt. There is a town of the same name at the north west extremity of the island, at which the sultan usually resides. There is also another island (a small one) called Bouton, off the Malay coast, in lat. 6. 25. N. and 99. 15. E. long.

Routonne, a river of France, rising in the department of Deux Sevrres, becomes navigable at St. Jean D'Angely, and falls into the Charente about 10 miles above Rochefort. There is a town of the same name, on the north bank of the river, about 18 m. W. of St. Jean D'Angely.

Bouvignes, a small fortified town of the Netherlands, on the west bank of the Meuse, about 14 m. S. of Namur. This is the spot where a great victory was gained by Philip Augustus, king of France, over the Emperor Otho IV., A. D. 1214.

Bouzdogan, a town in the south west part of Natolia, about 18 m. N. W. of Melasso.

Bouzok, a town of Asiatic Turkey, near the north east confines of Caramania, and near the source of a branch of the Kisil Jarmak River, which falls into the Black Sea.

Bouzonville, a town of France, in the department of Moselle, on the river Nied, 27 m. N. E. of Metz.

at the foot of the Apennines, 15 m. N. E. of Benevento.

Bow, or Stratford le Bow, one of the out parishes of London, on the east side. The church is 4 miles from the Royal Exchange. Bow is situate at the south-east extremity of the county of Middlesex, separated from Essex by the river Lea (see Blackwall). The church is very ancient; and an old stone bridge over the river is supposed to have been the first erected in England, and the curve or bow of the arch to have given name to the town. Over this bridge is the great outlet from London to the 3 eastern counties of England: viz. Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. The pop. of the parish of Bow in 1821 was 2,349; and of Bromley, immediately contiguous, 4,360. In this section of the metropolis are several very extensive flour-mills, chymical laboratories, and other works, the operations of which are aided, conjointly with steam, by the waters of the Lea.

Bow, one of the Society Isles at the south east extremity of the Cluster, in lat. 18. 23. S. and 141. 10. W. long. It was discovered by Captain Cook on his first voyage; but, with 130 fathom of line, no bottom could be found for anchorage. It seemed barren; but from appearance of smoke, it was conjectured either to be inhabited or volcanic.

Bra, a large town of Piedmont, in the province of Alba, situate near the junction of the Stura with the Tanaro River, 10 miles south east of Carmagnola. Pop. about 10,000. Cherasco, with a further population of about 11,000, is situate on the opposite bank of the river.

Braan, a river of Scotland, in Perthshire, which descends from the hills east of Loch Tay, and flows into the Tay above Dunkeld. Upon this river is a grand scene, at a place called the Rumbling-bridge. Under an arch, thrown over a narrow chasm, between two projecting rocks, the river is precipitated in a fall of near 60 feet.

Brabant, a territory in the north west part of Europe, lying between the lat. of 50. 30. and 51. 35. N. and 4. and 5. 10. E. long. formerly belonging to Austria, and afterwards part of the kingdom of the Netherlands. It will be best understood divided into two parts: viz. North or Dutch Brabant, and South or Austrian Brabant. Dutch Brabant lies north of the Scheldt, the north east being bounded by the Maese, its 4 principal towns being Bergen-op-Zoom, Breda, Bois-le-duc, and Endhoven. South, or Austrian Brabant, is bounded on the west by the Dender and Scheldt, south by Namur, and east by Liege. This district was overrun by the French in 1792, who were driven back the following year; but returned in 1794 and effectually subdued the whole of the Austrian Netherlands, which were confirmed to them by the treaty of Campo Formio in 1797, and of Luneville in 1801, when they divided South Brabant into two departments; viz. Deux Nethees, after the name of two rivers which run from N. to S. uniting at Lier, and afterward fall into the Scheldt; and the Dyle, named after another river, running from S. to N. past Louvain and Malines, into the Nethe, before it falls into the Scheldt. The former of these divisions, besides the towns above mentioned, contains the city of Antwerp, and the towns of Turnhout and Herenthals, and numerous villages; and the latter, Brussels, Arschot, Tiersmont, &c. &c. With some partial exceptions, this is a very fertile and important district; it yields, after supplying its inhabitants with abundance of all things necessary for subsistence and comfort, a surplus of flax and of wheat of very superior quality. It was annexed to Holland at the general peace; and Brussels made the seat of government in alternate years with the Hague (see Netherlands.) The inhabitants are Catholics, and speak the French language.

Brassdale, a town and parish of Scotland, on the west coast of the isle of Skye, which in 1821 contained a pop. of 2,103.

Bracciano, a town of Italy, in the patrimony of St. Peter, celebrated for manufactures of paper, the ruins of Veia, and some warm baths in its vicinity. It is situated on a lake of the same name, 12 m. N. W. of Rome.

Bradfield, is also the name of a township, in the parish of Ecclesfield, Eng. 6 miles north of Sheffield, in the manufactures of which it is extensively occupied. Pop. in 1821, 5,298. It is also the name of seven other towns and villages in different parts of England, all inconsiderable.

Bradford, a town in Wiltshire, Eng. It is the centre of the greatest fabric of superfine cloths in England, and is eminent for the nicest mixtures. There are about twenty extensive establishments. It stands on the side of a rocky hill, on the Lower Avon, 10 m. N. by W. of Warminster, and 100 W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 10,231.

Bradford, a large and populous parish and town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, Eng. in which manufacturing industry manifested itself as strongly during the first 20 years of the present century, as in any part of the kingdom. The town, which in 1801 contained a pop. of only 6,393, and in 1811 of 7,767, in 1821, contained 13,084, and the aggregate of the parish 52,954, which in 1811 was only 35,358. In the town there are about forty large dealers in wool, about 30 large establishments for the spinning of ditto, and sixty factories for the weaving of ditto, into various kinds of stuffs. It has five or six extensive iron founddries, as many machine manufactories, and several employers both in the manufacture of hats and combs; and, that there may be no lack of unceasing toil, the cotton manufacture has also established itself in the parish. The town is situate at the foot of the ridge of mountains which divides the West Riding of Yorkshire from Lancashire, on the banks of a small river, falling into the Aire, on the south side. It has also the advantage of a collateral cut to the Leeds and Liverpool canal; and consequently a facility of communication, of water, with all parts of the kingdom. The surrounding country abounds in iron ore, coal, flagstones, and slates. The parish church is a stately Gothic edifice: a new church, built by subscription, was opened in 1815. It has several other religious places of worship, a free grammar school, and a market hall for the exhibition of the worsted stuffs brought for sale; It is 10 m. W. of Leeds, and 9 N. E. of Halifax.

Bradford, derived from two Saxon words implying Broad ford, is the name of six other towns and villages in different parts of England, situate on the banks of streams that formerly used to be forded.

Bradford, a county in the E. District of Pennsylvania, bordering on New York. It is intersected by the east branch of the Susquehanna river, which receives numerous collateral branches flowing from all directions within the county. Pop. 19,669. Towanda, 189 m. N. by E. of Harrisburg, is the chief town.

Brandenburg, electoral marquissate of, an interior and irregularly shaped territory of Europe, in the circle of Upper Saxony, lying between the lat. of 51. 45. and 54. N. and 11. and 16. of E. long. It is separated from the Baltic, on the north, by Mecklenburg and Pomerania; bounded on the east by Prussian Poland, and on the south by the duchy of Saxony and principality of Anhalt, and on the west by Magdeburg. Its area may be estimated at about 12,000 square miles. From the tenth to the fifteenth century this territory passed under various governments subject to Poland, when, in 1417, it was vested in perpetuity, by the emperor Sigismund, with consent of the Germanic confederacy, to Frederic VI. of Nuremberg, and his descendants; a succeeding margrave having been acknowledged sovereign of the then duchy of Prussia which in 1701 was converted into a kingdom. The seat of government was transferred from Königsberg, in Prussia, to Berlin in Brandenburg, which has thereby become the chief part of the Prussian dominions. It is divided into the five following parts: viz. the Old Mark, west; Prignitz, north-west; Middle Mark, south; Ucker Mark, north; and the New Mark, on the east. It is in part a sandy and sterile district; but having the advantage of several navigable rivers, and by the aid of culture, it is rendered tolerably productive in all that is necessary for subsistence and comfort. The bigoted edict of Nantes, which in 1685 drove thousands of the most industrious and intelligent of the manufacturing population of France from their homes, led a number of them to settle in this part of Europe, where they introduced their respective occupations in the manufacture of silk and worsted stuffs, which now contributes essentially to the reciprocal benefit of the various classes of the country. The principal rivers are, 1st, the Oder, which enters the New Mark from the south, runs north, past Frankfort, Kustrin, and Schwedt, through Pomerania, into the Baltic; 2nd, the Netze, enters the New Mark from the east, and falls into the Oder at Kustrin; 3rd, the Spree, enters the Middle Mark from the south, runs west by north, falling into the Havel west of Berlin; 4th, the Havel, rises near the south confines of the Ucker Mark, runs south to Potsdam, when it makes a circuitous course west, to the town of Brandenburg, then north to Havelberg, where it falls into the Elbe; 5th, the Elbe, from the south-east, divides the Old Mark from the Prignitz; the Havel is also united with the Elbe by a canal across the principality of Magdeburg from Brandenburg past Gentin; and with the Oder by another canal from Liebenwalde, past Neustadt, to Oderberg; the Spree is also united with the Oder by a canal from the south-east extremity of the Middle Mark to the point where the Oder enters the New Mark from Lusatia. The population of this part of the Prussian dominions amounts to about 1,250,000, who contribute a money tax equal to about 4,500,000 dollars per annum. The inhabitants are mostly dissenters from the church of Rome, indulging in the peculiar tenets of Luther, who promulgated his doctrines at Wittemberg; and some of Calvin; but the state makes no distinction; religious profession be it what it may, being no obstacle to civil service. The following is a statement of the principal towns in each of the five divisions: viz. Prignitz, Wittemberg, Put litz, Perleberg; Old Mark, Werben, Osterberg, Kalbe; Middle do. Brandenburg, Potsdam, Berlin; Ucker do. Prenzlau, Boytzenburg, Angermünde; New do. Fulkenburgh, Arenswald, Kustrin.

Brandenburg, the city which gives name to the preceding territory, is divided into two parts, old and new: the former on the north bank of the river Havel, and the latter on the south. It is a place of considerable antiquity, supposed to have been first founded by the Sclavonians, and fortified in the early part of the tenth century, as a barrier against the incursions of the Huns. It has various manufactures. Pop. about 13,000. It is about 30 miles S. of Havelsberg, and about the same distance W. of Berlin. There are two other towns named Brandenburg; one in Mecklenburg-Strelitz, surrounded by walls. The streets are wide and straight, the church of St. Mary is a large structure, and the townhouse is worthy of notice. It is situate on the Tollensee, 72 m. N. of Berlin: and the other in East Prussia, with an ancient castle, at the south end of the Frische Haff, 13 m. S. W. of Königsberg.

Brandon, a town in Suffolk, Eng. It stands on the Little Ouse, over which is a bridge, and a ferry a mile below for conveying goods to and from the isle of Ely. It has a great trade in corn, malt, coal, timber, &c. and in the vicinity are extensive rabbit warrens. It is 15 m. N. by W. of Bury, and 78 N. N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,770.

Brava, a republic on the southern extremity of the kingdom of Magadoxa, and the only one in Africa. It was founded by seven Arabian brethren, who fled hither from the tyranny of Lacah, a petty monarch of Arabia. Finding a most delightful situation between two rivers, near their confluence into the Indian Ocean, they built the city of Brava, which is now large and populous, and the greatest mart on all the coast. Its merchants are rich, carrying on an extensive trade in gold, silver, elephants' teeth, ambergris, silk, cotton, and other stuffs. The republic is under the protection of the king of Portugal, for which they pay a tribute of about £20 annually. The city of Brava lies in long. 43. 25. E. lat. 1. 20. N.

Brava, one of the Cape Verd islands, 12 miles

W. S. W. of Fuego, and inhabited by the Portuguese. The land is high and mountainous, but fertile; and horses, bees, asses, and hogs are numerous. It has three harbours, but Porto Ferro on the south side is the best for large ships. Long. 24. 39. W. lat. 14. 52. N.

Braubach, a town of Germany, in the Westerwald, with a castle, seated on the Rhine, 8 m. S. of Coblenz.

Braunau, a fortified town of Bavaria, formerly the residence of the elector. In 1742 it was taken by the Austrians; and, in 1777, by the peace of Teschen the town and its district were ceded to Austria. In 1805 it was captured by the French and Bavarians. It is seated on the east bank of the river Inn, on the frontier of Upper Austria, 28 m. S. W. of Passau, to which country it now belongs.

Braunau, a town on the eastern frontier of the circle of Koningsgratz, bordering on Silesia. It is a manufacturing town, and has a rich Benedictine abbey.

Braunfels, capital of the county of Solms. Here is a magnificent palace, the seat of the prince of Solms-Braunfels; and near it is the decayed castle of Solms. It is seated near the Lahn, 10 m. W. by S. of Wetzlar. Long. 8. 28. E. lat. 50. 30. N.

Braunsburg, a town of west Prussia, in Ermland. It has an academy for catholics, established in 1783; and is seated on the Passarge, near its entrance into the Frische Haff. It exports great quantities of linen yarn to England, 18 m. N. E. of Elbing. Long. 19. 58. E. lat. 54. 30. N.

Braunston, a village in Northamptonshire, Eng. four miles N. W. of Daventry, and 72 from London, on the confines of Warwickshire. Here commences the Grand Junction canal, under a tunnel three-fourths of a mile in length, to the Thames, which, with the Oxford and Coventry canals, render it the central place of inland navigation. Pop. 1,238.

Bray, a town of Ireland, in the county of Wicklow, seated on the river Bray, near St. George's channel, 10 m. S. of Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 2,481.

Bray, a village in Berkshire, Eng. one mile south of Maidenhead. It is famous in song for its vicar, who was twice a papist and twice a protestant, in four successive reigns, and when taxed with being a turncoat, said, he always kept to his principle, 'to live and die vicar of Bray.' Pop. in 1821, 3,159.

Brazil, a vast territory of South America, lying between the lat. of 4. N. and 34. S. and 35. and 72. of W. long. but being triangular in form, converging into a point southerly, its area will not exceed 2,000,000 of square miles, though estimated by some writers as exceeding 3,000,000. The first discovery of Brazil has been claimed for a Martin Behem, who is said to have visited it in 1487, but the credit of making it known to Europeans is assigned to the Portuguese admiral, Pedro Alvarez Cabral, who sailed from Lisbon on the 9th of March, 1500, with a squadron of thirteen sail, destined for the East Indies; when stretching more than usual to the westward to avoid the calms on the coast of Africa, he accidentally discovered this fine territory in the lat. of 16. south, on the 24th of April; and having communicated with the natives, who manifested a social disposition, anchored his squadron in the Bay of Porto Seguro, and on the following day landed and planted the cross, and took possession of the territory in the name of Emanuel, king of Portugal

For nearly fifty years, however, it was but little appreciated; there being no indications of gold, silver, or gems, upon the coast: it was merely used as a place of transportation for criminals, the ships conveying them, carrying back nothing but the red wood so important in dyeing; and its capabilities would probably have remained much longer undisclosed, but for the banishment of the Jews from Portugal in 1549, who, by the assistance of their friends in other parts of the world, introduced the sugar-cane from Maderia, which flourished to such a degree as soon to render it an object of great importance. Although its profuse treasures of gold, silver, and gems, remained undisclosed, enough had been discovered, and the celebrity of the colony became sufficiently general by the close of the century, to excite the jealousy and cupidity alike of the French, Spaniards, and Dutch. In 1724 the Dutch dispatched a squadron under the command of Admiral Willikens, who succeeded in taking possession of St. Salvador, or Bahia, the principal settlement, and proclaimed the conquest of the whole territory. The Spaniards next sent a formidable squadron, who completely dislodged the Dutch; but, in 1630, the Dutch again returned to the country with a force of not less than forty-six armed ships, and after seven or eight years of continued warfare, succeeded in extending their influence over more than half the country; but their oppressive, mean, and grovelling policy became so obnoxious to the settlers as to render their tenure exceedingly precarious. After various collisions and alternations of success between Dutch, Spaniards, and Portuguese, towards the close of the seventeenth century, the Dutch by treaty ceded all their interest to the Portuguese, and the influence of the Spaniards having been previously subverted, at the commencement of the 18th century the whole territory came into the possession of the Portuguese. With them it remained for more than a century, silently advancing in cultivation and importance, though, comparatively speaking, but little known to the world until the events of the twenty years' war growing out of the French revolution in 1793, led, in 1807, to the emigration of the Portuguese court from Lisbon, to Rio Janeiro.

From this period, the barriers which had previously confined the intercourse of Brazil to Portugal, were at once annihilated, and its features, condition, character, and resources, laid fairly open to the view and intercourse of the world. Since then, cultivation has been vastly extended, and its supply of productions doubled, trebled, and in some cases, quadrupled. For purposes of civil and military jurisdiction, it has been divided into the thirteen following districts, viz. 1st, Guiana, comprising the whole extent of country north of the main branch of the Amazon river, bounded on the north by the New Colombian Territory and French Guiana. 2d, Para, which comprises a vast tract extending from the frontier of Peru, the whole breadth of the country parallel with Para, south of the main branch of the Amazon to the Atlantic Ocean, and the following nine border on the Atlantic coast, beginning at the north: viz.

12. Goiás, interior; and 13. Matto Grosso, on the frontier of the United Provinces of Buenos Ayres. The extent and production of each of these districts will be more fully elucidated under their respective heads. Independent of the noble river Amazon, which has one of its sources near the shore of the Pacific Ocean, and by numerous collateral branches opens a communication with the whole interior of Peru, and dividing the before-mentioned provinces of Guiana and Para. The Maderia, Tapajos, Xingu, Araguay, and the Tocantins, all flowing from the south into the Amazon, intersect all the interior and northern part of Brazil; whilst the Paraguay, and Parana, with innumerable branches, intersect all the southern part, running south into the great river La Plata. In addition to these the Pinare, Barbadoes, Paraiaba, St. Francisco, and numerous others of minor note, water all the maritime provinces falling into the Atlantic Ocean.

A chain of mountains intersects the maritime provinces from south to north, from Rio Grande to the St. Francisco River, which separates the province of Bahia from Pernambuco. The ground rises gradually from the coast to the summit of this ridge, which varies in altitude from 3,000 to 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. Westward of this ridge, the ground gradually slopes till it again ascends to form another mountain ridge of somewhat greater altitude than the preceding, dividing Goiás from the maritime provinces, and running east off, and parallel with, the Tocantins to its entrance into the Para mouth of the Amazon. From this chain a collateral ridge branches off, intersecting the province of Seara, in a direction from south to north, to near the shore of the Atlantic Ocean.

Over so vast a tract of land, it cannot be imagined that the climate will be found at all equal, or the seasons uniform. The northern provinces are subject to heavy rains, variable winds, tornadoes, storms, and the utmost fury of the elements; while the southerly regions are favoured with all the comforts which a fine fertile soil and temperate climate can afford. In some of the provinces the heat of the climate favours the generation of a variety of poisonous insects and reptiles; some of which, as the liboya, or roebuck snake, are said to extend to the length of thirty feet, and to be two or three yards in circumference. Lizards, which are found in almost every part of the world, grow here to an enormous size, and are often found 2 or 3 feet in length. The rattle-snake, and other reptiles of the same kind, grow likewise to an incredible size; and the serpent called ibabaloka is affirmed to be seven yards long, and half a yard in circumference, possessed too of a poison instantaneously fatal to the human race. Here also are scorpions, ant-bears, the jaguar, porcupines, janonveras, and tapirs. No part of the world affords a greater number of beautiful birds or greater variety of the most exquisite fruits. The chief indigenous vegetable production which gave name to the country and title of prince to the heir presumptive of the sovereignty of Portugal, is the lignum Brasilianum, or Brazil wood, so justly celebrated for its colouring properties. Forests of trees, as stately in size as endless in variety, intermixed with brambles and creeping plants flowering in every variety and tinge of colour, emitting the most delicious odours, and for hundreds of square miles in extent so dense as to be quite impenetrable, except to the native Indians, are spread over the greater part of the country from the sea-coast to the Araguay river, which separates Goias from Matto Grosso. In the cultivated parts, the palma christi, orange, lemon, citron, and various other trees and plants flourish in the utmost luxuriance; and among the foreign plants, the sugar-cane, coffee tree, and cotton plant, are yielding an increasing supply of their respective products of the very choicest quality; but the productions for which Brazil has hitherto been the most celebrated are its gems, gold, and silver. The gems are as various as beautiful; and, although diamonds have been appreciated from the earliest periods of social refinement, the largest and most valuable ever known was found in Brazil, weighing in its rough state 1680 carats or 14 oz. troy, which, according to the imaginary and conventional rule of valuation, at £2 sterling for the first carat, would be equal in value to 25,062,912 dollars American money. The quantity of gold and silver during a series of years averaged in money, about 22 million dollars per annum. On the gold and silver, the government levied a tax of one fifth of the produce, but restricted the searching for diamonds and cutting of the Brazil wood to its own agents, subjecting the violators of the law to the severest penalties. Rich as Brazil is, in a comparative sense, in gems and metals, they have obviously retarded, rather than advanced, the genuine prosperity of the country, having tended to divert the inhabitants from the more rational and socializing pursuits of agriculture. Since 1806, however, cultivation has been pursued with greater avidity, and its superior advantages once established, it will probably increase in estimation, whilst the infatuating pursuits in search of diamonds and gold will subside. The revolutionary spirit, so widely spread over all Spanish America shortly after the commencement of the present century, extended itself into Brazil. Pernambuco, in 1817, revolted against the government, and the whole country manifesting rather an equivocal disposition towards the ruling family, the court of Rio Janeiro, in 1821, emigrated back to Lisbon, leaving Don Pedro, the eldest son of the king, as viceroy, who no sooner felt himself separated from paternal allegiance, than he began to turn his thoughts to his individual aggrandizement, and strove to cherish, rather than subdue, the revolutionary spirit which had previously been excited; and on the 11th of September, all allegiance to Portugal was formally denounced, and Don Pedro proclaimed emperor of Brazil. This change not proving satisfactory to all parties, and the integrity of Don Pedro appearing equivocal to the neighbouring government of Buenos Ayres, a spirit of political disquietude generally prevails, and the final issue of its mode of government consequently remains problematical. The political cabals, however, have not materially retarded cultivation and commerce, which continue to increase. Of the extent of the population accounts are much at variance. The introduction of slaves from the coast of Africa, since the excitements to agriculture commenced, has been very great, and must have added at least 50,000 annually to the population of the coast, unless the mortality has been proportionably great with the importation. The aggregate population probably amounts to near a million, four-fifths of whom are slaves and people of colour. The Brazilians are indolent, and great numbers of those who are wealthy pass their time upon their estates in the country, where their chief delight is to swing in their hammocks all the afternoon. The chief amusement besides this is hunting, which from the abundance of game in the interior districts may be carried on to a great extent. The natives who inhabit the inland parts, live almost in a state of nature; they are copper-coloured, go naked, cohabit indiscriminately, and have no signs of religion; they are strong, lively, and gay, and subject to few diseases; but of their aggregate number, whether one, two, or more millions, or only a few thousand, even conjecture does not hazard an opinion. See Lisbon, Portugal, Rio Janeiro.

Brazza, an island in the Adriatic, near the coast of Dalmatia, 30 miles long, and 10 broad. The soil is stony, but it produces much excellent wine, and this article, with fire-wood and sheep, form the chief trade. It has a town of the same name, several villages, and an aggregate population of about 15,000. Long. 17. 35. E. lat. 43. 50. N.

Breage, a populous village on the shore of Mount's Bay, Cornwall, Eng. with ten mines in its vicinity, 4 m. W. of Helstone, and 10 E. by S. of Penzance. Pop. in 1821, 3,668.

Brechin, a borough of Scotland, in Forfar, anciently a bishop's see and the county town. The cathedral is partly ruinous, but one of its aisles serves for the parish church. Adjoining to this is a curious antique round tower, which tapers from the bottom, and is very slender in proportion to its height. Here is a manufacture of linen and cotton, and a considerable tannery. It is seated on the South Esk, 8 m. W. of Montrose, and 12 E. N. E. of Forfar. Pop. in 1821, 5,906.

Breckenridge, a county of Kentucky, on the Ohio. Pop. 7,345. Hardensburg is the chief town.

Breckerfeld, a town of Westphalia, in the county of the Mark, about 30 m. N. N. E. of Cologne. Pop. 1,100.

Brecknock, towns in Berks Co. and Lancaster Co. Pa.

Brecon, or Brecknockshire, a border county of South Wales, bounded on the east by the counties of Hereford and Monmouth, north by Radnor, west by Caermarthen and Cardiganshires, and south by Glamorgan. It is a mountainous district, yielding iron, coal, and limestone in great abundance, and some copper and lead, and at Llanelly, on the border of Glamorganshire, the smelting of iron is carried on to some extent. It has some fertile valleys, and is watered by the rivers Wye and Uske and other streams, and has the advantage of a canal for barges of 25 tons burthen from the centre of the county to the Bristol Channel at Newport. It has few or no manufactures; but, in addition to its iron, it produces a surplus of grain, cattle, and butter, and some wool, out of which a considerable rent and other taxes are discharged, and a supply of manufactured, colonial, and foreign productions obtained. The four principal towns are Brecon, Builth, Crickhowel, and Hay.

Brecknock, or Brecon, a borough and chief town of the preceding county. It is an ancient place, as appears by the Roman coins that are often dug up; and its once magnificent castle is now an insignificant ruin. It contains three churches, one of which is collegiate; and in that part of the town, called the Watton is a fine arsenal. To the east of the town is a considerable lake, well stored with fish, whence runs a rivulet into the Wye. It is seated at the confluence of the Hondey with the Uske, which falls into the Bristol Channel and with which it communicates by a canal to Newport, near the mouth of the Uske, 34 m. N. W. of Monmouth, and 171 W. by N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,193.

Breda, a fortified city of Dutch Brabant, surrounded on all sides by water and morasses. The great church is a noble structure, with a lofty spire 362 feet in height. In 1625 the Spaniards, after a memorable siege of 10 months, reduced this city; but, in 1637 the prince of Orange retook it. In 1793 it surrendered to the French, after a siege of only three days, but was retaken soon after. It is seated on the river Merk, 25 m. N. N. E. of Antwerp, and 60 S. of Amsterdam.

Bredon, a considerable village in Leicestershire, Eng. 5 m. N. N. E. of Ashby de la Zouch, seated at the base of a high limestone rock, on the summit of which the church stands, and commands very extensive views. Pop. 1,044.

Bredstedt, a town of Denmark, in the duchy of Sleswick, 21 m. W. N. W. of Sleswick. Pop. about 1,500.

Breeds Hill, an eminence on the north side of Charlestown, in Massachusetts, celebrated for the stand made by the Americans against the British troops, at the commencement of hostilities with the mother country. This action is usually called the battle of Bunker Hill (another hill near it.) See Bunker Hill.

Bregentz, or Bergens, a town of Germany, in Tyrol, with a castle on an eminence; seated at the mouth of a river of its name, on the east end of the Lake of Constance, 6 m. S. E. of Lindau. Pop. about 2,000.

Breglia, a town of the continental part of Sardinia, 19 m. N. E. of Nice.

Brehar, the most mountainous of the Sicily islands, 30 miles W. of the Land's End. Long. 6. 47. W. lat. 50. 2. N.

Bredna, a town of the duchy of Saxony, 8 m. N. E. of Halle.

Breme, a town of Italy, in the Milanese near the confluence of the Sessia with the Po, on the frontiers of Montferrat, 28 m. W. of Pavia.

Bremen, a duchy and maritime district of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, lying between the Weser and the Elbe; the former of which separates it from Oldenburg, and the other from Holstein. The country is fertile and populous, but in winter is subject to inundations. It formerly belonged to the Swedes, but was sold to the elector of Hanover, in 1719. Stade, on the south bank of the Elbe, is the seat of regency. It is about 2,100 square miles in extent, contains a population of about 170,000, and now forms part of the kingdom of Hanover.

Bremen, a free city, and capital of the duchy of the same name. The Weser divides it into the old and new town, both of which are fortified: the former is the largest, and in it stands the cathedral. It has a harbour, nine miles below the town, and carries on a considerable trade, but which was formerly much more extensive. In 1757 it was taken by the French, who were driven out in 1758, by the Hanoverians. It is 22 m. E. of Oldenburg, and 54 S. W. of Hamburg. Pop. about 40,000. Long. 8. 40. E. lat. 53. 5. N.

Bremenord, a town in the duchy of Bremen, defended by a castle. The chancery of the duchy is kept here. It stands near the Oste, 32 m. N. by E. of Bremen.

Bremgarten, a town of Switzerland, in the free lower bailiwicks, between the cantons of Zurich and Bern. The inhabitants deal chiefly in paper; and it is seated on the Reuss, 10 m. W. of Zurich.

Breno, a town of Italy, in Bresciano, seated on the Oglio, 36 m. N. of Brescia. Pop. about 2,000.

Brenta, a river which rises in the principality of Trent, passes by Bassano and Padua, and enters the gulf of Venice, a little S. of Venice.

Brentford, an appendage to London, 7 m. from Hyde Park corner, on the great western road. It is seated on the north bank of the Thames, where the grand junction canal originally communicated with the river; but an extended line having since been cut, skirting the whole of the north side of London, to the vicinity of the docks on the east, and jetting in its course into the very centre of the city, Brentford derives but little comparative advantage from that canal. It has however some very extensive flour mills, distilleries, soap works, pan, tile, and coarse pottery works, extensive nursery grounds, and various other occupations dependent on the metropolis. It is a very old town, as may be inferred from its name being derived from the Saxon, implying a ford over the little river Brent, which here falls into the Thames; and in earlier times it was distinguished as having a market on Tuesday, whilst now, from the continual intercourse with London, it has every day the appearance of holding a great fair. On the opposite bank of the river is a Gothic edifice, built by George III. for an occasional residence; and at the west end of the town is a magnificent edifice, called Sion House, formerly a monastery, now belonging to the dukedom of Northumberland. The election of the two members of parliament for the metropolitan county of Middlesex is held here; and during a contest, the whole line of road from London and Brentford itself, presents a scene of gaiety, animation, and spirit, that must be seen to be understood; for described correctly it cannot be. Being on the confines of two or three parishes, the population has not been specifically returned; but, in 1826, it may be stated at 9,000.

Brentwood, p.t. Rockingham Co. N. H. 20 m. fr. Portsmouth. Pop. 891. Here are manufactories of cotton.

Brentville, p.v. Prince William Co. Va.

Bresciano, a province in the north of Italy, lying between the lat. of 45. 10. and 46. 20. N., and 10. 45. of E. long., bounded on the south by Mantua and the Cremonese, west by Bergamaseo, north by the country of the Grisons, and east by the principality of Trent, the Veronese, and Mantua. The Oglio has its source in the north extremity of this province, runs south for about 30 miles, when it forms the lake of Jeso, and afterwards the boundary between Bergamasco and the Cremonese. The Chiana intersects the east side, falling into the Oglio at the south-east extremity of the province; the Smela and several other streams, intersect the centre and southern part of the province, all falling into the Oglio, and lake Garda divides it from the Veronese on the east. Its superficies may be stated at about 3,000 square miles, and population at 500,000. It has some dreary spots; but on the whole it may be considered a fertile district, producing corn, wine, and oil, in abundance. The vine, olive, and mulberry, all luxuriate in its soil; and the lakes and rivers supply abundance of fish. It exports some silk; but its manufactures do not much, if at all, exceed the demand and consumption of the province. Besides Brescia, the capital of the other principal towns are, Breno, Chiari, Orzi, Novi, and Salò. It was formerly a part of the republic of Venice: but is now under the dominion of Austria.

Brescia, an ecclesiastical city and capital of the preceding province, situate in a spacious and fertile plain, between the rivers Mela and Navilo, on the high road from Bergamo to Mantua. It is well fortified, and has a good citadel, on an eminence. It has twelve churches, and thirty convents. The cathedral and the palace are adorned with beautiful paintings, and in the former is shown the standard of Constantine. Here are several flourishing manufactures, and its fire-arms are particularly celebrated. This city has been taken and retaken several times, by the Austrians and French. Pop. about 50,000. A stream, called the Garza, runs through the city, afterwards falling into the Mela. It is about 50 m. N. of Parma, 40 N. W. of Mantua, and 30 S. E. of Bergamo.

Bresello, a town of Italy, in the Modenese, on the river Po, 27 m. N. W. of Modena.

Breslau, an ecclesiastical city and capital of a principality of the same name and of all Silesia; seated on the banks of the Oder, just below the junction of the little river Ohlau, which runs through several of the streets, and forms two islands. It has one Lutheran and twenty-six Catholic churches, and is surrounded by walls, strengthened by ramparts and other works. It has a great trade in linen, leather, Hungarian wines, &c. and contains 60,000 inhabitants. The public squares are spacious, the streets tolerably wide, and the houses lofty. Here the Jesuits founded a university, in 1702, at which there are generally about four hundred students. The two principal churches belong to the protestants; near one of which is a college. This city became subject to the king of Prussia in 1741. It was taken by the Austrians, in 1757, but regained the same year. It was for some time besieged by the French, and surrendered to them in January, 1807, and again in 1813; but reverted to Prussia after the peace of 1814. It is 112 m. N. E. of Prague, and 165 N. of Vienna. Long. 17. 9. E. lat. 51. 3. N. The principality contains about 950 square miles of area, and 180,000 inhabitants.

Bresse, a river of France, which divides the department of Lower Seine from that of Somme and enters the English channel at Treport.

Brasse, a late province of France, bounded on the north by Burgundy and Franche Comte, east by Savoy, south by the Viennois, and west by the Lyonnais. It now forms the department of Ain.

Bressuire, a town of France, in the department of Deux Sevres, with a college, 35 m. N. W. of Poitiers. Pop. 2,000.

Brest, a maritime town of France, in the department of Finisterre. Prior to 1631, it was an insignificant fishing town; but having one of the most commodious and secure harbours in Europe, it was improved by the French government, under the administration of Richelieu, in the reign of Louis XIV. for a marine station, and it is now the chief naval depot of France; situate on a promontory at the western extremity of the kingdom. It is equally convenient for the equipment of expeditions to all parts of the coast, or of the world. The English made an ineffectual attempt to take it in 1694; and during the twenty-three years' war, from 1793, to 1814, it compelled the English to maintain a large blockading squadron off the harbour, without doing the least possible injury to France. The extensive occupations attendant on the building, repairing, and equipment of a great national marine, necessarily gave rise to an extensive interchange and consumption of commodities of various kinds; and the town of Brest has consequently risen into importance proportionate to the consequence derived from its being the chief naval station of the kingdom. It now contains a population of about 25,000. It has a marine academy, theatre, &c. It is 33 m. E. of Ushant Light, in the lat. of 48. 23. N. and 4. 20. of W. long. being 27 m. S. and 6 deg. 49.; or about 325 geographical miles, W. by S. of Paris.

Bretagne, or Brittany, a late province of France, 150 miles long and 112 broad. It is a promontory, united on the east to Maine, Anjou, and Poitou. The air is temperate, and it has large forests. It now forms the departments of Finisterre, Cotes du Nord, Ille and Villaine, Lower Loire, and Morbihan.

Breteil, a town of France, in the department of Oise, 14 m. N. N. E. of Beauvais, and 18 S. of Amiens. Pop. about 2,200.

Breton Cape. See Cape Breton.

Bretten, a town of Germany, in the late palatinate of the Rhine, on the frontier of Wurtemberg, 20 m. S. of Heidelberg, and about 30 N. by W. of Stuttgart. Pop. 2,500. It was the birth-place of Melancthon, and is now included in the territory of the duchy of Baden, circle of the Pfalz and Enz.

Bretton Woods, t. Coos Co. N. H. at the foot of the White Mountains. Pop. 103.

Brevord, or Brevoort, a strong town of Holland, in the county of Zutphen with a castle, situate in a morass, 24 m. S. E. of Zutphen.

Brewer, p.t. Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 1,078.

Brewood, a town in Staffordshire, Eng. 10 m. S. by W. of Stafford, and 129 N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 2,263.

Brewster, p.t. Barnstable Co. Mass. upon Cape Cod, 16 m. E. Barnstable. Pop. 1,418.

Brinsk, an interior town of Russia, in the province of Orel, situate on the Desna, an eastern branch of the Dnieper, about 250 m. S. W. of Moscow. Pop. about 4,000. It has an annual fair very numerously attended.

Briançon, a town of France, on the frontier of Piedmont, in the department of Upper Alps, with a castle on a craggy rock, and other fortifications. In its neighbourhood, manna is gathered from a sort of pine tree. It has a handsome church, and a noble bridge over the Durance, 20 m. N. of Embrun, and about 70 E. by S. of Turin. Pop. about 3,000.

Brianconnet, a fortress of Savoy, near the town of Moustiers, situate on a rock inaccessible every way, except by the side of a river, where it is ascended by two or three hundred steps. The common passage from Savoy to Italy is by this fortress.

Briare, a town of France, in the department of Loiret, seated on the Loire, and has a canal between that river and the Seine. It is 40 m. E. S. E. of Orleans.

Bricksville, t. Cuyahoga Co. Ohio.

Bridgehampton, p.v. Suffolk Co. N. Y. at the E. end of Long Island.

Bridgend, a town of Wales, in Glamorganshire, with a woollen manufacture; seated on the Ogmore, a river abounding in trout and salmon, 7 miles W. by N. of Cowbridge, and 181 W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,701.

Bridgenorth, a borough in Shropshire, Eng. It has two churches, and a free-school that sends and maintains eighteen scholars at the university of Oxford. It was formerly fortified with walls, and had a castle, now in ruins. Its trade both by land and water is considerable. It is seated on both banks of the Severn, over which is a handsome bridge of six arches. The upper part of the town is 180 feet above the bed of the river, and commands an extensive and delightful prospect. An annual fair, on the 29th of October, is very numerously attended, and the quantities of cattle, sheep, butter, cheese, and bacon, brought for sale, is very great. It had formerly some manufactures of worsted, which have declined, and the population, since 1800, has in consequence remained stationary, being in 1821, 4,345, and two out parishes about 1,100 more. It returns two members to parliament, and is 23 m. S. E. of Shrewsbury, and 139 N. W. of London.

Bridgeport, p.t. Fairfield Co. Conn. on L. I. Sound, 10 m. S. W. Strafford. Pop. 2,803. Also 2 towns, in Harrison Co. Va. and Belmont Co. Ohio.

Bridgeton, p.t. Cumberland Co. Me. Pop. 1,541.

Bridgetown, p.t. Cumberland Co. N. J. and the seat of justice, 40 m. S. E. Philadelphia. It stands on a creek running into the Delaware; it is a port of entry and has some manufactures. There are also 2 villages in Maryland of this name.

Bridgetown, the capital of the island of Barbadoes, situate in the inmost part of Carlisle bay, which is large enough to contain 500 ships, but the bottom is foul, and apt to cut the cables. This city was burnt down in 1688; and suffered also greatly by fires in 1756, 1766, and 1767. Before these fires it contained 1,500 houses; and it has since been rebuilt. The streets are broad, the houses high, the wharves and quays convenient, and the forts strong. The church is as large as some cathedrals. Here also is a free-school, an hospital, and a college; the latter erected by the society for propagating the gospel, pursuant to the will of colonel Codrington, who endowed it with £2,000 a year. The town had scarcely risen from the calamities already mentioned, when it was torn from its foundation by a hurricane in 1780, in which many of the inhabitants perished. It is scarcely yet restored to its former splendour. Long. 59. 43. W. lat. 13. 5. N. See Barbadoes.

Bridgewater, a borough in Somersetshire, Eng. It is seated on the Parret, over which is a handsome bridge. It has a large handsome church with a lofty spire. The summer assizes are held here every other year. In the wars between Charles I. and the parliament, the forces of the latter reduced great part of the town to ashes; and the castle was then so far demolished, that few vestiges of it are now observable. The river is navigable up to the town, for vessels of 200 tons burthen, and for barges as far as Langport, and by the Tone to Taunton; and although a prevalence of westerly winds causes the tide at times to set into the river with great fury, its navigation contributes essentially to the interest of the town; commercial intercourse however is principally confined to the coast. The population which in 1801 was only 3,644, in 1821 was 6,155. and the adjoining parish of North Perthernton, on the south, contained a further population, of 3,091. It returns two members to parliament, and is 31 miles S. S. W. of Bristol, and 138 W. by S. of London. It was the birth place of Admiral Blake, the worthy antagonist of Van Tromp.

Bridgewater, t. Grafton Co. N. H. 70 m. from Portsmouth. Pop. 783.

Bridgewater, p.t. Windsor Co. Vt. 16 m. N. W. Windsor. Pop. 1,311.

Bridgewater, p.t. Plymouth Co. Mass. 22 m. S. Boston. Pop. 1,855. Here are manufactures of cotton, woollen and iron.

Bridgewater, p.t. Oneida Co. N. Y. 83 m. N. W. Albany. Pop. 1,608. There are 3 towns of this name in N. J. and Pa.

Bridgewater, or Lundy's Lane, a spot in Upper Canada on the West side of Niagara river, near the falls, celebrated as the scene of a battle between the Americans and British, on the 25th July, 1814.

Bridlington, commonly called Burlington, a seaport in East Yorkshire, Eng. The harbour is commodious and defended by two strong piers. Its mineral waters, and accommodations for sea-bathing, draw much company in summer; and its trade is considerable, owning about 6,000 tons of shipping. It is seated on a creek south of Flam-borough-head, 40 m. E. N. E. of York, and 206 N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,275, being 1,145 more than in 1801.

Bridport, a borough in Dorsetshire, Eng. It is seated about 3 miles from the shore of the British channel, between the rivers Brit and Bride, which unite just below the town, and form a convenient harbour, which, since 1822, has been improved so as to admit vessels of 200 to 300 tons burthen. It was formerly celebrated for its manufactures of cordage, sail-cloth, twine, and netting; and Henry VIII. granted it a monopoly for making all the cordage for the national marine, which it retained for about sixty years; but its manufactures are now inconsiderable. It builds and owns some shipping, and carries on a little external, as well as coasting trade. It returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 3,742. It is 12 m. W. of Dorchester, and 135 W. by S. of London.

Brieg, a fortified town of Silesia, capital of a principality of the same name, with a Lutheran cathedral, and several other churches for protestants and catholics. Here is a manufacture of cloth. It was taken by the Prussians in 1741, and its ancient castle burned down during the siege. It is seated on the Oder, 25 m. S. E. of Breslau. Pop. about 9,000.

Brieg, or Brig, a handsome town of the Valais, seated on the Salina river, which falls into the Rhone on the south side, about 28 miles east of Sion. It suffered much from an earthquake in 1755.

Briel, or Brill, a fortified seaport of South Holland, capital of the island of Voorn. The Dutch took it from the Spaniards in 1572, which was the foundation of the republic. It was the birth place of Van Tromp, and is seated at the mouth of the Maese, 20 m. W. S. W. of Rotterdam. Long. 4. 1. E. lat. 51. 48. N. Pop. about 3,000.

Brienne, a small town of France, in the department of Aube, distinguished for its military school, at which Napoleon received his education. It is about 20 m. E. of Troyes.

Brienz, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Bern, famous for the cheese made in its neighbourhood. It is situate on a lake of the same name (nine miles long and three broad) 42 m. S. E. of Bern.

Briesen, a small town of Brandenburg, in the middle mark, on the frontier of Anhalt, about 25 m. S. of Potsdam.

Brianz, St. a town of France, capital of the department of Cotes du Nord, and a bishop's see, with a small harbour. It is seated among hills, near the English channel, 30 m. S. W. of St. Malo. Pop. about 6,000.

Brigala, a town in the Col de Tende, on the frontier of Nice, a few miles S. of the town of Tende.

Brighthelmstone, commonly called Brighton, a town of England, in the County of Sussex, situate on a very abrupt and uninteresting part of the coast of the British channel, at the foot of a range of naked hills, without a tree, either for shelter, or to diversify the scene. Having no accommodation for shipping beyond a fishing boat, and the coast here forming a sort of bay with shoal water, vessels passing up and down the channel keep too far out at sea ever to be visible from the shore; so that the view by sea and by land is equally monotonous, yet without any one natural feature or convenience to recommend it, from an insignificant fishing town. Brighton has become (chiefly in consequence of the patronage of the late king) one of the principal resorts of gaiety and fashion in the kingdom.

In 1784 the prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., erected at Brighton, for an occasional residence, an edifice called a marine pavilion. This he afterwards converted into a splendid palace, where he spent a great portion of every year, till the cares of royalty and the infirmities of age rendered its distance inconvenient. Up to this period the buildings were comparatively mean; but the improvements within the last twelve years have been very considerable. A new and perfectly unique village, denominated Kemp Town, forms the eastern boundary of Brighton; while Brighton Terrace, a magnificent range of houses on the west, stretches into the parish of Hove. A commodious market is erected in the Bartholomews, on the former site of the workhouse; and it is in contemplation to build a town-hall near the same spot. The new workhouse, near the summit of the Church Hill, is a building of considerable extent, well adapted to secure the health and comfort of its inmates. The parish church, situate on an eminence at the north-west, was formerly at a small distance from the town, which has now almost entrenched upon its sacred ensure. The other places of worship connected with the establishment, are the Chapel Royal, St James's Chapel, and Trinity Chapel, and four others situate in the eastern and western divisions of the town, besides the church of St. Peter's, recently erected, which is by far the most beautiful ornament that Brighton has to boast. Here are also a Roman Catholic chapel, a Jews' synagogue, and several meeting houses for the different denominations of dissenters, most of whom have their schools and distinct benevolent and religious institutions. Besides the accommodations for sea-bathing, warm, cold, and vapour baths, of the most elegant and commodious construction, have also been erected; while the park furnishes a beautiful ride, and the spa all the varieties of artificial, mineral, and medicinal waters. Here are also two assembly rooms, a handsome theatre (opened in 1807,) a celebrated race ground, &c. After the battle of Worcester, in 1651, Charles II. embarked at this place for France, in a vessel which is said to have been moored after the restoration in the Thames, opposite Whitechapel. Brighton is subject to the county magistrates. It is 17 miles W. by N. of Beachy Head, 50 E. by N. of Portsmouth, and 52 S. from London.

Brighton, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. 5 m. W. Boston. Pop. 972. This town is celebrated for its Annual Cattle Show and Fair which has been held here ever since the revolution. Vast numbers of cattle for the Boston market are brought here from all parts of the country.

Brighton, p.t. Monroe Co. N. Y. 235 m. W. Albany. Pop. 6,519. Also a town in Beaver Co. Pa.

Brightside, Bierlow, the west quarter of the parish of Sheffield (which see,) containing in 1821 a population of 6,615.

Brignais, a town of France, in the department of Rhone. During the summer season it is the favourite resort of the citizens of Lyons, who have here many elegant villas and country houses. It is seated on the small river Garron, 9 miles S. of Lyons.

Brimfield, p.t. Hampden Co. Mass. 75 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 1,599.

Brindisi, (the ancient Brundisium), a maritime and archiepiscopal city of Naples, in the province of Otranto, situate just within the entrance to the Adriatic, in the lat. of 40. 39. N. and 18. 20. of E. long. Its harbour at one period was the most commodious and secure in the Mediterranean; but during the commercial career of Venice, it became neglected and inaccessible, except for small vessels. Within the present century, efforts have been made to render it again convenient and useful; but so long as the subduing and precluding line of policy of the present government of Naples prevails, all efforts at social improvement will be made in vain. The adjacent country, like the harbour, presents an aspect of desolation. It is surrounded by extensive forests of olive trees, and some mulberries, from which silk is gathered. Present pop. of the city about 6,000. It is about 190 m. S. E. of Naples. Virgil died at Brindisi, B. C. 19.

Briens. See Bruen.

Brioude, a town of France, in the department of Upper Loire. Near it is a small town called Church Brioude, on account of a famous chapter. Brioude stands on the Allier, over which is a bridge of one arch, 173 feet in diameter. It is 32 miles N. W. of Puy, and 34 S. by E. of Clermont. Pop. about 5,000. It was the birthplace of La Fayette, distinguished for his enthusiasm in the cause of the Americans to obtain their independence.

Brisach, Old and New. Old Brisach is on the east bank of the Rhine, and was formerly the chief town of the Brisgau; but the fortifications were demolished in 1741, and the ordnance removed to Friburg, about 15 miles in the interior. New Brisach is a fortified town on the opposite bank of the river, in the French department of the Upper Rhine, about 40 m. S. of Strasburg, and 250 E. by S. of Paris. The fortification is one of those constructed under the superintendence of Vauban, in the reign of Louis XIV.

Brisago, a town of Switzerland, on the lake Maggiore, 5 m. S. of Locarno.

Brisgau, a territory in the circle of Suabia, of about 1,000 square miles in extent, intersected by the line of the 48th degree of N. lat. and 8th of E. long. extending eastward from the Rhine into the Black Forest. As a frontier district bordering on France, it has been exposed to ravage in all the wars between that nation and Austria, and has been the scene of several bloody contests. At an early period of the French revolution, in 1793, the French reduced nearly the whole of the town of Old Brisach to ashes; and, in 1796, after a severe action possessing themselves of Friburg, the capital, but which they were obliged to abandon the same year. After various changes of sovereignty, it was wholly ceded by Bonaparte to the grand duke of Baden, in 1805, confirmed by treaty with Austria, and in the new subdivisions of the territory of the states of Baden, in 1810, the Brisgau was divided between the three circles of Wiesen, Treisam, and Kinzig, the names of three rivers by which the territory of Baden is intersected.

Bristina, a town of Naples in Capitanata, 11 m. S. S. W. of Manfredonia.

Brissac, a town of France in the department of Maine-et-Loire: seated on the Aubence, 13 m. S. of Angers.

Bristol, an ancient maritime, and ecclesiastical city and county of England, situate at the south-west extremity of the county of Gloucester, at the confluence of the little river Frome with the Lower Avon, which divides it from Somersetshire on the south, about ten miles above the confluence of the Avon with the Severn into the arm of the sea called the Bristol Channel. Bristol was known at a very early period; and about the year 430 it is mentioned as one of the fortified cities of Britian. It was known to the ancient Britons by the name of Caer Oder nam Baden, or the city of Ostorius, in the valley of Bath, and by way of eminence it was sometimes called Caer Lute, the British city, and by the Saxons, Bightstowes, pleasant place. It is adverted to both by Gildas and Nennius, in the fifth and seventh centuries, and from the period of Henry II. in the twelfth, to the middle of the eighteenth century, it ranked, next to London, as the most populous, commercial and important place in the kingdom. Since the latter period, although it has not declined, it has been greatly exceeded in population, commerce, and importance by Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham. The population of Bristol including the suburb of Bedminster, on the Somersetshire side of the river, and Clifton on the north (which see) in 1810 was 65,924, and in 1821, 95,758 of which number 42,169 were in the out-parishes, and 52,819 within the city; of the increase, the greatest proportion was in the suburb of Bedminster, which was as 7,979 to 2,279. As into all the rivers falling into the Bristol channel, the tides rise to a great height, and occasionally rush in with considerable fury. The spring tides at Bristol rising to the height of 42 feet, ebbs and neaps were consequently attended with great inconveniences and detentions. This circumstance, since the completion of the canal navigation of the inland counties communicating with Liverpool and London, neither of which parts are materially affected by the inequality of the tides, tended to divert a considerable portion of the West India trade, and refining of sugar, from Bristol. It however, retains a certain portion: the importation of sugar, on an average, of the six years 1819—1824, was about 27,000 hogshheads per ann. It also imports a considerable quantity of wool, fruit, and wine, direct from Spain, Portugal and France; and maintains a partial intercourse direct with all other parts of the world, except the East Indies, to which, up to 1826, it had not sent more than one or two ships. From 1809 to 1822, about £800,000 had been expended towards the improvement of the harbour. In the latter year another act was granted for its further improvement; and in 1835 numerous arbitrary and oppressive town dues were abolished, or duly regulated; all of which are as well calculated to revive and maintain its commercial prosperity, as to add to the comfort, interest, and character, of the city at large. It has some extensive works in copper and brass, and manufactures of glass bottles, lead, painters' colours, &c. &c. The value of its exports, however, are inconsiderable, its West India produce being imported to defray the interest on mortgages, or as the proceeds of property acquired by means of the traffic in slaves, and the produce of their labour, since the traffic was abolished. Its imports from all other parts are principally equalized through London. In addition to the advantages derived from its commerce it is indebted to a hot well for a considerable portion of the increase of its population, the water being considered very efficacious in the cure of diabetes, phthisical, scorbutic, and inflammatory disorders, it renders it the resort alike of valetudinarians and of fashion. Besides the cathedral and the church of St. Mary Radcliffe, it has sixteen other churches, and five episcopal chapels, some of them beautiful and most of them fine edifices. There are several dissenting meeting-houses, thirteen fellowship companies, some of whom have elegant halls, several hospitals, and other public buildings; and being surrounded by a very fertile as well as picturesque country, its markets are abundantly supplied with every kind of fish, flesh, fowl, vegetables, and fruits; and two annual fairs in March and September are very numerous attended. It has a distinct jurisdiction, and returns two members to parliament, the voters amounting to about 8,000. In November 1831 this city was the scene of a terrible riot occasioned by the rejection of the Reform Bill by the House of Lords. The populace were in complete insurrection for two or three days; many buildings were set on fire and destroyed, and several people killed. It is 13 m. W. N. W. of Bath, 34 S. S. W. of Gloucester, and 114 W. of London. Long. 2. 36. W. lat. 51. 27. N.

Bristol, a maritime county of the state of Massachusetts, bounded on the south by Buzzard's Bay, and west by the state of Rhode Island. Pop. 49,474. Taunton, the chief town, situate near the head of a river of the same name, nearly in the centre of the county, is 33 m. south of Boston. New Bedford, on Buzzard's Bay, is the other principal town.

Bristol, a small maritime county of the state of Rhode Island, bounded on the west by the upper part of the preceding county, and on the east by Narraganset Bay. Pop. 5,466. The chief town of the same name, situate near the south end of the county, was distinguished for the part which it took in the slave trade previous to its abolition by the American government. It owns about 7,000 tons of shipping.

Brookfield, p.t. Worcester Co. Mass. 64 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 2,342. This town was settled at an early period, and during Philip's war in 1675, was attacked by the Indians. The inhabitants collected in one house which was immediately besieged by the savages who set fire instantly to every other building in the town. For two days and nights the Indians poured in shot upon the people in the house incessantly but were met by a most determined defence on the part of the besieged. They then attempted to fire the house by flaming torches at the ends of long poles; but the garrison continued to defend themselves by firing from the windows and throwing water upon the flames, as they fortunately had a pump within the house. These attempts failing, the Indians then prepared a cart loaded with flax, hemp and other combustible matters, and under cover of a barricade of boards thrust the burning mass by the means of long timbers against the house. In this movement one of the wheels came off which turned the machine aside and exposed the Indians to the fire of the garrison; a shower of rain coming on at the same time extinguished the flames. Shortly afterwards a reinforcement of forty men arrived from Boston, forced their way through the enemy and joined the garrison. The Indians then abandoned the siege and retired, having suffered a heavy loss.

Brookhaven, a township of New York, in Suffolk county, Long Island, 60 m. E. of New York. Pop. 6,095.

Brookline, t. Hillsborough Co. N. H. 43 m. from Boston. Pop. 627.

Brookline, p.t. Norfolk Co. Mass. adjoining Boston, from which it is separated by a wide bay, and with which it communicates by the great western avenue or causeway. The face of the country is bold and picturesque, and the hills exhibit the most charming view from Boston Common. Pop. 1,041.

Brooklyn, p.t. Windham Co. Conn. 45 m. E. Hartford. Pop. 1,451.

Brooklyn, a large town on Long Island, separated from the city of New York by the narrow channel called East River. It is properly a suburb of that city and is a place of great business. It is regularly built, and contains many fine houses, the residence of merchants from the city. The United States Navy Yard is in the east part of the town upon a bay called the Wallabout. Brosley, a town of Shropshire, Eng. it is situated near the Severn, on the west side, in a very interesting and important district, abounding in coal, iron, and lime. The celebrated iron-works of Colebrooke Dale are in the parish, and immediate vicinity of the town, on the banks of the river, over which there is an iron bridge of one arch, leading to Madely, on the opposite side, which may be considered an appendage to the district. It has also an extensive porcelain manufactory, and another of tobacco pipes. The coal of this district contains much bitumen, and in 1711 naphtha was discovered issuing from a spring of water, but which has totally disappeared since 1755. Brosley is 6 m. N. N. W. of Bridgenorth, and 146 N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,815, which owing to the more extensive iron-works in Glamorganshire having superseded a portion of the demand from this district, is rather less than in 1800. Madely and the surrounding district contain a further population of 6,000 to 8,000.

Brotherton, a village in West Yorkshire, Eng. one mile north of Ferrybridge, where Thomas de Brotherton, son of Edward I. was born. It has a trade in lime. Pop. 1,726.

Bruck, or Pruck, a town of Bavaria, on the river Ammer, 12 m. W. of Munich. Another in the Palatinate, 22 m. N. N. E. of Ratisbon.

Bruck, or Pruck, a town of Germany in Stiria, capital of a circle of its name. It stands on the river Muehr, 24 m. N. N. W. of Gratz, and 82 S. W. of Vienna.

Bruc, a river in Somersetshire, Eng. which rises in Selwood forest, on the borders of Wiltshire, and flows through the county, by Bruton and Glastonbury, into Bridgewater bay.

Brug, or Brig, a town of Switzerland, in the Valais, seated on the Rhone, 39 m. E. of Sion.

Bruges, a city of the Netherlands, in Flanders. It was once a great trading town; but, in the 16th century, the civil wars drove the trade first to Antwerp, and then to Amsterdam. The inhabitants are estimated at 20,000, but it is not populous in proportion to its extent. Its situation still commands some trade, for its has canals to Ghent, Ostend, Slays, Nieuport, Furnes, Ypres, and Dunkirk. Bruges has been often taken. It is 14 m. E. of Ostend.

Brugge, or Bruggen, a town of Lower Saxony, in the principality of Hildesheim, on the river Leyne, 12 m. S. W. of Hildesheim.

Bruggen, a town of Germany, the duchy of Juliers; seated on the Schwalm, 6 m. N. E. of Ruremonde.

Brugendo, a town of the territory of Genoa, at the foot of the Apennines, 35 m. E. S. E. of Genoa.

Bruguiera La, a town of France, in the department of Tarn, 5 m. S. of Cashes. Pop. about 4,000.

Brühl, a town of the Lower Rhine, in the electorate of Cologne, about 7 m. S. of the city of Cologne. Pop. about 2,000.

Brumau, a town of Moravia, in the circle of Hradisch, at the foot of the Carpathian Mountains, on the frontiers of Hungary, 26 m. E. Hradisch.

Brummen, a populous village of Holland, in Guelderland, on the road from Arnheim, to Zutphen.

Brump, or Brumeth, a frontier town of France, in the department of the Lower Rhine, 10 m. N. of Strasburg.

Brune, or Prunecken, a town of the Tyrol, situate in a fork of two branches of the river Rientz; it has medicinal baths in its vicinity, and is about 15 m. E. by N. of Brixen.

Brunn, or Brinn, a town of Moravia, capital of a circle of the same name, and a bishop's see. It is defended by a strong fortress, called Spilberg, built on an eminence; and has manufactures of cloth, velvet, and plush. The Prussians besieged it in 1742, but were obliged to raise the siege. It is seated at the confluence of the Zwittau and Schwartz, 33 m. S. W. of Olmutz. Long. 16. 38. E. lat. 49. 13. N.

Brunnen, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Schweiz. Here the cantons of Uri, Schweiz, and Unterwalden, formed the alliance which was the foundation of the republic of Switzerland. It is seated on the Waldstädter See, 2 m. S. W. of Schweiz.

Brunsbüttel, a town of Germany, in Holstein, near the mouth of the Elbe, 13 m. N. W. of Glückstadt.

Brunswick, Duchy of, a territory of Germany, in the south part of the circle of Lower Saxony. This territory formed the patrimony of the family of Guelph, Welf, or Whelps, who trace their descent from the marquis of Este, who died about the middle of the 10th century. In 1546, it was divided by Ernest, the then duke, between his two sons; one founding the dukedom of Brunswick Luneburg, and the other of Brunswick Wolfenbüttel; the former will be described under the head of Luneburg and Hanover, and the other under that of Wolfenbüttel.

Brunswick, the chief town of the states of Brunswick Wolfenbüttel, is situate in the principality of Wolfenbüttel, on the banks of the river Ocker, which falls into the Aller. It is strongly fortified, and contains ten Lutheran churches, a cathedral, dedicated to St. Blasius, one Calvinist, and one Catholic church, a college, two academies, a mint, opera house, town hall, &c. The ducal palace was formerly a monastery. There is a large building appropriated as a public storehouse for wine. It has several manufactories, and claims the invention of the spinning wheel; and is distinguished for its breweries of mum, made principally from wheaten malt, with a portion of oat and bean malt, tops of fir and birch, and various herbs; and, with the exception of Leipzig and Frankfort, the fairs of Brunswick are more numerous attended than in any other town in Germany. It formerly ranked as a free independent city; and for the continuance of its freedom it long and strenuously contended; but towards the close of the 17th century, yielded all its pretensions, and became the ducal residence in 1764. It is 47 m. W. by N. of Magdeburg, 35 E. by S. of Hanover, and about 110 S. by E. of Hamburg, in the lat. of 52. 16. N. and 10. 30. of E. long. Pop. about 35,000.

Brunswick, New, a province of British America, extending from the bay of Fundy south, in the lat. of 45., to the frontier of Lower Canada, in the lat. of 48. N., bounded on the west, partly by the Schoodic River, and partly by a conventional line running from the head of tide water in the above river, which divides it from the American State of Maine, in the long. of 67. 45. W., to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, in the long. of 64. It is joined to Nova Scotia, at the south-east corner, by an isthmus, about 15 miles in breadth, and contains an area of about 8,500 square miles, and an aggregate population of about 60,000. It is intersected from the north by the river St. John, which falls over a rapid into the bay of Fundy; the rapid impedes the navigation for vessels of 100 tons burthen for a hundred miles, and vast quantities of masts and logs of timber are floated down for shipment in the bay, which is spacious and secure. St. John's, the chief town of the province, it situate on the east shore of the bay, immediately contiguous to the river of the same name. It has several rivers running from W. to E. into the gulf of St. Lawrence, on which side of the province are several spacious bays, such as Chaleur, Mirimichi, Richibucto, &c., from whence vast quantities of timber are shipped to Great Britain annually. A few tribes of native Indians are scattered over the province. It possesses in general a capable soil, but cultivation has made but little progress; the inhabitants depending more on the forests and the fishery, in obtaining a supply of manufactures and other foreign productions, than on agriculture. Besides St. John's, the other chief towns are, St. Andrews, on the east bank of the Schoodic, and St. Ann's, or, as it is now called, Fredericton, which is the seat of the provincial government, about 80 m. up the river St. John.

Brunswick, p.t. Cumberland Co. Me. Pop. 3,747. It is situated on the south side of Androscoggin river, 26 m. N. E. of Portland. The river has many falls at this place on which are situated a number of mills as well as cotton and woolen manufactories. But what chiefly distinguishes the town is Bowdoin College, which was established here in 1806. It has a President and 6 professors. Its library contains 12,000 vols. and it has a philosophical and chemical apparatus and a cabinet of minerals. The college is supported partly by the income of property bequeathed by James Bowdoin, Governor of Massachusetts, from whom it derives its name. The number of students is 137. There are 3 vacations, in May, September and December, of 13 weeks. Commencement is in September.

Brunswick, p.t. Rensselaer Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,570. Also the name of 3 towns in Vt., Pa., and Ohio.

Brunswick, a south frontier county of the E District of Virginia, bordering on Northampton county, North Carolina. The south-west corner jets upon the Roanoke river. Pop. 15,770. Lawrenceville is the chief town.

Brunswick, a maritime and frontier county at the south extremity of North Carolina. It is bounded on the north and east by Cape Fear River. It is a swampy and desolate district. Pop. 6,523. Smithville, near the mouth of Cape Fear River, 255 m. S. by E. of Raleigh, is the chief town. It has also a town of the same name about 30 miles up the river.

Brunswick, a seaport of the state of Geo., chief town of Glynn county, with a safe harbour, capable of containing a numerous fleet of men of war. It is seated in a fertile country, at the mouth of Turtle River, in St. Simon Sound, 60 m. S. S. W. of Savannah, and 10 S. of Darien. Long. 81. O. W. lat. 31. 10. N.

Bruny's Isle, an island off the S. E. point of Van Dieman's Land, about 30 m. in length, indented by Adventure Bay.

Bruree, a parish in the county of Limerick, Ireland. Pop. in 1821, 4,038. A small village of the same name, within the parish, 16 m. S. of Limerick, was formerly celebrated as the half yearly rendezvous of the Irish bards; but avarice and oppression have long since subdued all social intercourse among the native Irish; and the minstrel has not sounded at Bruree since 1746.

Brussels, or Bruzelles, one of the chief cities of Belgium, in South Brabant, and formerly the capital of the Kingdom of the Netherlands. It stands on a gentle eminence on the banks of the Senne, a small stream flowing into the Scheldt. Its existence can be traced to a very remote period, and the simplicity of its origin forms a striking contrast with its subsequent splendour. Early in the seventh century, St. Gery, bishop of Cambray, erected a small chapel in one of the islands formed by the Senne, and there preached the gospel to the surrounding peasantry. The beauty of the situation, and the piety and eloquence of the preacher, attracted many to the spot; their united numbers soon formed a large village, which increased so, that in the year 990 it could boast of a market and a castle. In process of time it became the favourite residence of the dukes of Brabant, and of the Austrian governors who succeeded them, and even acquired the title of "the ornament of the Netherlands." In the year 1555, it was chosen by the emperor Charles V. as the place in which he made a formal resignation of his dominions to his son, afterwards Philip II.: the chair in which he sat, on that memorable occasion, is still religiously preserved. During the wars that raged in Europe in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and of which the Netherlands were the principal theatre, Brussels underwent its share of suffering; being occupied, in turn, by each of the contending powers. In 1695 it was bombarded by marshal Villeroy; when fourteen churches, and upwards of 4,000 houses, were destroyed. After the celebrated battle of Ramillies, its keys were surrendered to the duke of Marlborough. It was taken by the French under marshal Saxe in 1746, but restored to its former master at the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. During the revolutionary war it again fell into the hands of the French, to whom it remained subject till the general peace of Europe in 1814. While under their government, it was made the seat of a court of criminal and special justice, a chamber and tribunal of commerce, and a court of appeal for five departments.

During the revolution of 1830, it was the scene of the most bloody battles between the inhabitants and the Dutch troops. The 24th, 25th and 26th of October were days of perpetual and terrible carnage in the streets of the city. The Dutch were driven out of Brussels on the 27th with the loss of 3,000 men.

Brussels has always been eminent as a manufacturing town; the fabric of lace, which is in high estimation every where, gives employment to upwards of 10,000 individuals. Its camlets, and still more its carpets, are much admired, and command high prices. It is also celebrated for the manufacture of carriages, which are considered to be superior to those of London and Paris in cheapness and elegance. Neither, although in an island position, is it without a considerable share of commerce, not only with the surrounding parts, but with foreign countries. It owes this great advantage to its numerous canals, by which it communicates with the Scheldt. The principal of these is that leading to Antwerp, constructed about the year 1560, at an expense of £170,000 sterling. It is 110 feet above the level of the sea.

The present flourishing condition of the city is also owing to the great influx of foreigners, particularly French and English. To the latter it has become peculiarly attractive of late years, from its contiguity to the plain of Waterloo; but, before that period, the salubrity and mildness of its temperature, the cheapness of its economical arrangements, and the tone of its society, had made it a favourite place of abode with numbers of this nation. So early as the time of Cromwell, it was marked in the annals of England, as being the chosen residence of Charles II., and of his brother, afterwards James II., during the greater part of the period of their exclusion from their native country. The interior of the town, of itself, offers much to attract and to retain strangers. Its environs are also beautiful by nature, and are rendered still more so by the elegant additions of art guided by refined taste.

The city was formerly surrounded by a wall and ditch, neither of which now exist: what were the ramparts, are, at present, beautiful walks bordered with trees; those to the north and east are called boulevards. The lower part of the city, adjacent to the river, is irregular, and, from its situation, somewhat unhealthy; but in the new part, which occupies the more elevated portions, the streets are spacious and airy, the houses well built and lofty. Considerable attention is paid to architectural ornament; and the custom of painting the outside with some lively colour presents an agreeable variety to the eye.

The appearance of the city is much enlivened by the elegance of its squares; the principal are the Place Royale, the Great Market, the Place St. Michael, the Corn Market, and the Grand Sablon. Of these, the great market-place is indisputably the finest: it is an oblong of large dimensions; each side is of a different style of architecture, yet all combine to form a whole highly pleasing to the view. The town hall, and several of those of the different trading companies, form three of the sides, and one uniform edifice on the remaining side completes the parallelogram. St. Michael's square, also, deservedly attracts much attention: it is, like the former, an extended oblong; but it differs from it in having the buildings of uniform architecture, ornamented with pillars of the Doric order. The centre has been planted and laid out as a pleasure ground. The fish market, which has been but a few years erected, is one of the neatest in Europe. There is also a market for frogs, which are brought alive in pails and cans, and prepared for dressing on the spot. The hind limbs, which are the only parts used, are cut from the body with scissors by the women who bring the animals for sale.

The favourite place of recreation for the inhabitants is the Park. It is a large pleasure ground, adjoining the palace, laid out with great taste, planted with a variety of fine trees and flowering shrubs, and diversified with lawns ornamented with fountains and statues. Some of these latter are of the purest style of sculpture. In the centre is a fine basin, stocked with gold and silver fish. On each side of the principal walk is a valley planted so as to exclude all annoyance from the overpowering rays of the sun. A fountain, in one of these, is marked with an inscription, stating that Peter the Great, during his residence here, sat down by its margin to drink a bottle of wine: another version of the story says, that he fell into it, while strolling through the park after dinner. Both may be true.

One of the approaches to the town also forms a favourite promenade. It is called the Allee Verte, and is planted with a triple row of trees along the canal; the prospect of which, with the numerous villas around, and the varying scenes of pleasure and employment that every moment present themselves, render it singularly beautiful.

A copious supply of water is secured to the inhabitants by a number of fountains, whose elegance of structure adds much to the beauty of the city. One of the finest was erected by Lord Aylesbury, an English nobleman, as a public expression of his gratitude for an agreeable residence of forty years in the town. The water for the supply of these fountains is raised, by machinery, from a lake about half a mile from the city.

The palace of the States-general is a magnificent building, supported on pillars of the Ionic order. Its entrance leads to a spacious hall, on each side of which is a marble staircase; one conducting to the chamber of peers, the other to the chamber of deputies. This latter is in the form of a semicircle, with a very capacious gallery for the people. The town-hall is a noble specimen of the old irregular but highly ornamented Gothic style. So irregular is the building, that its tower stands at a considerable distance from the centre. The elevation of this part of the edifice is 364 feet: it is surmounted with a statue of St. Michael with the dragon under his feet, in copper gilt, seventeen feet high, which it turns on a pivot, and serves as a vane for showing the direction of the wind.

The Orange Palace, generally called La Vieille Cour, was formerly the residence of the governors of Belgium; but is now occupied as a museum, a public library, a cabinet of natural history, and singing and dancing schools. It is also furnished with a valuable, though not large, collection of Flemish paintings. The library, which contains upwards of 100,000 volumes, was chiefly collected from suppressed convents. Adjoining the building is a fine botanic garden, containing more than 4,000 exotics. The philosophical college, which has been but a few years in existence, is founded on a liberal scale. The great hall, or amphitheatre, is capable of accommodating 1,200 persons. Each student has a room furnished at the expense of government; all the courses of lectures are gratuitous; and stipends are allowed to a number of pupils whose means are not adequate to defray the moderate expenses of their board.

The principal church is that of St. Gudule, erected on an eminence, and adorned with two square towers which command a very extensive prospect. It contains no less than sixteen chapels, which are enriched with numerous paintings. The windows are adorned with curious painted glass; and the pulpit exhibits a beautiful specimen of sculpture in wood, both as to design and execution. The monument of John II. duke of Brabant is in the choir: it is of black marble, with a lion of copper, weighing 6,000 pounds couching on it. The archduke Ernest has also a mausoleum here. This church is celebrated in legendary history for three miraculous hosts, which were stolen by Jews, but were afterwards restored. The event is commemorated by an annual procession, during which time the church is decorated with six exquisite pieces of tapestry explanatory of the event.

The cemeteries are detached from the churches, being situate outside the boulevards. David, the celebrated French painter, is buried in that without the gate of Louvain. Among the hospitals, is one for foundlings, one for penitent women of the town, and a third in which strangers are maintained gratuitously for three days.

In the village of Lacken, about half a league to the north of Brussels, is the splendid palace of Schoenburg, or Schoonenburg, originally intended for the reception of the governor of the Netherlands. During the reign of Napoleon, it was occasionally his residence, as also that of his brother, the late king of Holland. The interior of the palace is laid out in a style of superior magnificence. A subterranean grotto, and some temples connected with it, are also much admired.

The inhabitants of Brussels are Catholics, and speak the French language, but all religious tenets are tolerated. The population has increased considerably since 1814; and, in the absence of correct data, may be estimated at 80,000 to 90,000. It is 25 miles S. of Antwerp, about the same distance E. by S. of Ghent, and 148 N. by E. of Paris. Lat. 50. 51. N. long. 4. 22. E.

Bruton, a town in Somersetshire, Eng. Here are manufactures of silk and hosiery; a free-school, founded by Edward VI.; and a stately alma-house, consisting of the ruins of a priory, with an income of nearly £3,000 per annum. It is seated on the river Brue, 12 m. S. E. of Wells and 100 W. of London. Pop in 1821, 1,658.

Brutus, a township of Cayuga county, New York, lying between the south shore of Lake Ontario, and the Erie Canal, 161 m. W. by N. of Albany. Pop. 1,827.

Brux, a town in the north part of the circle of Saz, Bohemia.

Bruyeres, a town of France, in the department of Vosges, 11 m. E. N. E. of Epinal. Pop. 1,900.

Bryan, a small maritime county of the state of Georgia, bounded on the north by the Ogeechee River, which divides it from Chatham county; the Cannouchee River intersects it from the S. W. corner, falling into the Ogeechee about the centre of the north side. Pop. 2,319. The court-house of the county is about 15 miles south of Savannah, and 206 S. E. by E. of Milledgeville.

Bryansbridge, a village of Ireland, in the parish of Killaloe, county of Clare, seated on the Shannon, 8 m. N. of Limerick.

Brzesc, or Polesia, Palatinate of, a district of Russian Poland, lying between the rivers Bug on the west, and Dnieper on the east, intersected by the line of the 52nd degree of N. lat., and also from W. to E. by the Przypice River, with numerous collateral branches falling into the Dnieper. These rivers, from a total absence of all attempts to free the obstructions of their currents, tend to make Brzesc a marshy and dreary district, which, under social and reciprocal arrangements, might easily be made to rank among the most fertile in Europe. The Pina, a branch of the Przypice, is united by a canal to the Machawiza, a branch of the Bug, falling into the Vistula, thereby uniting the waters of the Black Sea with those of the Baltic.

Brzesc Litov, the chief town of the above district is situate at the confluence of the river Machawiza with the Bug, opposite to Theresopol. It is a considerable place, the see of a Greek bishop, and celebrated for its being the chief place for the instruction of Jews destined for rabbinical pursuits. It is strongly fortified, and has a castle on an eminence about 100 m. E. by S. of Warsaw, and 250 S. E. of Dantzic.

Brzesc, is also the name of another town, capital of another Palatinate of the same name, lying between the rivers Wartha on the S. W. and Vistula on the N. E. The town, seated near the Vistula, is about 90 m. W. by N. of Warsaw, and 150 due S. of Dantzic.

Brzezany, a town in the S. E. part of Austrian Galicia, seated near a small lake communicating with the Dneister River. Pop. about 5,000.

Brzo, and Brzo, begin the names of numerous other towns and villages in different parts of Poland and Galicia, but none of them merit any particular notice.

Brzernitz, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Saatz, on the frontier of the principality of Mieszen, with manufactures of lace, fire-arms, and hardware, 24 m. W. N. W. of Saatz. Another, in the north part of the circle of Prachin, 18 m. W. N. W. of Pisek.

Bua, an island in the gulf of Venice, on the coast of Dalmatia, called likewise Partridge Island, because frequented by those birds. It is joined by a bridge to the town of Traon, about 20 m. W. S. W. of Spalatro.

Buarcos, a town of Portugal, in Beira, on the sea-coast, at the mouth of the Mondego, 27 m. S. of Aveira. It suffered greatly by the earthquake which destroyed the greater part of Lisbon in 1759.

Buccari, or Buchari, a seaport of the Austrian empire, on the coast of Morlachia, at the head of the N. E. part of the gulf of Venice, declared by the emperor, in 1780, a free port for commerce with the East Indies; but the favour might just as well have applied to trading with the moon, for any advantage that has resulted from the declaration. It is 12 m. E. of Fiume. Pop. about 3,000.

Buchanes, the most eastern promontory of Scotland, to the east of Peterhead, in Aberdeenshire, in long. 1. 34. W. lat. 57. 27. N. Near this promontory are the Bullers of Buchan, and other stupendous rocks and precipices, much admired for their awful grandeur.

Bucharia. See Bokharia.

Buchau, a town of Suabia, with a nunnery, seated on a small lake, called Feyder See, 25 m. S. W. of Ulm.

Buchan, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Saatz, 26 m. S. W. of Saatz.

Buchatz, a town of Brandenburg, in the middle mark, seated on the Dahme, near the frontier of Lusatia, 23 m. S. S. E. of Berlin.

Bucharest, a strong city of European Turkey, capital of Wallachia, where the hospodar commonly resides. The patriarchal church is large, adjoining to the palace of the archbishop; and in a square, near the centre of the town, is the great church of St. George, the patron saint of Wallachia. The inhabitants are estimated at 60,000. It is seated on the Domboriza, which falls into the Danube, 25 m. S. S. E. of Tergovist, and 200 N. by W. of Adrianople. Long. 26. 8. E. lat. 44. 37. N.

Buchorn, a town of Suabia, seated on the north bank of the lake of Constance, 18 m. N. W. of Lindau.

Buckden, a village in Huntingdonshire, Eng. 5 m. S. W. of Huntingdon, and 61 N. of London. Here is a superb palace of the bishops of Lincoln, and several of the prelates have been interred in the church. Pop. 368.

Buckeburg, a town of Westphalia, in the county of Schauenburg, with a castle, on the river Aa, 3 m. E. S. E. of Minden.

Buckingham, Old and New, two towns in Norfolk, Eng. 12 m. E. by N. of Thetford, and 93 N. E. of London. Pop. together 1,354.

Buckfastleigh, a village in Devonshire, Eng. three miles S. by W. of Ashburton. Here are some remains of a Cistercian abbey; and many of the houses are built with materials from its ruins. Pop. 2,240.

Buckfield, p.t. Oxford Co. Me. Pop. 1,510.

Buckhead, p.t. Fairfield Dis. S. C. 33 m. N. Columbia.

Buckingham, an interior county of England, bounded on the south by the river Thames, which divides it from Berkshire, east by the counties of Middlesex, Hertford, and Bedford, south by Northampton, and west by Oxfordshire. The south part is intersected by the Ouse River, running from west to east into Bedfordshire, working several corn and paper mills, but is now navigable within the county. The Syssel runs from south to north into the Ouse, and the Coln, which divides the county from that of Middlesex, runs from north to south into the Thames. The Thame, which rises in the centre of the county, runs west, falling into the Thames, in Oxfordshire. The north part is intersected by a range of chalk hills, and the Grand Junction Canal runs through the south-east part of the county, being carried over the river Ouse, by an aqueduct three quarters of a mile in length. The county may be considered divided by the chalk hills into two extensive plains the south part producing wheat and beans of superior quality, and the north part appropriated more to pasture. In addition to its chalk, which is distributed over all its inland counties, for whitewashing, it has veins of fuller's earth and ochre.

This county has long been celebrated for its corn and cattle: formerly fine flocks of sheep were fed in the vale of Aylesbury, but the breeding of these useful animals has been for some time on the decline. At present this vale feeds oxen for the London market, to which it also sends immense supplies of butter weekly. There is a small proportion of arable land in the northern division of the county; and not much in any other part, except the Chiltern districts, which are usually cultivated with wheat, barley, oats, beans, and malfain. In the neighbourhood of Aylesbury, ducks are reared very early in the spring, and sometimes at Christmas, which being sent to London, sell at high price. The only manufactures of consequence in this county are those of bonelace and paper. The former is carried on at Olney, Newport-Pagnell, and Hanslope, and the latter principally in the neighbourhood of Wycomb. At Amersham there is a manufacture of sacking and of white cotton goods; and at Marlow are some large works of copper, brass, and brass-wire; and mills for making thimbles and pressing rape and linseed. This county is adorned with several magnificent seats, and in various parts Roman roads and military stations are traced, and Roman antiquities have been occasionally discovered. The principal towns are Aylesbury, Buckingham, Marlow; and of a secondary class, Amersham, Wycomb, and Wendover; each of which returns two members to parliament, in addition to two for the county.

Buckingham, a borough, and one of the principal towns in the preceding county, is situate on the north bank of the Ouse, by which it is nearly surrounded, and over which there are three bridges. It is a place of considerable antiquity, having been fortified by Edward the Elder in 918, against the incursions of the Danes. It had formerly a castle in the centre of the town, on the site of which, towards the close of the last century, an elegant new church was erected. The summer assizes for the county are held here. The town hall is a spacious edifice of brick. A great number of calves are fattened, and large quantities of butter made for the London market in this part of the county: lace is also made here. Market on Saturday. Pop. in 1821, including four adjoining hamlets, 3,465, 16 m. north of Aylesbury, 26 N. E. of Oxford, 23 S. W. of Northampton, and 55 N. of London.

Buckingham, an interior county in the E. district of Virginia, forming nearly a square, the west and north sides of which are bounded by James River. Pop. 18,351. The court-house, in the centre of the county is 64 m. W. of Richmond. Also the name of three towns in Pa.

Buda, or Ofen, the capital of Lower Hungary, situate on the side of a hill, on the west side of the Danube, over which is a bridge of boats to Pest. The inhabitants are estimated at 25,000. The churches and public buildings are handsome. In the adjacent country are vineyards, which produce excellent wine. Prior to 1526, when it surrendered to the Turks, it was the residence of the kings of Hungary. From that period, for 160 years, it was an object of jealousy and contention between the Turks and the Christian powers of Europe; when, in 1686, it surrendered to the latter, who strengthened the fortifications, and by whom it has since been retained without interruption. It suffered greatly by fire in 1810, when 600 houses were destroyed; but their places have since been supplied with improved buildings. It is about 130 m. E. S. E. of Vienna, and 180 N. N. W. of Belgrade. Long. 19. 5. E. lat. 47. 30. N.

Budweis, a town of Moravia in the circle of Znaim, 40 m. S. W. of Bunn, and 65 N. N. W. of Vienna.

Buenos Ayres. Under this head it has been usual to include a vast portion of the southern divisions of the western hemisphere, extending from the 13th to the 41st deg. of south lat. comprising an area of about 1,450,000 square miles; constituted a vice-royalty of Spain in 1778, but from the period of July, 1806, to July, 1821, it continued in perpetual revolution; when at the latter period it was constituted an independent republic by the title of the United Provinces of South America, under which head its aggregate and general features will be found exhibited.

Buenos Ayres, one of the eight united provinces of South America, is the most easterly division of the republic, being bounded on the east from the 26th to the 34th deg. of south lat. by the Brazilian territory, and from the 34th to the frontier of Patagonia, in the lat. of 41 south by the Atlantic Ocean; divided into two parts north and south by the great river La Plata, which falls into the Atlantic Ocean, between the lats. of 35. and 37. The north part of this province is intersected from north to south by the great rivers Parana and Uruguay, the united waters of which form the La Plata. This part is bounded on the west by a conventional line, which divides it from the province of Cordova, from 50 to 120 m. W. of Parana River. The greater portion of this division of the province is exceedingly fertile, and the congeniality of its climate worthy of the title which it has conferred upon the country. It contains several considerable towns, the most important of which are Corrientes in the north, on the east bank of the Parana; Santa Fe, south, on the west bank of the ditto; and Monte Video on the north bank of the La Plata towards its entrance into the sea. On the east bank of the Uruguay there are numerous settlements founded by the Jesuits. The south part of this province is also divided by a conventional line from Cordova, and south by the Rio Negro, which separates it from Patagonia, and is intersected from north-west to south-east, between the lat. of 38. and 40. by the Colorado River, and in the lat. of 36. by the Saladillo, which falls into the La Plata. This part of the province is very little known, but is celebrated as containing the chief town and seat of government of the eight united provinces.

Buenos Ayres, city of, is seated on the south bank of the La Plata, about 180 miles from its mouth, in the lat. of 34. 35. S. and 58. 24. of W. long. opposite to where the Uruguay forms its junction with the Parana. This city is justly esteemed as the finest country and as containing the most active and intelligent population of all South America. It was founded by Mendoza, in 1535, but afterwards abandoned; and in 1544, another colony of the Spaniards came here, who left it also; but it was rebuilt in 1582, and inhabited by Spaniards and the native Americans. It was, however, but little known to the world until the commencement of the last century, up to which period the intercourse of the country had been restrained by a rigorous monopoly, when in 1740 the annual fleet of the monopolists sailed for the last time to Cadiz, the intercourse being thrown open to the whole of Spain. In 1774, the freedom of its intercourse was extended to the greater part of the ports of the other Spanish governments in America; and in 1778, when the provinces of Buenos Ayres, which had previously been under the government of Peru, were constituted a separate viceroyalty, and the city of Buenos Ayres made the seat of the viceroy, it gradually increased in extent, population, and importance, during the remainder of the last century; about which period the imperial French government under Napoleon sent emissaries for the purpose of rendering it subservient to the views and policy of France, which tended materially to retard its commerce and career, on which alone the prosperity of the city depended. To counteract this influence, the English, in 1806, sent an expedition from the Cape of Good Hope against Buenos Ayres, which they took by surprise in the month of May of that year, but the whole force were compelled to surrender at discretion, after a few weeks, to a body a militia under the command of General Liniers, a partizan of the French government. In June of the following year, successive reinforcements having arrived from England, a renewed attack was made upon the city with a force of 10,000 men under the command of General Whitelocke, but the inhabitants, animated by Liniers to the most determined resistance, and aided by the militia, converted every house into a fortress, from which they assailed the English troops at all points with such disastrous effect, as to compel the whole force to surrender prisoners-of-war. From this period, up to July, 1816, the city became the theatre of internal dissensions, when a declaration of independence was agreed upon, and it has since then remained comparatively tranquil, and been progressively recovering from the disasters of the preceding fifteen or twenty years. The buildings of Buenos Ayres are stately and uniform, and the streets regular. Among the public buildings are a stately cathedral, and two or three churches, town hall, several convents, and other similar institutions. The public edifices are all built of stone of a whitish colour, and produce an imposing effect. Its commercial intercourse now extends to all parts of the world, and its export productions of hides and tallow, in addition to the silver and gold from the mines of Potosi, &c. enable it to command an abundant supply of all the manufactured productions of Europe and Asia, as well as of every other commodity, from every quarter of the globe. The population, which at the commencement of the present century was estimated at about 40,000, in 1835, was supposed to amount to 70,000.

Buffalo, p.t. Erie Co. N. Y. on Lake Erie, near its outlet. This is a port of entry with a good harbour, furnished at the entrance with a lighthouse. It is the great emporium of the lake commerce and the point at which the great canal from Albany joins the waters of the lake. The town occupies a pleasant spot on a gentle acclivity, and consists principally of one long street with many handsome and commodious buildings. It is a very flourishing place and increases fast from year to year. The harbour is frequented by great numbers of lake craft and steamboats. Pop. 8,653. There are 9 other towns called Buffalo, in the U. S. viz. 6 in Pa. and one in Ohio, Va. and Missouri.

The ancient name was Eta; and it is famous for the pass of Thermopylae, (so called from the hot baths in the neighbourhood) where Leonidas, and his 300 Spartans, resisted for three days the whole Persian army.

Bunker Hill, a steep height occupying the centre of the peninsula upon which stands the town of Charlestown, Massachusetts. The southern ex-remity offers a less abrupt eminence detached from the main height, and properly called Breed's Hill. Here was fought on the 17th of June 1775 the celebrated battle known as the Battle of Bunker Hill. General Warren fell in the action, and the Americans finally retreated from the spot, but the British suffered the loss of nearly half their men and were unable to make the least use of their advantage. To perpetuate the memory of this obstinate struggle between the undisciplined militia of New England and the veterans of Britain, a noble monument has been commenced on the spot, and is now about one third finished. It is a plain obelisk of granite, and will be 220 feet high.

Burning Springs, the name given to certain springs in the western part of the State of New York, chiefly in the towns of Bristol, Middlesex and Canandaigua. They emit gas which may be set on fire. At Bristol the gas rises from the clefts of the slate rocks on the margin of a brook, and here it burns continually with a steady flame. Where it rises through the water it is formed into bubbles and flashes when the flame is applied

In Middlesex the springs lie along a tract about a mile in length, partly at the bottom of a valley. The gas arises from the summits of little hillocks of a dark bituminous mould, and burns with a steady flame. In winter when these hillocks are covered with snow, openings are made through it, and the gas when set on fire, burns in contact with the snow. Sometimes tubes of ice are formed about the currents of gas, and rise to the height of several feet; when several of these are lighted at once in a still evening, the illumination produces a most brilliant effect. There is another burning spring upon Niagara river about half a mile above the falls, and within a few feet of the rapids; the water is charged with sulphuretted hydrogen gas.

In the south-east part of Lake Erie, about 20 rods from the shore, is a burning spring rising from the bottom of the lake. The water is here 4 or 5 feet deep, and the stream from the spring is thrown to the surface with considerable force. When a brand is applied to the water it bursts into a flame. If drank, it proves a powerful emetic.

Buraley, a town in the parish of Whalley, Lancashire, Eng. situate at the foot of the range of hills which divide Lancashire from Yorkshire, in the centre of a very populous district, extensively occupied in the cotton manufacture, and abounding in coal; immediately contiguous to Burnley there are eight extensive collieries, about 30 extensive cotton mills and manufactories, four calico printers, five or six machine makers, &c. &c. The Leeds and Liverpool Canal nearly encircles the town, which in 1801 contained a population of only 3,305, but in 1821, 6,374; 24 miles due north of Manchester, and 15 W. of Halifax.

Burrampooter, Magna, or Brahmapootra, a river of Asia, which rises in the mountains of Thibet, near the head of the Ganges, in the lat. of 34. N. and of 80. of E. long. These two rivers, issuing from opposite sides of the same ridge of mountains, direct their course toward opposite quarters, till they are more than 700 miles asunder; and afterwards meet in one point near the sea, each having performed a winding course of about 1,400 miles. From its source, the Burrampooter proceeds S. E. through Thibet, where it is named Sampoo, or Zancin; that is, the River: after washing the border of the territory of Lassa, it proceeds S. E. beyond the 95th degree of E. long. to within 220 miles of Yunnan, the western-most province of China: it then turns suddenly to the west, and passing through Assam, assumes the name of Burrampooter. It enters Bengal on the N. E., makes a circuit round the western point of the Garrow Mountains, and then, altering its course to south, meets the Ganges about 40 m. from the sea, in the lat. of 22. 40. N. During the last 60 miles before its junction with the Ganges, it forms a stream which is regularly from four to five miles wide.

Burton, t. Stafford Co. N. H. Pop. 235. Also town in Geauga Co. Ohio.

Bursa, or Prusa, a city of Asiatic Turkey, in Nætolia, built by Prusias, king of Bythinia. It was the capital of the Ottoman empire, before the taking of Constantinople; and it now contains about 60,000 inhabitants. It stands upon several little hills, at the bottom of Mount Olympus, and on the edge of a fine plain full of fruit-trees. So many springs proceed from the mount, that every house has its own fountain: and at its foot are splendid hot-baths. The mosques are elegant, as are the caravanseras. The Bezeztine is a large structure full of warehouses and shops, containing all the commodities of the east, besides their own manufactures in silk. Here are the best workmen in all Turkey, who are excellent imitators of the tapestry of Italy and France. None but muselmenn are permitted to dwell in the city; but the suburbs, which are much finer, and better peopled, are filled with Jews, Armenians, and Greeks. Bursa is seated on the banks of the Nilifur, which falls into the sea of Marmora, 68 m. S. by E. of Constantinople. Long. 29. 12. E. lat. 40. 12. N.

Bursledon, a village in Hampshire, Eng. five miles E. S. E. of Southampton. It stands on the Hamble, three miles from its mouth, and several ships have been built here for the navy. Pop. 473.

Burslem, a town in Staffordshire, Eng. Till towards the close of the last century, it was an inconsiderable place, but being intersected by the Trent and Mersey Canal, it has become one of the principal centres of the pottery, porcelain, earthenware and several other manufactures. The population, which in 1801 was 6,578, in 1821 was 9,699. It is three miles north of Newcastle-under-Lime, and 151 N. by W. of London.

Burton-upon-Trent, a town in Staffordshire, Eng. It has the remains of a large abbey; and is seated on the west bank of the Trent, which here divides the counties of Stafford and Derby; there is an old bridge of 36 arches over the river, and on its banks are two extensive corn mills, one cotton mill, and six extensive breweries, the produce of which is distributed, and justly esteemed, over every part of the world. There are also six or eight employers in the manufacture of hats; the cotton spinning, at the commencement of the present century, was more extensive, and, in consequence of its transfer to Lancashire, the population of the town, which in 1801 was 4,459, in 1821, was only 4,114, four contiguous hamlets containing 2,586 inhabitants more. It is 12 m. E. of Litchfield, 12 W. of Derby, and 123 W. of London.

* * There are about 35 other towns and villages named Burton, or to which it is prefixed, in different parts of England, but all of them are inconsiderable.

Burawak, a town of Hindoostan, in Bengal, on the border of Orissa, 256 m. W. by N. of Calcutta.

Bury, a town in Lancashire, Eng. extensively engaged both in the cotton and woollen manufacture, in all the branches of spinning, weaving, scouring, fulling, dressing, bleaching, printing, &c. in all the various branches of which there are nearly 100 establishments, some of them very extensive. There are also iron foundries, machine makers, and six or eight employers in the manufacture of hats; it communicates with the Leeds and Liverpool canal by a collateral cut called the Bury Extension. It is seated on the bank of the Irwell, 9 m. N. of Manchester. Pop. in 1821, 10,583, being 3,511 more than in 1810, and the total population of the parish, which includes hamlets, in 1821, was 34,581.

Bury, St. Edmund, a borough in Suffolk, Eng. It took its name from St. Edmund the king, who was buried here; and to his honour an abbey was founded, of which some noble ruins remain. Here are two parish churches, which stand in one church-yard; in St. Mary's lies Mary, queen of France, who was married to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk. At this town the barons met and entered into a league against king John. Henry VI. called a parliament here in 1446, when Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, was imprisoned, and here he died, as supposed, by poison. The assizes for the county are held here; and it has a free-school founded by Edward VI. The number of inhabitants in 1811 was 7,966; and in 1821, 9,999, and most of them were returned as employed in trade and manufactures. It is seated on the Lark, a branch of the Ouse, 25 m. N. W. of Ipswich, and 71 N. N. E. of London.

Buryens, St. a village in Cornwall, Eng. 5 m. W. S. W. of Penzance. It was once of great note, and had a college founded by king Athelstan. The church is spacious, and contains many curious relics of antiquity. In its neighbourhood are 19 large stones standing in a circle, 12 feet from each other, and in the centre is one much larger than the rest. Pop. 1,188.

Bushair, or Bushire, a town of Persia, in Farsistan, surrounded by a wall, with a few bastions. The English East India Company had formerly a factory here. The trade with Shiraz, by caravans, is considerable. It is situate on a narrow neck of land, in the gulf of Persia, 110 m. W. S. W. of Shiraz. Long. 51. 0. E. lat. 29. 20. N.

Bushkill, t. Northampton, Co. Pa.

Bushwick, t. Kings Co. N. Y. on Long Island, 3 m. from Brooklyn. Pop. 1,630.

Bussorah. See Bassorah.

Bute, an island of Scotland, in the frith of Clyde, separated on the north from the peninsula of Cowal in Argyleshire by a narrow channel. It is fourteen miles long and four broad; the north part hilly and barren, but the south fertile and well cultivated. The coast is rocky, and indented with several safe harbours, chiefly appropriated to the herring fishery. Rothesay is the capital.

Buteshire, a county of Scotland, consisting of the island of Bute, Arran, Great and Little Cumbra, and Inchmarnock, lying in the frith of Clyde, between the counties of Ayr and Argyle. This shire sends a member to parliament alternately with Caithnesshire.

Butgenbach, a town of the Netherlands, 25 m. S. by E. of Aix-la-Chapelle.

Butler, an interior county in the W. District of Pennsylvania, the south-east point jetting upon the Alleghany River, 18 m. above Pittsburgh. Pop. 14,663. The chief town, of the same name, is in the centre of the county, is 242 m. W. by N. of Harrisburg.

Butler, an interior county in the west part of Kentucky, intersected from east to west by Green River, which falls into the Ohio. Pop. 3,056. Morgantown, on the south bank of Green River, 144 W. by S. of Frankfort, is the chief town.

Butler, a frontier county at the S. E. extremity of the state of Ohio, bordering on Indiana. It is intersected from the north-west corner to the centre of the south border by the Miami River. Population, 27,044. Hamilton, on the east bank of the Miami, 107 m. W. S. W. of Columbus, and 12 north of Cincinnati, is the chief town.

Butler, a county in Alabama. Pop. 5,634. Greenville is the capital. Also the name of 2 towns in Pa. and Ohio.

Butler, the name of 2 towns in Ohio.

Butrinto, a seaport of European Turkey, in Albania, and a bishop's see; seated on the canal of Corfu, at the entrance of the gulf of Venice, 30 m. S. of Chimera. Long. 19. 9. E. lat. 36. 49. N.

Butternuts, p.t. Otsego Co. N. Y. 94 m. W. Albany. Pop. 3,991.

Buttermere, a lake in Cumberland, Eng. eight miles S. W. of Keswick. It is two miles long, and nearly half a mile broad. On the west side it is terminated by a mountain, called, from its ferruginous colour, the Red Pike; a strip of cultivated ground adorns the east shore: at the north end is the village of Buttermere and a group of houses, called Gatesgarth, is seated on the south extremity, under an amphitheatre of mountainous rocks. Here Honister Crag is seen rising to a vast height, flanked by two conical mountains, Fleetwith on the east, and Scarf on the west side. Numerous mountain torrents create never-failing cataracts that thunder and foam down the rocks, and form the lake below. This lake is called the Upper Lake; and, near a mile from it, to the north-east is the Lower Lake, called also Cromack-water. The river Cocker flows through both these lakes to Cockermouth.

Butterworth, an appendage to the town of Rochdale, in Lancashire, Eng. Pop. 5,554. See Rochdale.

Buttevant, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Cork. The town is 4 m. N. of Mallow, and in 1820 contained a population of 1,020; total of the parish, 5,049.

Button Bay, the north part of Hudson Bay, through which attempts were made by Sir Thomas Button, to discover a north-west passage to China, when he lost his ship, and came back in a sloop built in the country. It lies between 60. and 66. N. lat.

Buttstadt and Buttelstadt, two towns of Upper Saxony, in Thuringia, seated on the Löss, 16 m. W. of Naumburg.

Butzbach, a town of Germany, in Wetteravia, seated in a marshy but fertile plain, 10 m. S. of Giessen, and 25 N. of Frankfort. Pop. about 3,200.

Butzow, a town of Lower Saxony, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, seated on the Warn, 17 m. S. W. of Rostock.

Buzadewar, a strong fort of the country of Bootan, at the entrance of the mountains from Bengal. It stands on the top of a rock, 20 m. N. of Chichacotta.

Buzar, a town and fort of Hindoostan, in Bahar, on the south bank of the Ganges, 72 m. W. of Patna.

Buxtehude, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Bremen, on the river Este, 18 m. S. E. of Stade.

Buxton, a village in Derbyshire, Eng. at the entrance of the Peak. It has nine wells that rise near the source of the river Wye; and they are deemed one of the seven wonders of the Peak. Their waters, noted in the time of the Romans, are hot and sulphureous, temperature about 82; much company resort to them in the summer. The building for the bath was erected by George, earl of Shrewsbury; and here Mary, queen of Scotland, resided for some time. The duke of Devonshire has erected a beautiful building in the form of a crescent, under which are piazzas and shops.

A mile hence is another of the wonders, called Pool's Hole, at the foot of a mountain. The entrance is low and narrow, but it presently opens to a cave of considerable height, and 696 feet long, with a roof resembling a Gothic cathedral. It contains many stalactitious concretions, and several curious representations both of art and nature, produced by the petrifying water continually dropping from the rock. Buxton is 32 m. N. W. of Derby, and 160 N. N. W. of London. Resident pop. in 1821, 1,036.

Buzançois, a town of France, in the department of the Indre, on the east bank of the river of that name, 12 m. S. E. of Chatillon. Pop. 3,200.

Buzzard's Bay, in the southern part of Massachusetts, is about 30 miles long and 7 wide. On the south it is bounded by a range of islands called the Elizabeth Islands. A canal 31.2 miles in length from the bottom of this bay to the waters of Massachusetts Bay would completely insulate the whole peninsula of Cape Cod and enable the coasting craft to avoid a long and dangerous navigation around the cape. But although such a communication has been talked about for above an hundred years, the want of a good harbour at the northern extremity will probably hinder its being undertaken.

Byberry, t. Philadelphia Co. Pa.

Bychowo, a town of Lithuania on the west bank of the Dnieper, 189 m. S. S. W. of Wilna, and 8 S. of Mohilow.

Byfield, a village in Essex Co. Mass. 5 m. S. W. from Newburyport, containing Dummer Academy, and another Female Seminary.

Byker, an appendage to Newcastle-on-Tyne. Pop. in 1821, 3,552. See Newcastle.

Byron, p.t. Genneves Co. N. Y. 268 m. W. Albany. Pop. 1,939.

Byron Island, an island in the Pacific Ocean, discovered by Commodore Byron in 1766. It is low, full of wood, and very populous. The natives are tall, well-proportioned, and clean; and their countenance expressive of a surprising mixture of intrepidity and cheerfulness. Long. 173 46. E. lat. 1. 18. S.

C

CABARRAS, a small interior county of North Carolina, lying to the west of the Yadkin River. Pop. 8,796. Concord, 143 m. S. W. of Raleigh, is the chief town.

Cabeza de Vide, a town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, with a castle, 12 m. S. W. of Portalegre.

Cabell, a large mountainous county of the W. District of Virginia, bounded on the S. W. by the Big Sandy River, which divides it from Kentucky, and on the N. W. by the Ohio River, which divides it from the state of Ohio. It is about 50 miles in length from S. E. to N. W. and 25 in breadth. Pop. 5,884. Guyando, at the mouth of a river of the same name, which intersects the country its whole length, falling into the Ohio, is the chief town.

Cabello, or Cavello. See Porto Cabello.

Cabenda, a seaport on the west coast of South Africa, subject to Portugal, 100 m. S. E. of Loango. Long. 12. 2. E. lat. 4. 5. S.

Cabes, or Gabes, a town of the kingdom of Tunis, near a gulf of the same name, 170 m. south of Tunis. Long. 10. 55. lat. 33. 40. N.

Cabot, p.t. Caledonia Co. Vt. Pop. 1,304.

Cabra, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, with six convents, and a college for the study of philosophy and divinity. It is situate at the foot of a mountain, near the source of a river of the same name, 25 m. S. E. of Cordova.

Cabra, a town of the kindom of Tombuctoo. It is a place of great trade, seated on the Niger, and serves as a port to the capital, 10 m. S. E. of Tombuctoo.

Cabrera, one of the Balearic Isles, in the Mediterranean, 7 m. S. of Majorca. It has a large harbour, on the north side, defended by a castle. Long. 2. 55. E. lat. 39. 8. N.

Cabul, a country of Asia, bounded on the west by Persia, north by the Hindoo-ko, east by Cashmere and Lahore, and south by Candahar. It was anciently a province of Persia, afterward it was annexed to the Mogul empire till 1739, when it was restored to Persia by Nadir Shah. The country is highly diversified, consisting of mountains covered with snow, hills of moderate height, rich plains, stately forests, and innumerable streams. It produces every article necessary for human life, with the most delicate fruits and flowers. It is sometimes called Zabulistan, from Zabul, one of the names of Ghizni. It now forms a part of Afghanistan.

Cabul, the capital of the province of Cabul, and of the dominions of the sultan of the Afghans, seated near the foot of the Hindoo-ko on the river Attock, a branch of the Indus. It carries on a considerable trade, and is considered as the gate of India toward Tartary. In 1739, Nadir Shah took it by storm, and plundered it of great treasures. It is 170 m. N. E. of Candahar. Long. 68. 35. E. lat. 34. 30. N.

Cacaca, or Kanusa, a town of the kingdom of Fex, with a fort upon a rock, 16 m. S. of Melilla, on the shores of the Mediterranean.

Cacella, or Tucella, a town of Portugal, on the S. E. coast of Algarva, 6 m. E. by N. of Tavira, and 8 W. S. W. of Castro Marim.

Caceres, a town of Spain, in Estremadura, seated on the Sabrot, 22 m. S. E. of Alcantara, on the road to Truxillo. Pop. about 8,000.

Caceres, a town in the south part of the island of Luconia, capital of the province of Camarines, and a bishop's see. Long. 124. 0. E. lat. 14. 33. N.

Cashan, or Kashan, a town of Persia, in Irac Agemi, which has considerable trade in silks, silver and gold brocades, and porcelain. Here are many Christians, and Guebres, or worshippers of fire. (See Becks.) It is seated in a vast plain, 55 m. N. by W. of Isfahan.

Cachao, or Keke, the capital of the kingdom of Tonquin. It contains 20,000 houses, whose walls are of mud, and the roofs covered with thatch; a few are built with brick, and roofed with pantiles. The principal streets are very wide, and paved with small stones. The king has three palaces here, such as they are; and near them are stables for his horses and elephants. The house of the English factory is the best in the city; and the factories purchase silks and lacked ware, as in China. It is seated on the river Hoti, 80 m. from the gulf of Tonquin. Long. 105. 11. E. lat. 21. 10. N.

Cachao, a town of the kingdom of Cumbo, on the west coast of North Africa, seated on the river Cachao, or St. Domingo, 50 miles from its mouth, between the Gambia and Rio Grande. It is subject to the Portuguese, who have three forts, and formerly carried on a great trade in wax and slaves. Long. 14. 55. E. lat. 12. 6. N.

Cachoiro, a town of Brazil, in the government of Bahia. It is the mart for the northern gold mines, and stands on a small river, 42 m. N. W. of St. Salvador.

Cacongo, a town of the kingdom of Loango, on the west coast of South Africa, seated near the mouth of a river, 40 m. S. S. E. of Loango.

Cacorra, a town of Spain, situate between two mountains on the frontiers of La Mancha, Murcia, and Granada, 15 m. E. N. E. of Ubeda.

Cadenac, a town of France, in the department of Mouths of the Rhone, 28 m. S. E. of Avignon.

Cadenac, a town of France in the department of Lot, on the river Lot, 27 m. E. N. E. of Cahors.

Cader Idris, a mountain of Wales, in Merionethshire, to the south of Dolgelly. The perpendicular height of which is 2,914 feet above the level of the sea; and on it are several lakes abounding in fish.

Cadiz, a town of Spain, in Granada, 23 m. S. E. of Granada.

Cadillac, a town of France, in the department of Gironde, with a castle, seated on the east bank of the Garonne, 15 m. S. E. of Bordeaux.

Cadiz, a celebrated city and seaport of Spain in Andalusia, called by the Phœnicians, who founded it, Gadir, a fence or fenced place, and by the Arabs Gazira Cadiz, is the richest trading port of Spain, and one of its finest cities. It stands on the western extremity of a tongue of land projecting from the isle of Leon, which on its south-east side was formerly connected with the main land by a bridge. The town is surrounded with a wall and irregular bastions, adapted to the variations of the ground. On the south side there are steep acclivities which render it inaccessible, and the landing-place on the north is defended by sandbanks and sunken rocks. On the south-west point is a range of rocks, partly covered at high water; and the point of St. Sebastian is defended by a strong fort. At the neck of the isthmus, where it is most accessible, every precaution has been taken to secure it against hostile attacks; and it may, therefore, be regarded as almost impregnable. Its spacious bay forms an excellent haven, and is divided into two harbours communicating with each other; the one called the bay of Cadiz, the other that of Puntales. The entrance to each, as well as the town and port generally, are commanded by the forts of St. Catherine, St. Sebastian, Chiclana, Matagorda, Puntales, and Fort Luis. The bay of Cadiz is the appointed resort of merchant vessels; that of the Puntales is reserved for Spanish men of war, and merchantmen trading with America; a passage into it is not permitted to ships of foreign nations. The entrance to this inner harbour is commanded on one side by the fort of Puntales, an isle formed by the Cortadura, and on the other by the fort of Matagorda. The Trocadero is an isle formed by the bay of Cadiz and the channel leading from Matagorda to Puerto Real. These, and other advantages of nature and art, render Cadiz the most complete maritime station in Europe, while its position qualifies it as an emporium for the commerce of both hemispheres. The city is an episcopal see, including, however, only twenty-eight parishes; its cathedral is ancient, and very magnificent: there are also thirteen convents, an academy of the fine arts, a nautical and mathematical school, an excellent observatory, a naval and military asylum, a chirurgical institute, a botanic garden, a theatre, and thirteen hospitals. Since the year 1786, Cadiz has been much enlarged and improved. In 1808, the number of houses was 8,000, and that of the inhabitants, including many English and Germans, 75,000; but at the last census the population had sunk to 53,000,—a diminution in a great measure ascribable to the loss of trade with the colonies. On the isthmus, near the town, are important saltworks, and some vineyards which produce good wine. There is a considerable tunny fishery. Among the inconveniences of Cadiz, that which is most severely felt by foreigners is the want of good spring water. Each house, indeed, has its cistern; but the fresh water chiefly in request is brought in casks across the bay from Port St. Mary's. The streets are straight, and in general well paved and lighted, but in some parts narrow. The houses, with their small windows and projecting slate roofs, have rather a gloomy appearance, notwithstanding their whitened walls. The principal square is that of St. Antonio. A favourite luxury, during the summer heats here, is water cooled with snow brought from the distant mountains of Ronda.

When Cadiz had become the centre of the commercial intercourse between Spain and the Indies, all the maritime nations of Europe established relations with it by means of resident consuls, agents, and correspondents. In 1796, there were 110 great commercial houses; and about the same period, or a few years previous, the imports amounted to 100 millions of reals, and the exports to 270 millions. In 1804, the number of vessels that entered the port was 1,386. The battle of Trafalgar, in the following year, ruined the Spanish navy; and the decline of Cadiz was accelerated by the usurpation of Bonaparte, which afforded the South American states an opportunity to declare their independence and open a direct intercourse with Europe.

Few seaports can boast of higher antiquity. In the sea, near the isle of San Pedro, are still to be traced the ruins of the temple of Hercules and of the ancient Gades. The port was successively occupied by the Tyrians, the Carthaginians, and the Romans, who preserved to it the name of Gades. The Arabs, after their invasion of Spain, made themselves masters of the town, and held it until 1262, when it was taken from them by the Spaniards. In 1696, it was plundered and burnt by the English, after which it was rebuilt and more strongly fortified. During the wars with England it was frequently blockaded, and once bombarded, but without success. From 1808, until the return of Ferdinand VII., it was the rallying point of Spanish loyalty; and, on the advance of the French troops into Andalusia, the supreme junta adopted strenuous measures for its defence, and obtained powerful reinforcements from Gibraltar and Portugal. The French laid siege to Cadiz on the 6th of February, 1810, and, notwithstanding a determined fire from the ships, forts, and floating batteries, seized several strong points along the bay, and in particular the fort of Matagorda, whence they determined to bombard the city, notwithstanding its great distance; and mortars for this purpose were cast at Seville. Some shells and grenades were thrown; but as the houses of Cadix were strongly built of stone, no conflagration ensued, and the damage done was but inconsiderable. The possession of the isle of Leon was the object for which the most strenuous preparations were made on both sides, as it must have decided the fate of the city. These were continued until the autumn of 1812, when the victorious progress of Lord Wellington in the centre of Spain compelled the French to depart from Andalusia, and abandon a siege which had been continued and resisted with extraordinary vigour and pertinacity. Few subsequent events occurred here of much importance. In 1820, Riego commenced the ill-starred military revolution on the isle of Leon. In 1823, during a short blockade, the French, under the duke d'Angoulême, carried the Trocadero. Since the return of Ferdinand VII. to absolute power, the trade of Cadiz has been on the decline; and, perhaps, the measure best calculated for its revival, though, unfortunately, that which he seems least willing to adopt, would be to recognise the independence of the South American colonies. Lat. 36. 30. N. long. 6. 25. W. Pop. 53,000.

Cadix, p.t. Harrison Co. Ohio, and Trigg Co. Ken.

Cadolzburg, a town of Bavaria, circle of Rezat, 8 m. W. of Nuremberg.

Cadore, a town of the Austrian Venetian territory, the birth-place of Titian, the painter. It is seated on the Piave, 15 m. N. of Bellune.

Cadsand, or Cassand, an island of Holland, on the north coast of Flanders, at the mouth of the Scheldt. The land is fertile, and the inhabitants make a large quantity of excellent cheese. The chief town is Cassandria.

Caen, a city of France, capital of the department of Calvados. It has a celebrated university, and a castle with four towers, built by the English. The abbey of St. Stephen was founded by William the Conqueror, who was buried in it. The river Orne, which falls into the English channel, runs through the city, to which the tide brings up large vessels. It exports large quantities of clover seed to England. It is 65 miles W. by S. of Rouen, and 125 W. by N. of Paris. Long. 0. 22. W. lat. 49. 11. N. Pop. about 36,000.

Caerleon, a town of Monmouthshire, Eng. Many Roman antiquities have been found here, and it has the ruins of a castle. It is seated on the Usk, 19 m. S. W. of Monmouth, and 146 W. by N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,062.

Caermarthenshire, a maritime county of South Wales, 48 miles long and 25 broad. It is bounded on the south by the Bristol channel, on the west by Pembrokeshire, on the north by Cardiganshire; and on the east by Brecknock and Glamorganshire. The air is wholesome, and the soil less rocky and mountainous than in most other parts of Wales, and consequently it is proportionally more fertile both in corn and pasture. It has also plenty of wood, and is well supplied with coal and lime-stone. The principal rivers are the Towy, Cathy, and Tawe; of which the first abounds with excellent salmon. It abounds with ancient forts, camps, and tumuli. Near Caermarthen towards the east, may be seen the ruins of Kastelk Karry and several vast caverns supposed to have been copper mines of the Romans. Near this spot is a fountain, which ebbs and flows twice in 24 hours. The county and city send each a member to parliament.

Caermarthen, a borough of Wales, capital of Caermarthenshire. It is seated on the Towy, over which is a stone bridge, to which vessels of 200 to 300 tons burden may come up. It was fortified with a wall and a castle, now in ruins; and on the east side of the town, near the river, are the remains of a monastic building of considerable extent. There are iron and tin mines in the neighbourhood. It is 24 m. S. E. of Cardigan, and 220 W. by N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 8,906.

Caernarvonshire, a county of North Wales, of an oblong form, the south part projecting into St. George's Channel, the north being bounded by the Irish sea, or what would now more properly be called Liverpool Bay, from the celebrity of the town of that name: the Menai Strait divides it from the Isle of Anglesea on the north-west, and the river Conway divides it from Denbighshire on the east, whilst part of the south-east side borders on Merionethshire. This county, being the most rugged district of North Wales, may be truly called the Cambrian Alps. Its central part is occupied by the famed Snowden, rising to the height of 3,571 feet above the level of the sea, and the prospects around are rude and savage in the highest degree; but not without a mixture of beauty, when the dimensions of the vales admit the varieties of wood, water, and meadows. The soil in the valleys on the side of St. George's Channel is pretty fertile, especially in barley; great numbers of black cattle, sheep, and goats, are fed on the mountains; and the sea, lakes, and rivers, abound with a variety of fish. Copper mines have been worked in various parts of these mountains, as well as lead; and quantities of stone, excellent for hones, are dug near Snowden; to the dreary region of which the rich vale of Conway below forms a pleasing contrast.

Caernarvon, a borough and seaport of Wales, capital of Caernarvonshire. It is seated within the Menai strait, near its entrance into Caernarvon bay, and carries on a considerable trade with Ireland, and the principal English ports, to which it exports vast quantities of slates. It has a celebrated castle, built by Edward I. in which his son, Edward II. the first prince of Wales, was born. Caernarvon is governed by the constable of the castle, who is always mayor. Here are salt-water baths, and elegant hot and cold baths, which are much frequented during the season. It is 7 m. S. W. of Bangor, and 244 N. W. of London. Long. 4. 20. W. lat. 53. 8. N. Pop. in 1821, 5,788.

Caerphilly, a town of Wales, in Glamorganshire. The ruins of its celebrated castle more resemble that of a city than a single edifice; a circular tower, about 75 feet in height, inclines 11 feet 6 inches from its base. It is seated between the Taaf and Rumney, 7 m. N. of Cardiff, and 160 W. of London. Pop. 899.

Caerwent, a village of Monmouthshire, Eng. 4 m. S. W. of Chepstow, and about 2 m. from the bank of the Severn. It is the Venta Silurum of the Romans, once crowded with palaces and temples; but now the buildings within its ruined walls are only a church and a few scattered houses, the rest of the area being laid out in fields and orchards, where a tesselated pavement, and numerous other antiquities have been discovered. Pop. 394.

Caerwys, a town of Wales, in Flintshire, 5 m

W. of Flint, and 212 N. W. of London. Pop. 952.

Caffa, or Theodosia, the largest town of the Crimea, with an excellent road and harbour. It was taken, in 1266, by the Genoese, who made it one of the most flourishing towns in the east of Europe. It was taken from them by the Venetians, in 1297, but soon recovered; however, in 1474, the Tartars, assisted by the Turks, finally expelled them. It was the last post in the Crimea of which the Genoese retained the sovereignty. Caffa was the Theodosia of the ancients; a name which has been restored to it since the Russians became possessed of the Crimea, in 1770. It contains about 20,000 inhabitants, and is constantly well garrisoned. The trade consists in wax, furs, lambskins, leather, horses, and female slaves; most of the latter are brought from Circassia, and are here sold at from 400 to £800 each, in proportion to their charms. Caffa is seated on a bay of the Black Sea, at the foot of some high mountains, 65 m. E. by N. of Sympheropol, and 130 S. E. of Precop. Long. 35. 20. E. lat. 40. 0. N.

Caffy, Strait of, the ancient Cimmerian Bosphorus, a strait that forms the communication between the Black Sea and the sea of Asoph, and a separation between Europe and Asia.

Caffristin, or Kettore, a mountainous country of Asia, lying between the north-east part of Persia and Tartary. The valleys are inhabited by various independent tribes possessing manners, and speaking a language peculiar to themselves, but of which very little is known.

Caffraria, or Kaffraria, a country on the east coast of South Africa, extending from the latitude of about 30. S. to the Great Fish River, in the latitude of about 34., which divides it from the country of the Hottentots, its western boundaries are not ascertained. The Caffres are tall and well proportioned; and, in general, evince great courage in attacking lions and other beasts of prey. Their skin is a jet black, their teeth white as ivory, and their eyes large. The clothing of both sexes is the same, consisting entirely of the hides of oxen, which are as pliant as cloth. The men wear tails of different animals tied round their thighs; pieces of brass in their hair, and large ivory rings on their arms; they are adorned also with the hair of lions, and feathers fastened on their heads, with many other fantastical ornaments. They are fond of dogs; and have great pride in their cattle, which pay the most perfect obedience to their voice. Their exercise is hunting, fighting, or dancing. They are expert in throwing lances, and, in time of war, use shields made of the hides of oxen. They sometimes make incursions into the English territories of the Cape of Good Hope. The women are employed in the cultivation of their gardens and corn. They raise several vegetables, which are not indigenous to the country, as tobacco, water-melons, kidney beans, and hemp. Their huts are higher and more commodious than those of the Hottentots, and their lands more fertile, but their oxen, and almost all their animals, are much smaller. Industry is the leading trait in the character of the Caffres, who are distinguished from their neighbours to the south by their fondness for agriculture. They have a high opinion of the Supreme Being, and of his power; they believe in a future state of rewards and punishments; but think that the world had no beginning, and will be everlasting. They have no sacred ceremonies, and consequently no priests; but they have a kind of conjurers whom they greatly revere. They are governed by an hereditary king, whose power is very limited; but, being permitted to take as many wives as he pleases, he has a larger portion of lands to cultivate, and a greater number of cattle to tend and feed. The distance of the different hordes makes it necessary that they should have inferior chiefs, who are appointed by the king.

One of the most remarkable animals of this region is the spring-bok, a species of antelope about two feet and a half in height, of a pale yellowish colour, with a stripe of white, bordered by dark brown extending from the tail half way up the back and a similar stripe on each side from the shoulders to the haunches; the belly is of a snow-white. The name of spring-bok was given it by the Dutch settlers of the Cape of Good Hope, from the prodigious leaps which this animal takes when startled. When thus alarmed, it has the power of extending the white space about the tail into the form of a circle, which returns to its linear form when the animal is tranquil. When pursued, it is pleasing and curious to see the whole herd leaping to a considerable height over each other's heads; and they will sometimes take three or four leaps successively. In this situation they seem suspended in the air, looking over their shoulders at their pursuers, and forming the radius of the white part about the tail in a most beautiful manner. They are extremely swift, and it must be a good horse that can overtake them. They migrate annually from the interior of the country in small herds, and continue near the Cape for two or three months, and then retreat towards the north in herds of many thousands, covering the great plains for several hours in their passage.

They are attended in these migrations by numbers of lions, hyenas, and other wild beasts of prey, which commit great devastation among them. They also make periodical migrations in seven or eight years, in herds of many thousands, from the north, being probably compelled to leave their haunts in the Terra de Natal by the excessive drought of that region, where it sometimes happens that not a drop of rain falls for two or three years. In these migrations they spread over the whole country of Caffraria, which they desolate, not leaving a blade of grass. Their flesh is excellent; and, with other antelopes, they furnish the venison of the Cape.

Thompson, in his travels in Southern Africa gives the following account of these animals. "I passed through prodigious flocks of spring boks, spread over the plains as far as the eye could reach: the number it is impossible to estimate with any nicety, but I suppose I saw at least 100,000 in the course of fifty miles. They were migrating from the great desert towards the Colony. The colonists, as I came along, inquired anxiously if I had seen many spring-boks, and were much concerned to hear that they were advancing upon them; for these beautiful creatures, when they spread over the inhabited country in such migrations, are more dreaded than even the devouring locust; they eat up entirely both corn and pasture, and frequently oblige the farmers to fly with their flocks to other districts. The incredible numbers which sometimes pour in from the north, during protracted droughts, distress the farmer inconceivably. Any attempt at numerical computation would be vain; and by trying to come near the truth, the writer would subject himself in the eyes of those who have no knowledge of the country, to a suspicion that he was availing himself of a traveller's assumed privilege. Yet it is well known in the interior, that on their approach the grazier makes up his mind to look for pasturage for his flocks elsewhere, and considers himself entirely dispossessed of his lands until heavy rains fall. Every attempt to save the cultivated fields, if they be not enclosed by high and thick hedges, proves abortive. Heaps of dry manure (the fuel of the Sneeuwbergen and other parts) are placed close to each other round the fields, and set on fire in the evening, so as to cause a dense smoke, by which it is hoped the antelopes will be deterred from their inroads; but the dawn of day exposes the inefficacy of the precaution, by showing the lands, which appeared proud of their promising verdure the evening before, covered with thousands, and reaped level with the ground. Instances have been known of some of these prodigious droves passing through flocks of sheep, and numbers of the latter, carried along with the torrent, being lost to their owner, and becoming a prey to the wild beasts. As long as these droughts last, their inroads and depredations continue; and the havoc committed upon them is of course great, as they constitute the food of all classes; but no sooner do the rains fall, than they disappear, and in a few days become as scarce on the northern borders as in the more protected districts of Bruintjes-Hoogte and Camdeboo."

Cagayan Sooloo, an eastern island lying off the north-east point of Borneo, in the lat. of 7. N. and 118. 36. E. long. It is about 20 m. in circumference, and governed by a Rajah.

Cagayan, a district, the most northern part of Luconia, the chief of the Philippine islands. It is a fertile and populous district, in the lat of 19 N.

Cagayan Isles, a group of small islands in the Mindoro Sea, between Borneo and the Philippines, in the lat of 9. N. and 121. E. long.

Cagliari, a fortified city and seaport of Sardinia, capital of the island, and an archbishop's see, with a university and a castle. Here are numerous churches, besides the cathedral, three of which are collegiate. It stands on the south part of the island, at the bottom of a gulf of its name, which forms a large and secure harbour, and exports considerable quantities of olive-oil and salt. Long. 9. 8. E. lat. 39. 20. N. Pop. about 30,000.

Cagnete, Canete, or Guarco, a town of Peru, capital of a district of the same name, extending about 24 leagues along the seacoast. It is situate near the sea, 80 m. S. E. of Lima. Long. 76. 16. W. lat. 13. 10. S.

Cahawoba, the chief town of Dallas county, Alabama. It is seated at the junction of a river of the same name with the Alabama River, 91½ m. S. W. of Washington, and about 180 north of New Orleans.

Cahir, a town and parish in the south part of the county of Tipperary, Ireland. The town is seated on the west bank of the Suir, about six miles south of Cashel, and 85 S. W. of Dublin, and in 1820 contained a population of 3,288, and the parish 4,310 more.

Cahir, is also the name of a small island off the south-west coast of the county of Mayo, in the lat. of 53. 44. N. and 9. 53. W. Long.

Cahokia, p. v. St. Clair Co. Ill. on the Mississippi.

Cahors, a city of France, capital of the department of Lot, and a bishop's see, with a university. It is seated on a peninsula, made by the river Lot, and built partly on a craggy rock. There are three bridges over the river. The cathedral is a Gothic structure, and has a large square steeple. The town has a manufacture of fine cloths and ratteens, and furnishes excellent wine, of the kind called vin de grave. It was taken by assault, in 1580, by Henry IV. by means of petards, which were first employed here. In one of the suburbs are the remains of a Roman amphitheatre. Cahors is 70 m. N. of Toulouse, and 315 S. by W of Paris.

Caicos, or Caycos, the southernmost of the Bahamas Isles. See Bahamas.

Cai-fong, a city of China, capital of the province of Ho-nan. It is situate on a plain, six miles from the river Hoang-ho, or Great Yellow River about 300 m. above its entrance into the sea, which is higher than the plain, and kept in by raised dikes that extend above 90 m. When the city was besieged by the rebels, in 1642, they cut the dikes of the river, which drowned 300,000 of the inhabitants. Some of the ruins still remain, which shows that its present state is far inferior to its former magnificence. Its jurisdiction comprehends four cities of the second class, and 30 of the third. It is 350 m. S. S. W. of Peking, and about 850 N. by E. of Canton. Long. 114. 28 E. lat. 34. 53. N.

Caifa, or Haifa, a seaport of Syria, in Palestine, defended by a wall and a citadel. It stands on the south side of the bay of Acre, 8 m. S. W. of Acre.

Caiman, or Caymans, three small islands lying to the N. W. of Jamaica, between it and the south coast of Cuba. The north-east point of Grand Caymans is in lat. 19. 12. N. and 81. 26. W. long. The inhabitants of Jamaica come hither to catch tortoises.

Cairngorm, a mountain of Scotland, at the south-west extremity of Banffshire, on the border of Inverness. It rises in a conical form 1,750 feet above the level of a small lake near its base which is the source of the Aven, and 4,050 feet above the level of the sea. Its sides clothed with fir, and its top generally covered with snow. It is famous for beautiful rock-crystals, much esteemed by lapidaries. About 30 m. E. of Fort Augustus.

Cairo, or Grand Cairo, a large city, capital of Egypt. It consists of three towns, about a mile apart; Old Cairo, New Cairo, and the port termed Bulac. The population is estimated at 300,000. Old Cairo is now reduced to a small place. New Cairo is a mile from the river, and seven miles in circumference. The streets are narrow; and the finest houses are built round a court, in which they make the best appearance, having few or no windows next to the street. The castle stands on a steep rock, and is surrounded by thick walls, on which are strong towers. Joseph's Well, made by a vizier of that name, about the year 1100, is the most curious part of the Castle: it is sunk in the rock 990 feet deep and 40 in circumference, with a staircase carried round; and a machine, turned by oxen, raises the water (which comes from the Nile) into a reservoir, whence it is again raised by a similar machine. There are many other reservoirs for water; and numerous bazaars, where each trade has its allotted quarter. There are several public bagnios, very handsome within, and used as places of refreshment and diversion, especially for the women, who go there twice a week: but the wives of great men have baths at home. The women have greater liberty here than in any part of the Turkish empire; and on Friday a mosque without the wall is frequented by them as a pilgrimage of pleasure. The Calish, a canal which conveys the waters of the Nile into the city, is 20 feet broad, and has houses on each side of it. As soon as the water begins to rise, they close the mouth of the canal with earth, and place a mark, to show the time when this and all other canals in the kingdom are to be opened, which is done with great solemnity. There are not less than 300 mosques in Cairo, the lofty minarets of which present a very picturesque appearance. It was a place of very great trade before the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope; and is still the centre of that of Eastern Africa. The chief manufactures are sugar, sal ammoniac, glass lamps, salt-petre, gunpowder, red and yellow leather, and linen made of the fine Egyptian flax. This city was taken by the French, under Bonaparte, in 1798, and retaken by the British in 1801. It stands on the east bank of the Nile, about 120 m. S. E. Alexandria, and about the same distance from each of the two mouths of the river at Rosetta and Damietta. Lat. 30. 2. N. and 31. 20. of E. long.

Cairo, a town of Piedmont, 25 miles, west of Genoa. It was the scene of a sanguinary battle between the French and Austrians in 1794, and in 1796 was taken by the French. Pop. about 4,000.

Cairo, p.t. Green Co. N. Y. 35 m. S. W. Albany. Pop. 2,912. Also 2 towns in Ten. and Ohio.

Cairoan, or Keiroan, an interior town of the kingdom of Tunis, and next to the city of Tunis for trade and number of inhabitants. It is situate near a sandy desert, where are found many vestiges of former magnificence, and on the river Magrida, about 60 m. S. E. of Tunis, and a few miles west of Susa.

Caistor, a town in Lincolnshire, Eng. Near it are the remains of a monastery, and many Roman vestiges. It is 12 m. S. W. of Grimsby, and 156 N. of London. Pop. in 1881, 1,263.

*. There are 2 other towns named Caistor, in the county of Norfolk.

Caithness-shire, a county at the S. E. extremity of Scotland, 35 miles long and 20 broad; bounded on the north by Pentland Frith, which divides it from the Orkneys, east and south-east by the German Ocean, and west by Southerlandshire. The south angle is occupied by mountains; and a vast ridge of hills forms the south-west boundary, ending in a promontory called the Ord of Caithness, which runs out into the sea, in the lat. of 58. 10. N. The rest of the county may be deemed an immense morass, interspersed with some fruitful spots, producing oats and barley, and others affording pasture for sheep and black cattle. Its other chief products are butter, cheese, yarn, skins, feathers and kelp. It sends a member to parliament alternately with Buteshire. English is chiefly spoken on the coast, but in the highlands the Gaelic prevails. Thurso on the north, and Wick on the east coast, are the chief towns.

Cajana, or Kajana, one of the seven principal towns of East Bothnia, whick see.

Cajazzo, a town of Naples, 25 miles north of the city of Naples.

Calabar, Old and New, a territory at the eastern extremity of the coast of Guinea on the west coast of North Africa. Since the restriction of the slave trade to the south of the Equator, this district has carried on a more extensive trade in palm oil and bar wood, and some elephants' teeth, than any other part of the coast. The town of New Calabar is situate at the mouth of a river of the same name, in the lat. of 4. 10. N. and 6. 42. of E. long. Dukes Town, the chief town of Old Calabar, is situate at the mouth of another river of the same name, falling into a bay, about 80 m. E. by N. of New Calabar.

Calabazo, or Calabaco, an interior town of Colombia about 150 miles south of Caracas, containing about 5,000 inhabitants.

Calabria, a promontory and province of Naples, forming the foot and southern extremity of Italy, extending from 37. 53. to 40. 5. of North lat. and being about 40 m. in mean breadth, between the long. of 15. 40. and 17. 30. E. A ridge of mountains, the Apennines, intersects the whole territory from north to south, and numerous streams fall into the sea on both coasts. It gives the title of Duke to the eldest son of the king of Naples. It is divided into two parts; Citra, north, bordering on the Basilicata, contains about 350,000 inhabitants, and Ultra, south, containing about 400,000. This country abounds in excellent fruit, corn, wine, oil, silk, cotton, and wool. In 1783, a great part of Calabria Ultra, as well as of Sicily, was destroyed by one of the most terrible earthquakes on record: besides the destruction of many towns, villages, and farms, above 40,000 people perished by this calamity. The principal towns are Bova, at the south extremity, Reggio, Rosarno, St. Eufemia, Castiglione, and Paula, on the west; and Rossano, Cariato, Catanzaro, and Squillace on the east coast, and in the interior, Cossano, Bisagnano, Cosenza, (the capital) Policastro, Mileto, and Oppido.

Calahorra, an episcopal town of Spain, in Old Castile, on the side of a hill, which extends to the Ebro, 90 m. E. of Burgos. It was the birth-place of Quintilian. Pop. about 4,300.

Calais, a seaport of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, with a citadel. It was taken by Edw. III. of England, in 1347, after a siege of more than 11 months, which has given rise to some historical as well as dramatic fiction. In 1557 it was retaken by the duke of Guise. It was bombarded by the English in 1696, without receiving much injury. The fortifications are good; but its greatest strength is its situation among the marshes, which may be overflowed at the approach of an enemy. In the centre of the town is a spacious square, surrounded by good buildings, and the church is a stately edifice; the harbour, which is formed of two wooden piers run into the sea, only admits small vessels. Calais derives all its importance from its contiguity to the English coast, being only 20 miles from Dover, with which a daily intercourse is maintained; several hundred persons passing to and from it weekly. It is 25 m. W. by S. of Dunkirk, 20 N. by E. of Boulogne, and 145 due north of Paris. Pop. about 8,000.

Calais, p.t. Washington Co. Maine. Pop. 1,686. Also a p.t. in Washington Co. Vermont. Pop. 1,539.

Calais, St. a town of France, in the department of Sarte, 24 m. E. S. E. of Le Mans.

Calamas, a town of Persia, on the coast of Mekran, 60 miles east of Guadal, and 290 west of Tahta, on the western branch of the Indus.

Calamata, a town of Greece, at the head of the gulf of Coron, in the Morea, on the river Spinarza, 36 m. W. S. W. of Misitra.

Calamianes, a cluster of islands, the most westerly of the Philippines, and to the north of Borneo. They are 17 in number, and mountainous, but produce great quantities of wax, honey, and edible birdsnests. The principal island is Paragoa, in the lat. of 12. N. and 120. of E. long.

Calanore, a town of Hindoostan, 70 m. E. of Lahore, distinguished as the place where the emperor Akbar ascended the throne of Indir in 1556.

Calatagirone, a large town in the interior of Sicily, about 50 m. W. by N. of Syracuse; it has manufactures of earthenware. Pop. 15,000.

Calatayud, a city of Spain, in Arragon, with a castle on a rock. It stands at the foot of a hill, on the river Xalon, at the influx of the Xiloca, 42 m. S. W. of Saragossa. It has manufactures of soap. Pop. about 9,000.

Calatanissetta, a town of Sicily, in Val di Noto, 50 m. N. W. of Lentini.

Calatrava, a town of Spain, in New Castile, the chief place of the military order of the knights of Calatrava. It is seated near the Guadiana, 90 m. S. of Madrid. Long. 3. 10. W. lat. 39. 4. N.

Calbe, or Kalbe, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Magdeburg, on the river Saale, 16 m. S. by E. of Magdeburg. Pop. about 3,000.

Calbe, a town of Brandenburg, in the Old Mark, with a castle, 7 m. S. W. of Stendel.

Calberga, a town of Hindoostan, in Golconda, formerly a vast city, and the residence of the sovereigns of the Deccan. It is 85 m. W. of Hyderabad, and 110 E. of Visiapour. Long. 77. 20. E. lat. 17. 25. N.

Calcar, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Cleves; seated near the Rhine, 8 m. S. E. of Cleves.

Calcasieu, a river of Louisiana, which rises 20 m. S. of Natchitoches and flows through a lake of the same name, 30 m. long and 10 wide into the Gulf of Mexico.

Calcinato, a town of Italy, in Bresciano, where a victory was gained over the Austrians by the French, in 1706. It is 8 m. S. E. of Brescia.

Calcutta, the capital of Bengal, and the seat of the governor-general of the British dominions in the East Indies, is situated on the eastern bank of the river Hoogly, (the western arm of the Ganges) about 100 miles from the sea. Its name is derived from Cutta, a temple, dedicated by the Hindoos to Caly, the Goddess of Time, which was situate between the villages of Chuttanuttu and Gobindpore, where the agents of the English East India Company, in 1690, obtained permission of Aurungzebe to establish a trading factory, which, in 1696, in consequence of the disturbed state of the province of Bengal, they were allowed to fortify. In 1698, Prince Azeen Ooshan, grandson of Aurungzebe, granted a lease to the agents of the English Company, of the villages above mentioned in perpetuity, upon which, they strengthened the fortification, and gave it the name of Fort William, in compliment to the English monarch of that time. From this period Calcutta gradually increased in population and importance up to 1756, when it was attacked by the soubah of Bengal, with an army of 70,000 horse and foot, and 400 elephants, when the besieged were forced to abandon their posts, and retreat into the fort; on which the enemy's troops entered the town, and plundered it for 24 hours. An order was then given for attacking the fort; the garrison of which defended themselves bravely for some time; but many of them being killed and wounded, and their ammunition almost exhausted they were at last obliged to surrender and were all, to the number of 149, crammed into the Black Hole prison, a dungeon about 18 feet square, from whence only 23 came out alive in the morning. The rest were all suffocated from want of air. Calcutta, however, was retaken the next year; and, after the victory of Plassey, the inhuman soubah was deposed, and put to death by his successor, and the whole of the province of Bengal transferred to the English East India Company. Immediately after this victory, the erection of a new fort, about a mile below the old one, was commenced, which is superior in extent and security to any fortress in India, containing commodious accommodation for 4,000 men. From this period Calcutta rapidly increased in extent and population. In 1798 the number of houses was 78,760, exclusive of the forts, since which time they have increased more than one half. The number of inhabitants, composed of people from all parts of the world, amounting to 600,000 or 700,000. The part inhabited by the English is elegantly built; but the greatest part is built after the general fashion of the cities of India. Their streets are exceedingly confined, narrow, and crooked, with a vast number of ponds, reservoirs, and gardens, interspersed. A few of them are paved with brick. The houses are built, some with brick, others with mud, and a still greater number with bamboos and mats; all which different kinds of fabrics, intermixed, form a very uncouth appearance, and are very readily destroyed by fire. The brick houses are seldom above two stories high, with flat and terraced roofs; those of mud and bamboos are only one story, and are covered with thatch. During the administration of the Marquis Wellesley, at the commencement of the present century, a magnificent palace was erected at the distance of about a mile from the fort. The line of houses that surround two sides of the esplanade of the fort is also magnificent; they are all on a large scale, and detached from one another. From the necessity of having a free circulation of air in a climate so extremely hot, the approach to the houses is generally by a flight of steps, with great projecting porticoes, or surrounded by colonnades and arcades, which give them much the appearance of Grecian temples. Since the commencement of the present century, Calcutta has been greatly improved, both in appearance and in the salubrity of its air; the streets have been properly drained, and the ponds filled; thereby removing a vast surface of stagnant water, the exhalations of which were particularly hurtful. Contiguous to the old fort is a spacious square, on one side of which is the college, founded also under the administration of the Marquis Wellesley in 1801; another side of the square is occupied by buildings appropriated to the use of the junior servants of the company, and the remainder is occupied by some of the principal traders. Calcutta is the residence of a bishop, who, assisted by three archdeacons, is intrusted with the ecclesiastical affairs of all the British possessions in Asia; the cathedral is a spacious edifice. Here is likewise a supreme court of judicature, in which justice is dispensed according to the laws of England, by a chief justice and three puisne judges. The natives of the province still retain their Hindoo laws, as well as religion, and courts are duly appointed for the administration of justice accordingly. The southern part of Calcutta is occupied almost entirely by Europeans, who have adopted a style of building at once magnificent in its appearance and well adapted to the climate. Every house is detached, inclosed with walls and fronted with an elegant veranda shading a flight of steps. The northern part is chiefly inhabited by natives, whose dwellings are for the most part mere mud or bamboo cottages. The mixture of European and Asiatic manners, that may be observed in Calcutta, is curious: coaches, phaetons, single-horse chaises, with the palanquins and hackeries of the natives, the passing ceremonies of the Hindoos, and the different appearance of the fakirs, form a sight more novel and extraordinary, perhaps, than any other city in the world can present. The Hoogly is navigable up to the town for ships of 400 to 500 tons, but those of greater burden lie at Diamond Point, about 50 miles below, their cargoes being conveyed to and from the town by lighters. Independently of its commercial intercourse with England, Calcutta maintains an extensive intercourse with China as well as with almost every port in Asia, and islands in the eastern seas, with which an interchange is effected in every possible commodity that mankind can desire, either for subsistence and comfort, or to gratify the most refined and luxurious taste. Ship-building is also carried on to a great extent; there are several banking establishments to facilitate the operations of commerce, and insurance establishments for its protection. The control of the governor-general and council of Bengal, at Calcutta, extends over the presidencies of Madras, Bombay, and Bencoolen; the extent of the civil establishments attending the administration of so extensive an empire, in addition to the military and commercial affairs of the place, necessarily give an importance to Calcutta beyond that of any city in Asia, except those of China and Japan. The new fort is in the lat. of 22. 35. N., and 88. 28. E. long., 1,030 m. N. N. E. of Madras, and about 1,100 E. N. E. of Bombay.

Caldas, the name of several small towns in different parts of Spain and Portugal, which, like the Badens of Germany, implies their contiguity to hot or medicinal springs: one 25 m. N. by E. of Lisbon, another 10 m. N. E. of Castel Branco; another contiguous to Montalegre, 60 m. N. E. of Oporto; another 15 m. N. of Barcelona; another 25 m. N. of Vigo.

Caldecot, a village in Monmouthshire, Eng. seated in a plain, five miles S. W. of Chepstow and noted for the massy remains of its castle. There are six other villages of the same name in different parts of England.

Calder, a river of England which rises on the west border of Yorkshire, flows by Halifax to Wakefield, and eight miles below joins the Aire. It is navigable the greater part of its course. There are three or four rivers, and as many villages, named Calder, in different parts of Scotland.

Caldolzburg, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Anspach, with a castle, 18 m. N. E. of Anspach. It is now included in the Bavarian circle of Rezat.

Caldwell, p.t. Warren Co. N. Y. on Lake George, 56 m. N. Albany. Pop. 797. Also a town in Essex Co. N. J.

Caldwell, an interior county in the western part of Kentucky, bounded on the south-west by the great Cumberland River. Pop. 8,332. Eddyville, on the north bank of the river, about 30 miles above its entrance into the Ohio, and 200 S. W. of Frankfort, is the chief town.

Caledon, a town in the parish of Aughloe, (sometimes called Caledon,) south part of the county of Tyrone, Ireland. Pop. of the town in 1821, 856, and of the parish 7,148.

Caledonia, a county in the north part of Vermont, the south-east part of which is bounded by the Connecticut River, which divides it from New Hampshire. Pop. 20,967. Danville, in the centre of the county, about 20 m. N. E. of Montpelier, is the chief town.

Caledonia, a township of Livingston county, N. York, lying to the west of Genesee river, and south of Erie canal, 245 m. W. of Albany. Big Spring, remarkable for the abundance of its water, is in this township. Pop. 1,618.

Caledonia, New, an island in the Pacific Ocean, to the east of New Holland, discovered by Cook, in 1774. It is 260 miles from north-west to south-east, and 70 broad. The inhabitants are strong, active, and well made; their hair is black and much frizzled, but not woolly; their beards are crisp and thick; they besmear their faces with black pigment, and their only covering is a wrapper made from the bark of a tree, or of leaves. Their houses are circular, like a bee-hive; formed of small spars and reeds, covered with long coarse grass, and the floor laid with dry grass. They deposit their dead in the ground, and decorate the grave of their chiefs with spears, darts, paddles, &c. They are of a pacific disposition, and their women chaster than those of the more eastern islands. They cultivate the soil with some art and industry, but subsist chiefly on roots and fish. Plantains and sugar-canes are not plentiful; bread-fruit is scarce, and cocoa-nut trees are but thinly planted; but yams and taros are in great abundance. The cape at the south end, called Queen Charlotte Foreland, is in long. 167. 12. E. lat. 22. 15. S.

Calenberg, a principality of Lower Saxony, which constitutes a part of the duchy of Brunswick. It is divided into two parts by the principality of Wolfenbützel. The south part is intersected from east to west by the Werra, and the chief town is Gottingen. The Lena has its source in this part, near the banks of the Werra, and runs north through the principality of Wolf-enbattel, then dividing the Bishopric of Hildesheim from North Calenberg on the east, and afterwards intersects the north part of North Calenberg. The Weser also intersects the south part of N. Calenberg from south-east to north-west, the chief towns being Hanover, Neustadt, and Hameln. The aggregate extent of the surface may be estimated at about 1,700 square miles, and the population at 220,000. The soil is generally fertile, and under social and reciprocal arrangements, Calenberg might be made to yield a surplus produce sufficient to command an abundance of tropical and other luxuries, the consumption of which has hitherto been very limited.

Calhuco, a town at the south extremity of Araucan, opposite the north end of the Isle of Chiloe, in the South Pacific Ocean, inhabited by Spaniards, Mestozos, and Indians, 180 m. S. of Valdivia. Long. 73. 37. W. lat. 41. 40. S.

Cali, a city of Colombia, in the valley of Popayan, on the west bank of the river Cauca. The governor of the province generally resides here. It is 90 m. E. of Bonaventura, and 200 W. by S. of St. Fe. Long. 77. 5. W. lat. 3. 15. N.

Calicut, a city of Hindoostan, capital of a province of the same name, on the coast of Malabar. It was the first Indian port visited by European shipping; being discovered by the Portuguese, in 1498. Here is a manufacture of plain cotton goods; and much salt is made by the natural evaporation of the sea water. The principal exports are cocoa and betel nuts, black pepper, ginger, and turmeric. It is seated at the mouth of a river, 110 m. S. W. of Seringapatam, and 130 S. E. of Mangalore. Long. 75. 52. E. lat. 11. 12. N. It was formerly much more considerable, having been much encroached upon by the sea.

California, a promontory, in the Pacific Ocean, separated from the west coast of North America by the Vermilion sea, or Gulf of California; extending N. W. from Cape St. Lucas, in the lat. of 22. 44. to lat. 33. N. being about 50 miles in average breadth. It was discovered by Cortez, in 1536; and is said to have been visited by Sir Francis Drake, in 1578. Toward the close of the seventeenth century, the Jesuits formed several settlements here, and endeavoured to govern the natives with the same policy and authority that they exercised in their missions in Paraguay. They seem studiously to have depreciated the climate and soil of the country; but on their expulsion from the Spanish dominions, the court appointed Don Joseph Galvez to visit this peninsula. His account of the country was favourable; he found the pearl fishery on its coast to be valuable, and he discovered mines of gold of a very promising appearance. Divers nations or tribes inhabit the country, without acknowledging any chief. Each father is a prince over his own family; but his power ceases when the children are able to provide for themselves. Each tribe, nevertheless, has persons appointed, who call assemblies to divide the productions of the earth, regulate the fisheries, and march at their head when engaged in war. Want of provision obliges them often to change their abodes; and in severe winters they retire into caves. A girdle and piece of linen round the body, some ornaments for the head, and a chain of pearls, serve them for dress and finery. Those who live toward the north, where they have no pearls, dress their heads with shells. The women commonly wear a kind of long robe, made of leaves of palms; though some wear nothing but a girdle. A range of mountains runs parallel with the coast, its whole extent rising in some places to the height of about 4,700 feet. The soil in many places is excellent; and it is reported that vines grow naturally in the mountains, and that the Jesuits, when they resided here, made abundance of wine, in taste approaching to that of Maderia. The chief town is St. Joseph, about 25 m. N. E. of Cape St. Lucas. The population of the whole territory is supposed not to exceed 10,000.

California, New, is an extension of territory along the coast, north of the promontory of California to the lat. of about 40. N. comprising the greater part of the coast formerly called New Albion. The same mountain ridge which intersects the promontory continues to run north, parallel with the coast, at a distance of thirty to fifty miles. The Jesuits, who extended themselves in this direction, found the soil somewhat more congenial for the general purposes of culture, and founded about twenty settlements upon and between the coast and the mountain ridge, each settlement dedicated to some saint of their holy order. The four principal settlements on the coast are St. Diego, in the lat. of 32. 42.; La Purissima, in 34. 32.; St. Carlos de Monterey, in 36. 36.; and St. Francisco, in 37. 48. N. The total population of this district is estimated at about 16,000.

Calix, a town of Sweden, in West Bothnia, on a river of the same name, near its entrance into the gulf of Bothnia, 22 m. W. of Tornea.

Callah, a town of Algiers, in the province of Mascara, which has a considerable trade, and the greatest market for carpets in the country. It is 40 m. E. of Oran.

Callan, a town of Ireland, in the county of Kilkenny, on the frontier of Tipperary, 7 m. S. W. of the city of Kilkenny, and 65 from Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 5,678.

Callander, a town of Scotland, in Perthshire with a considerable manufacture of mullin; seated on the river Teath, 30 m. W. S. W. of Perth. Pop. 2,030.

Callao, a seaport of Peru, with the best harbour on the coast, and a large and safe roadstead defended by the islands of Callao and St. Lawrence. In the port every commodity is to be procured that vessels may be in need of. The town was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake, in 1746. It is seated on a river of the same name, 5 m. W. of Lima, of which it is the port. Long. 76. 58. W. lat. 12. 2. S.

Callaway, a county of Kentucky. Pop. 5,159. Wadesborough in the chief town.

Calte, a town of Algiers, in the province of Constantina, where the French have a factory established for a coral fishery, and trade for grain, wool, leather, and wax. It stands on a rock, almost surrounded by the sea, 36 m. E. of Bona.

Callinger, a fortified town of Hindoostan, in the province of Allahabad, formerly capital of Bundelcund. It was ceded by the Mahrattas to the English in 1793. It is 20 m. N. of the Diamond Mines of Punnah, and 150 W. by S. of Benares.

Callington, a borough in Cornwall, Eng. with a manufacture of cloth; situate on the Lynher, 12 m. S. of Launceston, and 216 W. by S. of London. It returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 1,321.

Calloma, or Caillomo, a town of Peru, celebrated for its silver mines, 50 m. N. by E. of Arequipa, and 170 S. of Cuzco.

Calmar, a strong seaport of Sweden, capital of Smaland, and a bishop's see. It is celebrated as the place where the deputies of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, were appointed to assemble for the election of a king, according to the Union of Calmar. On an eminence, half a mile from the town, is the ancient castle, now converted into a distillery. The chief exports are deals and tar. It is seated near the Baltic, 190 m. S. S. W. of Stockholm. Long. 16. 22. E. lat. 56. 41. N.

Calmina, or Calimno, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, near the coast of Asia, 7 m. N. W. of Stanchio. Long. 26. 46. E. lat. 36. 56. N.

Caln, East and West, townships in Chester Co. Pa.

Calne, a borough in Wiltshire, Eng. It has eight or ten extensive manufactories of woolen cloth, and in the vicinity are many fulling and corn mills. It is seated on a river of the same name, 25 m. E. of Bristol, and 83 W. of London. It returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 4,612.

Calutara, a town on the west coast of Ceylon, with a fort. A great quantity of arrack is made here, and other manufactories carried on. It stands at the mouth of a large branch of the Mulivaddy, 23 m. S. by E. of Colombo. Long. 79. 56. E. lat. 6. 44. N.

Calvados, a maritime department of France, including part of the late province of Normandy, bounded north by the English channel. It is so called from a ridge of rocks of the same name, near the coast of what was heretofore called Normandy, extending twelve miles in length. It contains an area of about 2,200 square miles, and upwards of 500,000 inhabitants. It is intersected from the south to the sea by the river Orne. It is a fertile province, and exports a considerable quantity of clover seed. Caen, on the banks of the Orne is the chief town.

Calvert, a county of Maryland, lying between the Patuxent River and Chesapeake Bay. Pop. 8,899. Prince Frederick, 40 m. S. of Annapolis and St. Leonard's, in the south part of the county, on the shore of the Chesapeake, 71 m. S. of Annapolis, are the chief towns.

Calvi, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, eight miles north of Capua.

Calvi, a town of Corsica, on a craggy mountain and gulf of the same name, with a strong fortress and a good harbour. It was taken by the English in 1794. It is 38 m. W. S. W. of Bastia.

Calvisano, a town of Bresciano, 12 m. S. by E. of Brescia. Pop. about 3,000.

Calw, a town of Suabia, in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, with a porcelain manufacture, and a great trade in stuffs. It is 20 m. W. by S. of Stuttgart. Pop. 3,500.

Cam, a river which rises in Hertfordshire, Eng. flows by Cambridge into the isle of Ely, and there joins the Ouse, to which river it is navigable from Cambridge.

Camana, a town of Peru, capital of a jurisdiction; situate on a river of the same name near the Pacific Ocean. 70 m. W. of Arequipa, in lat. 16. 10. N. and 73. 15. W. long.

Camaran, an island of Arabia on the Red Sea, where there is a fishery for white coral and pearl oysters. Long. 42. 22. E. lat. 15. 6. N.

Camaret, a town of France, in the department of Finisterre. In an expedition against Brest, in 1694, the English landed here, and lost a great number of men. It stands on a bay of the same name, 8 m. S. of Brest.

Camarines, the most southern province of the isle of Luzon, of which Caceres is the chief town.

Camargue, an island, or cluster of islands, of France, in the mouths of the Rhone, separated by canals and fortified. The whole contains 80 square miles; the land is fertile, but the air is unwholesome.

Cambat, the southernmost province of Abyssinia, inhabited by a people called Seb-adja, who are a mixture of Pagans, Christians, and Mahometans. It is abundant in fruits.

Cambay, a considerable city of Hindoostan, in the province of Guzerat. It stands on a gulf of the same name, and was the Camanes of Ptolemy. Here are three bazars, and four public cis terns, capable of supplying the whole town with water in times of the greatest drought. Its products and manufactures are considerable; for the country abounds in corn, cattle, and silk: and cornelian and agate stones are found in its rivers. The inhabitants are noted for embroidery. It is 100 m. N. of Surat, and 50 m. S. of Amadabad, of which it is the port. It belongs to the English, and is included in the presidency of Bombay. Long. 72. 34. E. lat. 22. 17. N.

Camberg, a town of Germany, on the south-west frontier of the electorate of Hesse, situate on a hill, 17 m. E. by S. of Nassau, and 20 N. W. of Frankfort on the Maine.

Camberwell, a parish in Surrey, contiguous to London, on the south side; and to which it forms an appendage, being occupied principally by the private residences of the merchants, shopkeepers, and clerks employed in the several public establishments of the Bank, East India House, customs, &c. &c. The number of inhabitants in 1821 was 17,876; since when they have considerably increased. The old church is 2 1-2 m. S. of London Bridge: an additional church, after the model of one in Rome, was erected in 1825.

Cambodia, Camboja, or Camboja, a kingdom or territory of Asia, extending from Cape Cambodia, in the China sea, south, in the lat. of 8. 40. to Laotchua or Laos, in the lat. of about 17. N.; bounded on the east, at the south end, by Tsionpa, and further north by the country of the Ke moys, which divides it from Cochinchina, and on the west from the 8th to the 14th degree of latitude by the Gulf of Siam, and further north by the territory of Siam; being of an average breadth of about three degrees of longitude between 101. and 106. E. comprising an aggregate extent of surface of about 100,000 square miles. As far as any knowledge of this country has been obtained, it appears to be exceedingly rich, alike in vegetable, animal, and mineral productions; whilst the unsocial habits of the people, who appear to be a mixture of Japanese, Cochinchinese, Malays, and natives of the Eastern islands preclude nearly all intercourse with Europeans. In the 17th century, the Portuguese, Dutch, and English, each unsuccessfully endeavoured to establish an intercourse in this country, and all succeeding attempts, except to a trifling extent surreptitiously, appear to have met with disadvantageous results. It is intersected by a noble river of the same name, which rises in Chinese Tartary, runs through Thibet and the west side of Yunnan, the south-west province of China, and Laos, and through the Cambodian territory in a south-east direction, falling into the China Sea, by several channels, between the latitudes of 9. and 11. N. In Thibet, this river is called the Matchou, in China the Kiou Long, and through the Laos the May Kung, and the eastern channel into the sea is sometimes called the Japanese. The chief town of the country, called also Cambodia, is situate on the western bank of the river, about 240 miles above its entrance into the sea. Cambodia appears to be thinly peopled, but of the number of its inhabitants no estimate has been formed. They appear to manufacture both silk and cotton, and the country producing every possible article necessary for subsistence and comfort, and also to gratify the most luxuriant sense, either of taste, smell, or ornament, there is but little inducement on the part of the Cambodians to cultivate an intercourse with Europeans, more especially on the overbearing, higgling, and selfish principle which they seem to have exercised over all Asia. As far as the Cambodians maintain an external commerce, sandal wood, elephants' teeth of the finest quality, camphor, and the gum called cambogia, or gamboge, from the name of the country, constitute the chief articles of export. (See Siam.)

Cambray, a fortified city of France, capital of the department of Nord. The linen manufacture is extensively carried on in this district, and the term cambric was derived from the finer qualities of linen, which were distributed from this city. It has since been applied by the English to the fine fabric of cotton as well as of linen. Cambray has also some manufactures of lace and leather. It is seated near the source of the Scheldt, which runs through the city, 18 m. S. by W. of Valenciennes, 35 S. by E. of Lille, and 102 N. N. E. of Paris. The fortification was one of those retained by the allies for five years after the peace of 1815.

Cambria, a county in the W. District of Pennsylvania, lying west of the main ridge of the Alleghany mountains. The south-west branch of the Susquehannah River rises in this county, and a branch of the Alleghany intersects its south part. It is about 33 miles in length from north to south, and 18 in breadth. Pop. 7,079. Ebensburg, in the centre of the county, 143 m. W. by N. of Harrisburg, is the chief town.

Cambria, p.t. Niagara Co. New York, near the great falls of Niagara, 290 m. W. Albany. Pop. 1,712.

Cambridge, an interior county towards the S. E. part of England, being about 50 miles in extent from north to south, and 20 to 25 from west to east. It is bounded on the south by a range of hills which divide it from the counties of Bedford and Essex, having the counties of Suffolk and Norfolk on the east, and Bedford, Huntingdon, Northampton, and Lincoln on the west, the northern extremity jutting upon the Boston Wash. The river Ouse intersects it from west to east, whilst the Nen forms the boundary between the counties of Northampton and Lincoln, and the Cam, which rises at the foot of the hills, which form the southern boundary, falls into the Ouse, about the middle of the county. After descending the hills from the south, the country is one entire level, and that part was formerly little better than a swamp, which, by well-directed efforts in draining and embanking, since the middle of the last century, has been converted into rich and verdant pastures, which yield a vast surplus of butter, and cream-cheese, for the London market. It has no surplus of manufactures of any kind, but in addition to its butter, it yields a surplus of calves, cattle, sheep, and wool, and large quantities of wild fowl. Its supply however of foreign and manufactured productions is obtained in exchange for the expenditure of the students at the university of the town of Cambridge, and rents abstracted from different parts of the country, on account of the endowments of the several colleges. The only other place in the county deserving of notice, besides the town of Cambridge, is the city of Ely. (See Bedford Level.)

Cambridge, the chief town of the preceding county, and seat of one of the two universities of England, is situate in the south part of the county, 17 m. south of Ely, 23 east of Bedford, and 28 west of Bury, and 51 north by east of London. It is a corporate town, governed by a mayor and 13 aldermen; but its importance is derived from its university, which dates its foundation by Sigebert, king of the East Angles, in 630. It acquired, however, but little celebrity until after the period of the collisions between the barons and the court had subsided, in the 13th century, from which period, to the close of the 16th century, 12 colleges and 4 halls were founded, by the names, and in the order of date as follows, viz.:

COLLEGES.

1 St. Peter's in	1257	7 St. John's in	1509
2 Gonville,	1348	8 Magdalen,	1519
3 Corpus Christi,	1350	9 Trinity,	1546
4 King's,	1441	10 Jesus',	1570
5 Queen's,	1448	11 Emanuel,	1584
6 Christ's,	1505	12 Syd. Sussex,	1598

HALLS.

1 Clare,	1326	3 Trinity,	1350
2 Pembroke,	1343	4 Catherine,	1475

These institutions, founded in ages of monastic influence, and when architecture was the ruling passion of those who possessed the means of indulging either in acts of benevolence or vanity, claim the attention of the present age, some for their monastic features, some for the history of their foundations, and others for their architectural beauty. Most of them have chapels and libraries attached, some of them extensive and valuable, and the chapel of King's College is justly esteemed, as the most beautiful Gothic edifice in the world. It is 304 feet in length, 71 broad, and 91 in height; the effect of its proportions, and beauty of its decorations, must be seen to be understood. In 1807 another college was founded, pursuant to the will of a Sir George Downing, whose name it bears; and, in 1810, viscount Fitzwilliam bequeathed a very extensive and valuable cabinet of works of nature and art, and ample funds for the foundation of an observatory and a building for the reception of his collection, for the use of the university at large. This munificent donation excited a general spirit of improvement, both in the town and university several of the colleges have been enlarged, repaired, and beautified, several old buildings in the town taken down; judicious sites for the new buildings selected, and those edifices more particularly deserving of attention for their architecture, laid more open to the view. In addition to the libraries attached to the several colleges and halls, there is also one common to the university; a senate house, and schools for public examinations, which, together with 14 parish churches, a county hospital, and other public buildings for county purposes, afford a very interesting extent of varied architectural display. There are also six bridges of stone, over the river Cam, which, in addition to their convenience, add considerably to the general picturesque effect. The county, town, and university, each sends two members to parliament. About two miles from the town, one of the largest fairs in England is held, for a fortnight, commencing on the 7th of September. The population in 1801 was 10,087, and in 1821, 14,142, of whom about 1,000 may be considered members of the university.

Cambridge, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. This town is separated from Boston by the wide bay which nearly surrounds the city. Two long bridges open a communication between them. The town properly consists of three divisions, viz. 1. East Cambridge, or Lechmere Point, which is a suburb of Boston and connected with the city by Craigie's bridge. This is a flourishing place, and has many manufactories of glass, iron &c. 2. Cambridge-port, which communicates with the city by West Boston bridge, and 3. Old Cambridge, 3 miles from Boston, containing Harvard University, the oldest and richest literary institution in the United States. It was founded in 1638. The officers are a president and 23 professors and tutors. The libraries contain 40,000 volumes, and the philosophical apparatus, cabinets and similar materials for scientific purposes are of the first excellence. The Botanical Garden and greenhouse, are handsomely arranged and furnished with the choicest plants. The college buildings are 8; one of these is elegantly built of granite; the others are brick. They are beautifully situated upon a spacious level common. The number of students is 236. There are 3 vacations in April, August and December, of 10 weeks. Commencement is in August.

A short distance west of the colleges is the spot occupied by Washington as his head quarters during the siege of Boston, in 1775 and 6. Many parts of the town exhibit the remains of the fortifications thrown up by the Americans at that period. In the western part of the town and bordering upon Watertown, is Mount Auburn, a spot lately chosen for the establishment of a Cemetery and Horticultural Garden. This place is charmingly variegated with hills and dells, woods and lawns, and when the design is fully completed will be among the most interesting objects in the country.

In the same neighbourhood is Fresh Pond, a small sheet of water skirted by steep and woody hills in a highly picturesque manner. This is a favourite resort of the people of Boston in the summer. Pop. of Cambridge, 6,071.

Cambridge, West, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. adjoining the preceding town. Pop. 1,230.

Cambridge, p.t. Franklin Co. Vt. Pop. 1,613.

Cambridge, an unsettled township in Coos Co. N. H.

Cambridge, p.t. Washington Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,319. Also towns in Maryland, S. C., and Ohio.

Cambrilla, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, surrounded by a wall, and seated near the sea, 14 m. W. by S. of Tarragona.

Camberg, a town of Thuringia, on the east bank of the Saal, 18 m. N. by E. of Jena, and 32 S. W. of Leipzig.

Cambyne, an island lying between the S. E. promontory of Celebes, and the Isle of Bouton. It is about 60 miles in circumference.

Camden, a county in the N. E. part of North Carolina, about 25 m. from N. to S. and four in breadth; the north and borders on Virginia, and forms part of the Great Dismal Swamp, and the south end jets upon Albermarle Sound, between Pasquetank and George Rivers. Pop. 6,721. New Lebanon is the chief town.

Camden, a maritime county of the state of Georgia, bounded on the south by St. Mary's River, which divides it from East Florida. It is about 20 miles in extent each way, bounded on the west by the Great Swamp of Oke-fir-o-caw. The Santilla River intersects it from the N. W. corner, running to the centre of the county, falling into the sea, at the N. E. corner. It is very productive in rice and cotton. Pop. 4,578. Jefferson, is the chief town.

Camden, p.t. Waldo Co. Me. Pop. 2,200.

Camden, p.t. Oneida Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,945.

Camden, p.t. Gloucester Co. N. J. opposite Philad. Also a town in Kent Co. Del.

Camden, p.t. Kershaw District. S. C. on the Wateree, 35 m. N. E. Columbia. It is the seat of justice for the district. Here the Americans, under Gen. Gates, were defeated by Lord Cornwallis in 1780, and another battle fought between Gen. Greene and Lord Rawdon in 1781.

Camel, a river in Cornwall, Eng. which rises two miles north of Camelford, flows south almost to Bodmin, and then north-west to Padstow, where it enters the Bristol channel. Its banks were the scenes of some bloody battles between the Britons and Saxons.

Camelford, a borough in Cornwall, Eng. A great quantity of yarn is spun in this place and its neighbourhood. It is seated on the Camel, 14 m. W. of Launceston, and 22 W. by S. of London. It returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 1,256.

Camerino, a town of Italy, in the marquise of Ancona, and an archbishop's see. It is seated on a mountain, near the river Chiento, 37 m. S. W. of Ancona.

Cameron, p.t. Steuben Co. N. Y. Pop. 924.

Camillus, p.t. Onondaga Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,518.

Camin, a seaport of Further Pomerania, and once a bishop's see, which was secularized at the peace of Westphalia; but it still has a fine cathedral and a chapter. Its navigation and commerce were formerly extensive, but it is now of little note. It stands on the Diwenow, or east mouth of the Oder, opposite the isle of Wollin, 25 m. N. of Stettin. Long. 14. 52. E. lat. 53. 54. N.

Caminha, a town of Portugal, in Entre Douro e Minho, with a fort; seated at the mouth of the Minho, 12 m. N. of Viana.

Camolin, a village in the county of Wexford, Ireland, on the north bank of the Bann, 4 m. S. W. of Gorey. Pop. in 1820, 377. It was possessed by the insurgents in 1798.

Camorta, one of the Nicobar isles off the west coast of Malaya, in the lat. of 8. N.

Campagna, or Campania, a town of Naples, in Principato Citeriore, 40 m. S. E. of Naples.

Campagna di Roma, or Territory of Rome, the most south-west province of the ecclesiastical states of Rome, extending from the river Tiber, for about 65 miles along the shore of the Mediterranean to the Neapolitan province of Lavoro, being about 50 miles wide, bounded on the east by Abruzzo. This extensive district, lying between the 41st and 42d degree of north latitude, was the ancient Latium, and was once the most populous and fertile district in the world, but now presents one general scene of desolation. The Pontine marshes, which are constantly emitting the most noisome vapours, comprise a great portion of the south-east part of the province; besides the city of Rome on the banks of the Tiber, at the northern extremity of the province, Albano, Velletri and Piperno, all on the western side, still exhibit marks of former greatness, whilst the ruins of temples, baths, and other stately edifices, are seen scattered in all directions. (See Rome.)

Campbell, a county in the E. District of Virginia, being nearly a square, about 14 miles each way, bounded on the south by the Roanoke River, and north by James River. It is a fertile district. Pop. 15,704. Lynchburg is the chief town.

Campbell, a county of Georgia. Pop. 3,323. Campbellton is the capital.

Campbell, a county of East Tennessee, bounded on the north by Harlan county, Kentucky; intersected by the Cumberland ridge of the Alleghany mountains, and from the north-east to the south by Powell's River, a branch of the Tennessee. It contains an area of about 230 square miles, and a population of 5,110. Jacksonborough is the chief town.

Campbell, a county of Kentucky, containing about 90 square miles, bounded on the north by Boone county, and on the east and north by the Ohio River, and intersected from south to north by the Licking. Pop. 9,893. Newport, on the east bank of the Licking, at its entrance into the Ohio, opposite to Cincinnati, 96 m. N. N. E. of Frankfort, is the chief town.

Campbellsville, p.v. Green Co. Ken. on a branch of Green River.

Campbelltown, 3 villages in Steuben Co. N. Y., Lebanon Co. Pa. and Edgefield Dis. S. C.

Campbeltown, a borough and seaport of Scotland, in Argyleshire, situate on a bay, toward the south extremity of the peninsula of Cantyre. It has a considerable trade in the distillation of whiskey, besides being the general rendezvous of the fishing vessels that annually visit the western coast. It is 65 m. S. S. W. of Inverary. Long. 5. 32. W. lat. 55. 28. N. Pop. in 1821, 6,445.

Campden, a corporate town in Gloucestershire, Eng. 22 m. N. E. of Gloucester, and 90 W. N. W. of London. Pop. 1,249.

Campeachy, a town of Yucatan, on the west coast of the bay of Campeachy, in the Gulf of Mexico, defended by strong forts. The port is large but shallow, and has a good dock. It is noted for logwood, which, however, does not grow very near it. It was taken by the English in 1659, by the buccaneers in 1678; and by the freebooters of St. Domingo, in 1685, who burnt it, and blew up the citadel. Long. 91. 30. W. lat. 19. 35. N.

Campen, a town of Holland, in Overijssel, with a citadel, and a port almost choked up. It is seated near the mouth of the Yssel, on the Zuyder Zee, 8 m. W. N. W. of Zwoll. Pop. about 6,000.

Camperdown, a seaport of Holland, about 25 miles south of Texel Island, famous for the signal victory obtained by admiral lord viscount Duncan, off its coast, over the Dutch fleet, on the 11th October, 1797.

Campo Basso, a town of Naples, in the Molise. In 1805, it suffered greatly by an earthquake, and most of the inhabitants were destroyed. It has a considerable trade in articles of cutlery, and is 12 m. S. of Molise. Pop. about 6,000.

Campo Formio, a village of Italy, in Friuli, with an elegant castle, where a treaty of peace was concluded between the Austrians and French, in 1797. It is 2 m. S. W. of Udina.

Campo Mayor, a fortified town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, on the frontier of Spain, 14 m. N. by E. of Elvas. Pop. about 5,000.

Campo St. Pietro, a town and castle of Italy, in the Paduano, on the river Menon, 12 m. N. of Padua, and about the same distance N. W. of Venice. Pop. about 3,000.

Campoli, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Ulteriore, 23 m. N. by E. of Aquila.

Campredon, a town of Spain in Catalonia, at the foot of the Pyrenees, and on the river Ter, 45 m. N. of Barcelona.

Campsie, a village of Scotland, on the south confines of Stirlingshire, 9 miles north of Glasgow. It has some extensive printfields, and other manufactures.

Campton, p.t. Grafton Co. N. H. 75 m. fr. Portsmouth. Pop. 1,313.

Canaan, p.t. Somerset Co. Me. Pop. 1,076.

Canaan, p.t. Essex Co. Vt. Pop. 373.

Canaan, p.t. Grafton Co. N. H. 103 m. fr. Portsmouth. Pop. 1,428.

Canaan, p.t. Litchfield Co. Conn. on the Housatonic. Pop. 2,301. This town has some iron manufactures; and near it is a fall upon the river.

Canaan, p.t. Columbia county, New York, on the east side of Hudson River, 25 m. W. by S. of Albany. Pop. 2,064.

Canaan. See Syria.

Canaan, New, p.t. Fairfield Co. Conn. near the shore of L. I. Sound. Pop. 1,826. There are 3 townships called Canaan in Pa. and Ohio.

Canada, a vast territory of North America, lying between the 42d and 54th degrees of north latitude, and the 65th and 98th of west longitude. This country appears to have been first made known to Europe in 1535 by Cartier, commanding a fleet fitted out from St. Malo, under the auspices of the French government. Three or four attempts during the fifteen years from 1635 to 1560 were made to establish a colony upon it but all proved unsuccessful. In 1607 the first permanent establishment was formed by M. De Champlain, from France, who founded the city of Quebec; but for more than fifty years it remained without any laws or social arrangements, the settlers being little better than hordes of banditti, living in constant collision with the native Indians, with whom the most sanguinary conflicts frequently occurred with alternate success.

In 1663, at which period the European inhabitants did not exceed 7,000, the French government affected to extend its paternal regard to the colony, and appropriated a train of civil officers to organize and administer a code of laws on the principles of those then prevailing in France. This arrangement produced some excitement and indications of improvement; but both were of short duration. The collisions with the natives were renewed, and their frequent incursions upon the lands of the settlers which were often stained with acts of cruelty, operated as a check to all social enterprise; so that at the end of another half century, the number of settlers did not exceed 80,000. During the earlier part of the 18th century the colony made some progress towards improvement; but the object of the French government seemed to be extension of territory rather than social arrangement, and as such, in addition to the hostilities in which it was so frequently involved with the natives, it interfered itself also with the outposts of the English, who then possessed the territory now forming the United States of N. America, and on war being declared between France and England in 1756, the English prepared to expel the French entirely from the North American continent, in which they completely succeeded in 1759. At this period, the number of settlers in Canada amounted to about 70,000. During the first fifteen years after its surrender to the English, it made but little progress either in population or improvement, the prejudices of some of the older settlers being inimical to the English laws introduced immediately after its surrender, led, in 1775, to a revision of the civil code, more conformable to the usage and prejudices of the inhabitants. The revolt of the American States taking place about this time, occasioned a considerable accession of population to Canada, which progressively increased up to the period of 1792, when a further important arrangement took place in its internal administration, the territory was divided into two parts, denominated Upper and Lower Canada, with separate jurisdictions, and a council, and Assembly of representatives established for each, as more particularly elucidated under each of their respective heads, viz.

Canada, Lower, although the least favoured in climate of the two, is by far the most populous, owing to its near contiguity to the sea, and earlier settlement. This division extends from the United States Territory, in the lat. of 45. to that of 52. N.; and W. from the 65th degree of long. to an undefined boundary; the part, however, which is inhabited and under cultivation, lies within much narrower limits, comprising a tract of territory about 700 miles in length, and 150 in mean breadth, lying in a N. E. direction, from the lat. of 45. N. and 74. 30. of W. long.; the geographical bearing of this territory has been owing to the noble river St. Lawrence, which intersects it in that direction its whole extent, falling into the gulf of St. Lawrence, at the N. E. The settlements extend along both banks of the river, and are intersected on both sides by innumerable tributary streams and rivers, some of them of great magnitude; the most considerable of those on the south side of the St. Lawrence, taking them in order from the west, are 1st the Chambly, which runs out of Lake Champlain, falling into the St. Lawrence about 60 miles below Montreal; 2nd the Tortue; 3rd the St. Francis; 4th the Nicolet; 5th the Becancour; 6th the Beauvillage; and 7th the Chaudiere, which falls into the St. Lawrence, about 20 miles below Quebec; east of the Chaudiere, the waters chiefly flow to the south, or east into the gulf of St. Lawrence; the north bank is intersected at the distance of every 15 to 20 miles by rivers of greater or less magnitude, the most considerable is the Piekouagamis, which, after passing through a lake of considerable extent is called the Seguenai and falls into the St. Lawrence about 150 miles below Quebec. At the new organization of the government in 1763, this territory was divided into the four districts of Montreal, Trois Rivières, Quebec, and Gaspé; the three first extend on both sides of the river; the latter, which is called the district and county of Gaspé, comprises all the S. E. part of the territory, south of the St. Lawrence, bounded on the east by the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and south by the Province of New Brunswick, the three first districts were further subdivided into 20 counties, 11 on the south, and nine on the north side of the river, as follows, beginning at the S. W. viz.—

On the south side.	1 Huntingdon	On the north side.	12 York
	2 Bedford		13 Effingham
	3 Montreal		14 Leinster
	4 Richelieu		15 Warwick
	5 Surrey		16 St. Maurice
	6 Kent		17 Hampshire
	7 Buckingham		18 Orleans
	8 Dorchester		19 Quebec
	9 Hertford		20 Northumberland
	10 Devon
	11 Cornwallis

Of these, the first eight, which all lie within or south-west of the river Chaudiere, are the most fertile, and afford the most favourable spots for agricultural and commercial enterprise. The counties of Cornwallis and Northumberland, each extend from the latitude of about 47, the former to the district of Gaspé, and the latter borders on Labrador, all of which at present may be looked upon as one great wilderness. With this subdivision of territory and new organization of the government of Canada in 1792, a more steadfast career of improvement seems to have been pursued than in any former period.

One of the most distinguishing characteristics of Lower Canada is its climate, in the intensity of cold in the winter, and of heat in summer, and the sudden transition from one to the other, without producing any injurious effect upon the constitutions either of the inhabitants or other parts of the animal creation. The frosts begin about the middle of October, the sun continuing to render the days mild and agreeable for three or four weeks, when the snow storms set in, which continue for about a month, with variable winds and a hazy atmosphere, until about the middle or end of December; by which time the whole country is covered with an average depth of snow of three to five feet. An invariable season now commences; an uninterruptedly clear sky prevails for about 20 weeks, the thermometer ranging the greater part of the time from 20 to 25 below zero, sometimes descending more than 30 below, when the frost suddenly breaks, and in the course of a few days, about the end of April, or middle of May, the snow as suddenly disappears. All the energies of the husbandman are now directed to prepare the earth for seed, and in the short space of a month the most luxuriant verdure and vegetation are spread over all Canada; the thermometer sometimes, in June, ranging as high as 95 or 100, prevailing through the summer from about 75 to 80. Although the severity of the winter hinders the earth from yielding any produce, yet it essentially facilitates the conveyance to market of its summer products; a track once beaten upon the snow, which is easily effected after the storms have ceased, enables a horse to drag, on a sledge, a twofold weight, twice or thrice the distance in a day, which he would be able to draw in the best constructed carriage on the best possible road. In any country this facility of conveyance would be a great advantage, but in Canada especially, where the rapidity of vegetation, and the abundant produce of the summer, claims all the attention and all the energy of the population during that season, it more than counterbalances the severe and long duration of the winter, inasmuch as it supercedes the necessity of cost and labour in the construction of bridges and roads, and renders conveyance easy by routes and over tracts that would otherwise be impassable; thus so far from being deemed severe or inconvenient, it is regarded by the Canadians as the season of social intercourse and festivity. The basis of the commerce of Canada is in the produce of its forests, which, since 1817, have supplied England and the West Indies with an average of about 300,000 loads (of 50 cubic feet each) of timber annually. Its next source of supply for export is the skins of the innumerable wild animals which inhabit the forests, comprising the bear, stag, elk, deer, fox, marten, wild cat, and various others, including hare and rabbit, as well as a great variety of the weasel species, and the banks of the numerous lakes and rivers supply large quantities of otter and beaver skins. The aggregate value of this branch of commerce to Canada may be estimated at from £100,000 to £150,000 annually, varying, in some measure, according to the caprice of fashion. Fox and otter skins, which at one time sold in London for £10 to £15 a skin, at other times obtain only two or three to five pounds each; the others occasionally varying in nearly like proportion. Another great article of production for export is pot and pearl ash, which, with a few other articles of minor importance, constitute the whole of the exports; amounting in the aggregate, including the freight of a portion of the wood in Canadian built vessels, to a money value of about £800,000; which might and would be considerably augmented by an export of grain, did not the selfish and blind policy of the British legislature prefer confining the manufacturing population of England as well as of Ireland to a potato diet, and that in the most sparing supply, lest any grain of foreign production should be admitted into England, and lower the money price, and thereby preclude a high money rent tax. The exclusion of a market for the surplus of grain, which would easily be supplied, is, however, more than counterbalanced to Canada by a large military force and civil establishment, which is maintained in that country out of the taxes levied on the people of England. These maintenances, in addition to its exports, whilst the system subjects the people of England to increasing privation, enables the Canadians to draw from England a supply of manufactured and Asiatic productions to the amount in money value of about £1,400,000 annually, whilst the direct intercourse of Canada with the British West India Islands enables it to obtain a liberal supply of the products of those luxuriant climes. From these circumstances, it is easy to conceive that Canada affords great advantage to agricultural enterprise, and well-directed exertion.

The civil government consists of a governor, who is uniformly a military man and commander-in-chief of all the forces in British America, and an executive council of fourteen other members, who are all appointed by the governor for the approval of the king. The House of Assembly consists of fifty-two members, elected for four years in due proportions from each district of the country by the freeholders of forty shillings a year and upwards, or renters of £10 per annum and upwards. There is also a legislative council, consisting of not less than fifteen members. The legal establishment consists of a court of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and court of Appeal; and the civil and criminal law is administered by a chief justice and two puisne judges: the chief justice is also president of the legislative council. The ecclesiastical affairs of this country are under the superintendence of a catholic bishop resident at Quebec, and an assistant bishop, nine vicars-general, and about 200 cures, who are supported chiefly out of grants of land made under the French government, and an assessment of one twenty-sixth part of all grain produced on the lands held by catholics. The protestant establishment consists of a lord bishop, also resident at Quebec, nine rectors, and several curates or clergymen supported in part out of the civil list, and an appropriation of one-seventh of all the lands held by protestants. The protestant bishop has also a seat in the legislative council by virtue of his appointment: no distinction is otherwise made on account of religious profession, catholic and protestant being alike eligible to a seat in the executive or legislative council and assembly, as well as to all other civil or military appointments. Numerous tribes of native Indians still inhabit all the western and interior parts of this vast country, though their number has been much reduced since 1780, about which period the small-pox raged with such destructive fury as to entirely depopulate several hundred thousand square miles of territory. Since the abatement of that dreadful catastrophe, and the conciliatory measures of the Canadian government towards them, although they still withhold themselves as much as ever from the society of the settlers, they have maintained a much more social intercourse, with but few attempts at open hostility; and it is the Indian population who contribute so essentially to the traffic in furs. The principal towns in Lower Canada are Quebec, Montreal, and Trois Rivières.

The pine forests of this region are inhabited by vast numbers of martens, who live in the lofty tops of the trees. Their fur is highly esteemed, and great numbers of them are hunted for their skins. This animal destroys great quantities of small quadrupeds and birds. He frequently makes his nest in the hollow of a tree, but commonly seeks for a squirrel's nest, drives away or kills the owner, and takes possession.

The wolverene inhabits the northern parts of Canada and America generally, quite to the Arctic Sea, and it is probable that its visits extend beyond the continent towards the Pole, as a skull of this animal was found on Melville Island by Capt. Parry. It is an inhabitant alike of the woods and barren grounds, and is capable of enduring the severest cold. The motions of the wolverene are necessarily slow, and its gait heavy, but the acuteness of its sight and power of smelling are an ample compensation; as they are seldom or never killed without being found fat, there is good reason for believing that they rarely suffer much from hunger. This animal is surprisingly strong, and an overmatch for any quadruped near its own size;—indeed its sharp claws and teeth enable it to offer a very effectual resistance even to the bear.

Among the birds may be mentioned the wild pigeon, spotted grouse, and the smallest humming bird known. The raven, a bird found in every quarter of the world, is also very common here.

He seems to bear the cold of the northern regions with as much indifference as the heat of the torrid zone. It is remarkable, that wherever these birds abound, the common crow seldom makes his appearance.

Canada, Upper, in its most comprehensive sense, comprises a tract of country extending from the Ottawa, or Grand River, which divides it from Lower Canada at its junction with the St. Lawrence, in the longitude of 74. 30. W. and 45. of N. lat. to the north-west extremity of Lake Winnipeg, in the latitude of 59. N. and the 98th of W. long. bounded on the south by the chain of lakes which discharge their waters into the sea by the great river St. Lawrence, and on the north by the Ottawa River, in a north-west direction to the longitude of about 82., when it borders by undefined limits on the Hudson's bay and north-west territories. However, like Lower Canada, the part under cultivation, and which at present more particularly merits attention, lies within comparatively narrow limits, in a south-west direction, along the north bank of the St. Lawrence, and north shores of Lakes Ontario and Erie, from the Ottawa River before-mentioned at its entrance into the St. Lawrence to the straits of Erie and St. Clair River, between the Lakes Erie and Huron, in the longitude of 82. 30. W. It is about 570 miles from N. E. to S. W. and 40 to 50 in breadth, including about 10,000,000 of acres of as fertile land as any in all North America. The south-west extremity extending to the 42d degree of latitude, it is not subject to such severity of winter as the lower province; numerous streams, affording the most advantageous site for the erection of mills, fall into the lakes, and two considerable rivers in the eastern district fall into the Ottawa, and two others run in a south-west direction, falling into Lake St. Clair, between the strait of Erie and the St. Clair River. The southernmost of these rivers is called the Thames, with a London on its banks, destined perhaps, at some future time, to rival in population and importance its namesake in Britain. Upper Canada is divided, for judicial and local purposes, into eight districts, which are again subdivided into the 23 following counties, taking them in order from the south-west: viz

- | | |
|---------------------|----------------|
| 1. Essex, | 13. Hastings, |
| 2. Kent, | 14. Lennox, |
| 3. Suffolk, | 15. Addington, |
| 4. Middlesex, | 16. Frontinac, |
| 5. Norfolk, | 17. Prescott, |
| 6. Oxford, | 18. Russell, |
| 7. Lincoln, | 19. Leeds, |
| 8. York, | 20. Grenville, |
| 9. Durham, | 21. Dundas, |
| 10. Carleton, | 22. Stormont, |
| 11. Prince Edward, | 23. Glengary |
| 12. Northumberland, | |

These counties are further subdivided into about 160 townships. Nearly one-third of the lands were granted in free and common socage prior to 1825, about 500,000 acres of which are already under cultivation, one-third more being reserved for the crown and clergy, leaves about 4,000,000 of acres of fertile land, in the immediate vicinity of settlements already formed, for future grants; in addition to which, millions of acres in the rear, northward, covered at present with the finest timber of oak, hickory, beech, walnut, maple, pine, &c. &c. present a rich field for exertion, and the supply of future ages. The population of this province has increased, and continues increasing in a greater ratio than the lower one. The inhabitants, which in 1783 did not exceed 10,000, in 1814 amounted to 95,000, and in 1825 to double that number. Its civil and religious institutions are similar to those of the sister province, with the exception that being settled since the expulsion of the French, there are no feudal tenures or lands held in seigniorage, which is the case with all those granted to the original French settlers in the lower province. The inhabitants also of Upper Canada being emigrants from the United States, Scotland, and England, are principally protestants, and as such there are no special enactments or reservations for the catholics. The executive council of this province consists of six members, the legislature of not less than seven, and the house of assembly of twenty-five. Upper Canada participates in common in the commerce of the lower province, in addition to which it has also the advantage of interchanging its surplus productions with the United States, as either one direction or the other may best promote its interest. As long, however, as the English government are enabled to afford the same protection to Upper Canada, and under the same circumstances as prevailed in 1826, and more especially should the English government qualify their present policy of excluding grain of foreign growth importation into England, the interest of the Canadians will unquestionably lie on the side of England, and the Canadas afford the fairest field for agricultural exertion of any country in the world: independent of its abundant supply of grain and animal food, the forests supply abundance of every variety of game and fowl, and the rivers and lakes every variety of fish common to inland waters; and, by due attention to culture, the gardens may be made to yield every variety of delicious fruits.

The Canadas, in a general sense, may be considered a level country, beautifully undulated, but no where attaining an elevation exceeding 300 to 500 feet above the level of the waters of the great chain of lakes. A ridge of mountain skirts the northern boundaries of both provinces from the 74th to the 98th deg. of west longitude the altitudes have not been correctly ascertained but they seem to claim the character only of a chain of broken hills, rather than mountains. But little discovery of minerals has as yet been made: coals, copper, and iron, have been found, and as population extends itself, and when necessity requires them, the mineral substances will most probably not prove deficient. The two principal towns are York and Kingston.

Canajoharie, p.t. Montgomery Co. N. Y. Its vicinity abounds with apple-trees, from which it makes cider of an excellent quality. It stands on a creek of the same name, between the Mohawk River and the Erie Canal, 25 m. N. E. of Cooperstown, and 53 W. N. W. of Albany. Pop. 4,348.

Canandaigua, a lake in the western part of the State of New York, which discharges its waters into Lake Ontario. It is 20 miles long, and from 2 to 3 miles wide. The banks are high and variegated, and ornamented with many beautiful villas.

Canandaigua, p.t. Ontario Co., on the outlet of the above lake. It is one of the pleasantest towns in the country. The principal street runs along the ridge of a hill which rises from the north end of the lake; it is handsomely planted with trees, and the houses have an uncommonly neat appearance, being generally painted white, with green blinds. In the centre of the town is a large square. In the neighbourhood are many beautiful gardens. Canandaigua has a very flourishing trade, and a steam-boat plies upon the lake. It is 208 m. W. of Albany. Pop. 5,162.

Cananore, a town of Hindoostan, in Malabar, defended by a fortress, with other works after the European fashion. It is the head-quarters of the province. This town was taken in 1790 by the British, in whose possession it remains. It has several good houses, and carries on a good trade with other parts of the peninsula, and with Arabia and Sumatra. The country furnishes a large quantity of pepper, cardamoms, sandal wood, coir, sharks' fins, &c.; the imports are horses, benzoin, camphor, almonds, opium, sugar, and piece goods. It is governed by a native sovereign, who pays an annual tribute of 14,000 rupees to the English East India Company. It is seated on a small bay, one of the best on the coast, 56 m. N. N. W. of Calicut. Long. 75. 30. E. lat. 11. 53. N.

Canari, a province on the west coast of Hindoostan, lately subject to the regent of Mysore, on whose defeat and death, in 1799, it came into the hands of the British. It is 180 miles in length, between the Concan and Malabar, and from 30 to 80 in breadth. The soil is fertile, and it produces abundance of rice, betel-nuts, and wild nutmegs. The principal port is Mangalore.

Canaries, or Canary Islands, anciently called the Fortunate Islands, are thirteen in number, lying in the North Atlantic Ocean, off the west coast of North Africa, between the latitudes of 28. and 30. N. Seven of them are considerable, namely, Palma, Ferro, Gomera, Teneriffe, Canary, Fuerte-ventura, and Lanzerota, each of which see: the other six are very small, Graciosa, Rocca, Allegranza, St. Clare, Inferno, and Lobos. They were formerly inhabited by a brave and independent race of people called Gaanches. Fuerte-ventura and Lanzerota, being the least populous, were taken possession of by John de Betancourt, a Norman, about the commencement of the 15th century, in behalf of John, the then king of Castile: but it was not till towards the close of that century that the Spaniards, under whose sovereignty they still remain, obtained complete possession of the whole group, after the most determined resistance of the natives; the whole of whom, during the 16th century, fell victims to the cruelty of the Spaniards, either by the sword or the inquisition, which was established in these islands in 1532.

Canary, Grand, one of the principal of the above islands, lying between the east side of Teneriffe and the south end of Fuerte-ventura. Next to Teneriffe, it is the most fertile and productive of the group. The surface near the coast is beautifully diversified with hill and dale and well watered with streams issuing from mountains which lie towards the centre of the island. The vine in all its varieties flourishes in this island in the utmost luxuriance. It is here that the most delicious malmsey wine or sack is made, and it was from hence that the English obtained their sack, so celebrated in the time of Shakspeare. Under reciprocal arrangements and due excitement of protection and reward, this island would produce nearly all the fruits and vegetables common to the tropics; but under the proscriptive and bigoted policy of Spain, nothing depending on human exertion prospers, and, though the Canary Islands are less exposed to its despotism than any other part of the Spanish dominions, every thing languishes. The extent of this island is about 30 m. from north to south, and 28 in breadth. Palmas, or Canary, as it is sometimes called, the chief town, is situate on the coast towards the north-east end of the island, in the latitude of 28. 43. N. and 17. 46. W. long. having a tolerable harbour for vessels of 100 to 200 tons burthen, sheltered by a promontory jutting for about two miles into the sea from the north-east extremity of the island. Palmas was formerly the capital and seat of government, both civil and ecclesiastical, of the whole group of islands, but the governor now resides at Santa Cruz on Teneriffe; the bishop continuing at Palmas, the population of which is estimated at about 25,000, and the remainder of the island at about the same number.

Cancale, a town of France, in the department of Ille and Vilaine, seated on a bay of its name, and celebrated for oysters. The English landed here in 1758, and proceeded by land to burn the ships at St. Malo. It is nine miles east of St. Malo, and 40 N. N. W. of Rennes. Pop. about 3,000.

Candahar, or Kandahar, a province of Afghanistan, lying between the 31st and 34th degree of north latitude, and the 65th and 70th of east long.; the chief city, of the same name, is situate on the frontier of the Persian province of Sigistan, in the lat. of 33. N. and 65. 30. of E. long. During the entirety of the Persian and Mogul empires, it was considered the most important barrier between the two territories, and it was formerly the capital and seat of government of the whole Afghan territory, which is now at Cabul. It is however still an important place, both as a fortress and of commercial intercourse. See Afghanistan.

Candeish, a province of the Deccan of Hindoostan, subject to the Poonah Mahrattas: bounded on the N. by Malwa, E. by Berar, south by Dowlatabad and W. by Baglana. The soil is fertile, though mountainous, and produces abundance of cotton. Burhampour, which surrendered to the British in 1803, is the capital.

Candes, a town of France, in the department of Indre and Loire, at the confluence of the Vienne with the Loire, 30 m. W. S.W. of Tours.

Candia, an island in the Mediterranean, formerly Crete, lying to the south of the Archipelago. It is 180 miles long, from west to east, and 50 broad, and pervaded by a chain of mountains. The soil is fertile; and it abounds in fine cattle, sheep, swine, poultry, and game. The chief products are corn, wine, oil, wool, silk, and honey. It was taken by the Turks in 1669, after a war of 25 years. It was invaded by the Venetians, in 1682, without effect. Mount Ida, so famous in history, is in the middle of this island; beside the capital of the same name, the other principal towns are Canea, Retimo, Nuovo, Legortino, and Setia. Total population about 280,000, in nearly an equal proportion of Greeks and Turks.

Candia, the capital of the island of the same name, and the see of a Greek archbishop. Though populous formerly, little of it remains beside the walls and the market place; and the harbour is now fit for nothing but boats. It is seated on the north side of the island, about 240 m. S. S. W. of Smyrna. Long. 25. 18. E. lat. 35. 19. N. Pop. about 13,000.

Candia, p.t. Rockingham Co. N. H., 36 m. fr. Portsmouth. Pop. 1,363.

Candlemas Isles, two islands in the Southern Ocean, near Sandwich Land. Long. 27. 13. W. lat. 57. 10. S.

Candor, p.t. Tioga Co. N. Y. 177 m. W. Albany. Pop. 2,663.

Candy, formerly a kingdom, comprising the greater part of the interior of the island of Ceylon; the chief town, of the same name, is situate nearly in the centre of the island, on the banks of a river called the Malivaganga, which falls into the sea by several channels on the east side. The town consists principally of one street about two miles in length; the principal buildings being the former king's palace and the temple of Boodh. It surrendered to a British force in March 1815, and was annexed with the whole of the Island Ceylon, to the British dominions. Candy is about 70 m. E. N. E. of Colombo, and 85 S. W. of Trincomalee.

Canea, a strong town in the island of Candia, with a good harbour. The environs are adorned with olive-trees, vineyards, gardens, and brooks, bordered with myrtle and laurel roses. It was taken from the Venetians by the Turks, in 1645, after a defence of two months, in which the victors lost 25,000 men. It is seated on the north coast of the island, 63 m. W. by N. of Candia. Long. 24. 7. E. lat. 35. 27. N.

Canades, p.t. Alleghany Co. N. York. Pop. 783.

Canale, a town of Piedmont, at the south extremity of Asti, 12 m. S. S. E. of the town of Asti. Pop. about 3,000.

Canato. (See Cagneto.)

Caneto, a town of Italy, in the Mantuan, several times taken and retaken by the French and Austrians. It is seated on the Oglio, 20 m. W. of Mantua.

Canfield, p.t. Trumbull Co. Ohio.

Canga, a town of the kingdom of Congo, on the river Zaire, 260 m. N. E. of St. Salvador. Long. 17. 10. E. lat. 2. 10. S.

Cangiano, a town of Naples, in Principato Citere, 40 m. E. by S. of Salerno.

Cangozima, a strong seaport of Japan, on the most southern verge of the isle of Ximo, or Kiusiu, with a commodious harbour. At the entrance of the haven is a light-house, on a lofty rock; and at the foot of the rock is a convenient road for shipping. Here are large and sumptuous magazines, belonging to the emperor, some of which are proof against fire. Long. 132. 15. E. lat. 32. 10. N.

Caniza, a town of European Turkey, in Albania, near the entrance of the Gulf of Venice, 8 m. S. E. of Avlona.

Canischa, a strong town of Lower Hungary. It was taken, in 1600, by the Turks, who held it till 1690, when it was taken by the Austrians, after a blockade of two years, and ceded to the emperor by the peace of Carlowitz. It is seated on the bank of a small lake, 12 m. N. of the Drave River, and 85 m. S. S. W. of Raab. Long. 17. 10. E. lat. 46. 30. N.

Canisteo, p.t. Steuben Co. N. Y., 260 m. S. W. Albany. Pop. 620.

Canna, one of the Hebrides of Scotland, S. W. of the Isle of Skye. It is four miles long and one broad; the high parts producing excellent pasture for cattle, and the low is tolerably fertile. Here are many basaltic columns. On the S. E. side of Canna is Sand Island, separated by a narrow channel; and between them is a well frequented harbour. Long. 6. 38. W. lat. 57. 13. N.

Cannes, or Cagnes, a small seaport at the S. E. extremity of France, distinguished as the place of debarkation of Napoleon from Elba, on the 1st of March, 1815. It is about 6 m. S. W. of Nice.

Canobia, a town of Italy, in the Milanese, on the lake Maggiore, 35 m. N. N. W. of Milan.

Canoge, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Agra. It is said to have been the capital of all Hindoostan, under the predecessor of Porus, who fought against Alexander; and that in the 6th century it contained 30,000 shops in which betel-nut was sold. It is now reduced to the size of a middling town, and seated on the Calini, near its conflux with the Ganges, 110 m. E. by S. of Agra. Long. 80. 13. E. lat. 27. 3. N.

Canonsburg, p.t. Washington Co. Pa. 18 m. S. W. Pittsburg. Here is a Seminary, founded in 1802, called Jefferson College. It has 7 instructors, 120 students, and a library of 2,500 vols. There are 2 vacations in May and October. Commencement is in September. The town has an elevated and pleasant situation.

Canosa, a town of Naples, in Terra di Bari, which stands on part of the site of the ancient Canusium, one of the most magnificent cities of Italy. Between Canosa and the river Ofanto are still some traces of the ancient town of Canne, in the plain of which was fought the celebrated battle between Hannibal and the Romans, wherein the latter lost 45,000 men. Canosa is 4 m. W. by N. of Trani.

Canoul, a town of Hindoostan, in Goleonda, capital of a circar of the same name, seated on the south bank of the Toombudra River, 110 m. S. S. W. of Hyderabad. Long. 78. 7. E. lat. 15. 48. N.

Canourgus, a town of France, in the department of Lozere, with a trade in cattle and woolen stuffs, seated near the Lot, 13 m. S. W. of Mende.

Canco, a seaport at the S. E. extremity of Nova Scotia. Near the town is a fine fishery for cod. Long. 60. 55. W. lat. 45. 20. N.

Canoe, Gut of, a strait about 25 m. in length and from a half to a mile wide, between the east end of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, leading from the Atlantic Ocean through Chedabucto Bay into St. George's Bay, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Canstadt, a town of Suabia, in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, with a manufacture of printed cottons. In the neighbourhood are some me dicinal springs. It is seated on the Neckar, three m. N. E. of Stuttgart.

Cantal, an interior department in the south of France, including part of the late province of Auvergne. It is so called from a mountain, near the centre of the department, whose summit is always covered with snow. The capital is St. Flour. Pop. about 250,000.

Cantazaro, a town of Naples, in Calabria Citeriore, near the sea, 26 m. S. W. of St. Severino.

Canterbury, a city of Kent, Eng. capital of the county, and the see of an archbishop, who is primate of all England. It was the Durovernum of the Romans, and founded before the Christian era. The cathedral, a large structure, was once famous for the shrine of Thomas a Becket, a turbulent priest, who was murdered here in 1170, and afterwards made a saint. In this cathedral are interred Henry IV. and Edward the Black Prince. The city has likewise 14 parish churches; the remains of many Roman antiquities; and an ancient castle, with walls and a deep ditch; and a grammar-school founded by Henry VIII. It is a county of itself, governed by a mayor; and is noted for excellent brawn. The adjacent country produces abundance of hops. It is seated on the river Stour, 55 m. E. S. E. of London, on the high road to Dover, from which it is distant 17 m. Pop. in 1821, 12,754.

Canterbury, p.t. Merrimack Co. N. H. 9 m. from Concord. Pop. 1,663. Here is a village of Shakers.

Canterbury, p.t. Windham Co. Conn. 40 m. E. Hartford. Pop. 1,881. Here are some manufactures of cotton and woolen. Also a town in Kent Co. Del.

Canth, a town of Silesia, on the river Weistritz, 15 m. S. W. of Breslau.

Cantin, a cape, a promontory of the Atlantic Ocean, on the coast of Morocco. Long. 9. 5. W. lat. 32. 33. N.

Canton, a city, seaport, and capital of Quang-tong, the most southern province of China, and the only port in that vast empire with which Europeans are permitted to hold any intercourse; it is finely situated at the head of a bay, into which flow two large rivers, one from the westward, which by numerous collateral branches intersects all the southern part of the empire, and the other from the north, which, by a portage of only one day's journey, communicates with the great chain of inland waters that intersects every other province. These rivers afford a facility of conveyance by water, which renders Canton peculiarly well adapted for the great outport of the empire. The harbour is very commodious, and being sheltered by several small islands, it affords secure moorings for the innumerable barks or junks which navigate the inland waters; all the foreign ships anchor several miles distant from the town, not on account of the incapacity of the harbour to accommodate them, but from the peculiarly jealous policy of the Chinese, which seems to dread nothing so much as sociability of intercourse. Canton consists of three towns, divided by high walls, but so conjoined as to form almost a regular square. The streets are long and straight, paved with flagstones, and adorned with triumphal arches. The houses in general have only one floor, built of earth or brick, some of them fantastically coloured, and covered with tiles. The better class of people are carried about in chairs; but the common sort walk barefooted and bareheaded. At the end of every street is a barrier, which is shut every evening, as well as the gates of the city. The Europeans and Americans occupy a range of buildings termed the factories, fronting a spacious quay along the bank of the harbour, without the city; and no foreigner is permitted to enter without the special permission of the viceroy, which is seldom obtained.

There are 40,000 sampans or boats upon the river, which contains above 100,000 people who live constantly upon the water. The wall around the city is 4 or 5 miles in extent. The city contains vast numbers of triumphal arches and temples richly adorned with statues. The streets are crowded with passengers to such a degree that it is difficult to get along. The European or American visitor is struck with the variety and oddity of the different articles offered for sale in the streets and markets. If he is in quest of a dainty morsel of fresh meat he may here purchase a fine lot of rats, cats and puppies, which the Chinese esteem particularly nice for making pies! The foreign trade of Canton resolves itself into a monopoly more peculiar and oppressive than any where else exists, (except the Bank of England and East India Company in London) it is vested in 12 persons precisely on the same principle as the 12 Jews are permitted to act as brokers in the city of London, each paying a large premium for the privilege of trading, or in other words, as far as the principle applies in China, for the privilege of extorting from and oppressing the producers of the commodities in which they trade. There is, however, this difference in China; whilst each of the 12 individuals all trade on separate account, they are collectively amenable, as well to foreigners as the government, for any default or mulct imposed upon any one or more of them individually; whilst each of the Jew brokers of London is only responsible for his own acts. In addition to the external commerce of Canton, it also appears to be the seat of almost every branch of manufacture, more especially of silks and household gods; and as from the circumstance of there being no public worship in China, every house has its own collection of idols, the manufacture of these forms one of the most important branches of occupation. The main article of export from Canton is tea, which since 1798, to England alone, has averaged about 25 millions of lbs., whilst to America and other parts (since 1815 more especially) it has been gradually increasing, making an aggregate average quantity annually exported at the period of 1836, of about 40 millions of lbs. The other principal articles exported to England are raw silk and nankeens, of the former about 250,000 lbs. weight, and of the latter, about 600,000 pieces of four and seven yards each, annually; a few manufactured silks and crapes, fans, ivory chess men, fancy oxes, and other toys, soy, and ink, constitute the remaining exports to England, which employs about 25 sail of ships annually, of about 1,200 tons each. The reimbursement by the English for the above productions is made in cotton, wool, opium, and some other articles from Bombay and Bengal, and in woollen cloths, lead, &c. from England, to the amount of about £700,000 annually. In addition to the trade direct to England, there is also an extensive traffic on English account between the different ports of India and Canton, which consists in a reciprocal interchange of the productions of the respective countries, and in which porcelain forms a considerable article of export from Canton. The intercourse of America with Canton is maintained on the part of America with furs from the N. W. coast, sandal wood, and the edible birdsnests collected among the eastern islands, and with dollars. A considerable portion of the tea exported in American ships, being on account and risk of the Chinese merchants, more especially the portion brought to Hamburg, Antwerp, and other European ports, is wholly reimbursed in specie. The imposts of the government on its external commerce are levied on the length and breadth of the shipping entering and leaving the port. The following statement of the amount of duties returned to the Chinese treasury for the year 1822, will best show the extent and proportion of the three great branches into which the external commerce of Canton resolves itself: viz. 1st. that with the English East India Company; 2nd. that with the different ports of British India; 3rd. that with America:—

	On Import.	On Export.
English East Ind. Com.	395,112	460,042
Country Trade,	118,533	80,623
America,	276,578	330,409

Total Tals, 790,224 880,076
The Tals being only equal to 6s. 8d. of English money, the whole impost will be seen to amount, according to the above statement, to only £556,800, not equal to the amount levied on the single article of coals alone, at the port of London; and yet such is the extent and insidious nature of the intermediate oppression of the Chinese Hong, (or council, which is the term by which the 12 privileged merchants of Canton are collectively called) on one side; and the English East India Company on the other, that whilst the 25,000,000 lbs. of tea annually consumed in Great Britain and Ireland, costs the consumer, on an average, at least 7s per lb., it does not yield to the producer, including the inland conveyance to Canton, an average of 3 1-2d. per lb. In 1823 several thousand houses in Canton were destroyed by fire, but the ground has since been rebuilt upon, the population is estimated at about 250,000. It is in the lat. of 23. 8. N. and 113. 2. of E. long. being 16. deg. 47. or about 1,190 British statute miles S. by W. of Peking, the metropolis of the empire.

Canton, p.t. Norfolk Co. Mass. 14 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 1,517. It has some manufactures. Also, a p.t. Hartford Co. Con. Pop. 1,437. Also a p.t. St. Lawrence Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,440. Also 5 other towns in Pa., Ohio, Ten. and Va.

Cantyre, or Kintyre, a peninsula of the west coast of Scotland, in Argyleshire, 35 miles long and 7 broad, connected on the north by an isthmus, scarce a mile broad, to the mountainous district of Knapdale. To the south the peninsula terminates in a great promontory, surrounded by a group of dangerous rocks, called the Mull of Cantyre, on which is a light-house, in the lat. of 55. 17. N. and 5. 41. W. long. It is a mountainous district, with some fertile spots. The chief town is Camblerton. The other towns are Kirkmichael, Ballachintea, Killeen, Kilcahnonil, and Skipness. Total pop. in 1821, 20,668.

Cany, a town of France, in the department of Lower Seine, situate in a country which produces great quantities of corn and flax, 26 miles north-west of Rouen.

Caorlo, a small island in the gulf of Venice, on the coast of Friuli. It has a town of the same name, 20 m. S. W. of Aquileia. Long. 12. 36. E. lat. 45. 42. N.

Capacio, a town of Naples, in Principato Citeriore, 20 m. S. E. of Salerno.

Cape Breton, an island forming part of the British dominions in America, lying between the north end of Nova Scotia, from which it is separated by the Gut of Canso; and the south-west point of Newfoundland, from which it is separated by the principal entrance into the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It extends, in a north by east direction from the lat. of 45. 30. to 47. 6. N. and from the long. of 59. 45. to 61. 35. W. forming a barrier between the Atlantic Ocean and the gulf, which it completely landlocks and forms into a vast inland sea; the passage between the north-east end and Newfoundland being about 65 miles wide, intercepted, however, by the island of St. Paul, and just within the gulf by the Magdalen group of isles. Cape Breton is indented from north to south by spacious bays, dividing it into two islands joined together by a very narrow isthmus. The coast on all sides is also much indented by bays, making the figure of the land very irregular. Its area, however, amounts to about 40,000 sq. miles. The French first formed a settlement upon this island in 1712, which surrendered to a British force from New England in 1745, and was confirmed, with all the other French possessions in North America, to England, by the treaty of 1763. Its most distinguishing property is its rich strata of coal of superior quality; with some dreary surface it also presents some very fertile spots, well wooded, and containing a variety of wild animals, the skins of which form a branch of its traffic; and should the colonies of England ever be rendered subservient in promoting the mutual interests of both the settlers and the British people, Cape Breton, at present, as little known to the people at large as though it had no existence, might be made very instrumental in promoting a highly beneficial and reciprocal intercourse. Louisbourg, the chief town, is situate on the Atlantic coast, in the lat. of 45. 54. N. and 59. 55. W. long. The chief occupation of the people not only of Louisbourg but of the whole island, in addition to agriculture, is the cod fishery, which they pursue to some extent for the West India and other markets. Total population of the island about 4,000. It was constituted a separate government in 1784, under a lieutenant-governor appointed by the king; but by a stretch of authority on the part of the legislative assembly and council of Nova Scotia, it has reverted as a province to that government, to which it was originally attached.

Cape Girardeau, a county of Missouri, lying between the St. Francis and Mississippi rivers, just above the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi, in the lat. of 37. N. It is 40 miles in length, from north to south, and about 20 in mean breadth. Pop. 7,430. There is a town of the same name on the west bank of the Mississippi; but Jackson, further north in the interior, 80 m. S. S. E. of St. Louis, and about 600 N. N. W. of New Orleans, is the chief town.

Cape of Good Hope, a territory comprising the whole southern extremity of Africa, discovered by the Portuguese navigator, Bartholomew Diaz, in 1493, who gave it the name of Cabo Tormentoso, from the boisterous weather which he met with near it; but Emanuel, king of Portugal, on the return of Diaz, changed its name to that of Cape of Good Hope, from the hope he entertained of finding a passage beyond it to India; and in this he was not deceived, for Vasco de Gama, having doubled this cape on the 20th November, 1497, proceeded to India, and landed at Calicut, on the 22d of May, 1498. The Cape of Good Hope was first touched at by the Dutch in 1600, and in 1650, they established a settlement at this place of which they held undisturbed possession for nearly 150 years. The cape or promontory which gives name to the territory is about 13 leagues W. N. W. of Cape Agulhas, which is the extreme S. point of the African continent, and the territory extends northward to the lat. of about 30. S. and eastward from the shore of the Atlantic Ocean in 18., to that of the Indian Ocean in 28. of E. long. being about 560 miles from W. to E. with a mean breadth of about 200 from S. to N. giving an area of about 112,000 square miles. This extensive territory was taken from the Dutch, by the English in 1795; but restored to Holland at the peace of Amiens in 1802; retaken in 1806, and confirmed to Great Britain by the congress at Vienna in 1816, and it now forms part of the British dominions. From the southern extremity to the latitude of about 30, the ground rises by three successive gradations to the height of 5 or 6,000 feet above the level of the sea. The quagga or wild ass of South Africa is found in herds in this quarter, but has lately grown scarce in the territory of the cape. The back mountain ridge in some places rising to the height of 9,000 to 10,000 feet. This variation in altitude is subject to almost every variety of climate, and the surface is as various as the climate, there being much dreary and sterile territory, some very fine pastures, and some exceedingly fertile arable land. The capriciousness of the seasons, however, is such as to render the pursuit of tillage exceedingly hazardous, though, when the seasons are favourable, the produce is superabundant. The culture of the vine seems attended with less risk, and is likely to supersede the attention to agriculture beyond what is necessary for the subsistence of the colony. The surplus produce of wine, exported during the eight years 1817 to 1824, averaged about 4,500 pipes per annum. In 1819, an attempt was made to establish a settlement at Algoa Bay, towards the eastern extremity of the southern coast, in the long. of 25. 42. E. about 450 miles east of the settlement at the Hope Cape, but the seasons in succession cutting off all the crops, the settlers were all subjected to the extreme of privation. By due attention, however, to the nature of the climate, and application of the soil to purposes for which it is best adapted, the Cape territory in the aggregate is doubtless susceptible of being rendered subservient to the highest degree of comfort and enjoyment of the settlers, and reciprocally so to the inhabitants of Great Britain. It is divided into four districts; viz. the Cape, Swellendam, Stellenbosch, and Graff Reynet. The Cape district comprises the promontory which gives name to the territory. The promontory jets into the Southern Ocean, at the south-west extremity. On each side of this promontory is a bay frequented alternately as the winds prevail; that on the east side, in the Southern Ocean, is called False Bay, restored to during the prevalence of north and north-west winds, and that on the west side, in the Atlantic Ocean, is called Table Bay, which affords tolerable shelter during the prevalence of south and south-east winds. They are, however, both destitute of convenient harbours. There are two other bays north of Table Bay; Saldanha, in the lat. of 33. 7. S. and St. Helens in 32. 40. both of which have more convenient harbours than either of the other two; but, being deficient in fresh water, they are not much frequented. On the shore of Table Bay, in the lat. of 33. 56. S. and 18. 28. E. long. is the chief town of the colony, called Cape-town, rising in the midst of a desert, surrounded by black and dreary mountains. To the south-east of the town are some vineyards, which yield the famous wine called Constantia. The store-houses built by the Dutch East India Company are situate next the water, and the private buildings lie beyond them, on a gentle ascent toward the mountains. The castle, or principal fort, which commands the road, is on the east side; and another strong fort, called Amsterdam fort, is on the west side. The streets are broad and regular; and the houses, in general, are built of stone, and white-washed. There are barracks for 2,000 men, built on one side of a spacious plain, which serves for a parade. There are two other large squares, in one of which the market is held, and the other serves to assemble the numerous waggons and vehicles bringing in the produce from the country. There is another large building erected by the Dutch for a marine hospital, and a house for the accommodation of the government slaves: the government house, a town hall, and a Calvinist and Lutheran church, constitute the remainder of the public buildings. The population in 1826 amounted to about 20,000, more than one-half of whom were Hottentots, Negro and Malay slaves, and people of colour. The Table Mountain, so called from the flatness of its main summit, rises from immediately behind the town to the height of 3,592 feet above the level of the sea, having a collateral peak on the east 3,315 feet in height, and another on the west 2,160 feet. The profitable productions of the colony, taken as a whole, are wine, grain, all the European and most of the tropical fruits, vegetables of every description, cattle, and sheep. At the foot of the Table Mountain are considerable plantations of the protea argentea, or silver tree (a species of the protea peculiar to this spot,) the stone pine, and the white poplar. Avenues of oak adorn the country houses, and this tree grows rapidly throughout the colony, but rarely to any perfection as timber. It is constantly cut down, with the rest of the few forest trees of the Cape, for fuel, which is so scarce that most families in decent circumstances keep a slave employed entirely in collecting it. On the eastern side of the mountains that run northward from the Cape, and at the southern foot of the Zwartberg or Black Mountains, are some good pasture farms, and whole plains of the common aloe, which forms a considerable article of trade

In these parts are great numbers of the gazelle or hart beest, as the Dutch call it. This is one of the most common animals of the territory. The markets are well supplied with fish from the open sea, and from the numerous inlets of the coast.

Cape May, a maritime county, forming a promontory at the south extremity of the state of New Jersey. The cape, at the extreme south point, is in lat. 38. 57. N., the west side being washed by Delaware Bay, and the east to great Egg harbour, in the lat. of 39. 18. N., by the Atlantic Ocean, this side in its whole extent being flanked by a chain of islands. Pop. of the county, 4,945. The court-house of the county is 102 m. S. of Trenton.

* * For numerous other capes see their respective names.

Capelle, a town of France in the department of Aisne, 10 m. N. E. of Guise.

Capetan, a town of France, in the department of Herault, near the river Aude and the canal of Languedoc, 6 m. west of Beziers.

Caphon Springs, p.v. Frederic Co. Va. At this place are mineral springs resorted to by invalids.

Capitanata, a province of Naples, east of the Apennines, bounded on the east for about 70 miles by the Adriatic, varying in breadth from 40 to 80 miles, containing an area of about 3,500 square miles, and 270,000 inhabitants. It is watered by several streams falling into the Adriatic. The chief town upon the coast is Manfredonia; and Lucera, 35 m. W. of Manfredonia, and 90 E. by N. of the city of Naples, is the chief town.

Capo Fino, a barren rock in the territory of Genoa, with a castle on its eastern peak. Near it is a port of the same name, 13 m. E. S. E. of Genoa. Long. 8. 56. E. lat. 44. 20. N.

Capo d' Istria, a town of Italy, capital of Istria, and a bishop's see. It stands on a small island in the gulf of Trieste, connected with the continent by a causeway, which is defended by a castle. The principal revenue consists in wine and salt. It is 8 m. S. of Trieste. Long. 14. 0. E. lat. 45. 40. N. Pop. about 5,000.

Cappel, a town of Denmark, in the duchy of Sleswick, on the east coast, 16 m. N. E. of Sleswick.

Capraria, an isle in the Mediterranean, to the N. E. of Corsica, 15 miles in circumference. It has a town of the same name, with a good harbour defended by a castle. It is included in the Sardinian States. Pop. about 2,000. Long. 9. 56. E. lat. 43. 5. N.

Capri, an island in the Mediterranean, at the entrance of the gulf of Naples, nearly opposite Sorrento. It is five miles long and two broad, with steep shores, accessible only in two places; and was the retreat of the emperor Tiberius, who here spent the last ten years of his life in luxurious debauchery. A vast quantity of quails come here every year; and the tenth of what are caught, forms a great part of the revenue of the bishop, who is hence called the Bishop of Quails. Pop. about 3,600.

Capri, the capital of the island of the same name, and a bishop's see, with a castle. It was once a delightful place, embellished with magnificent works, which were demolished after the death of Tiberius. It is 27 miles S. S. W. of Naples. Long. 14. 10. E. lat. 40. 32. N.

Caprycke, a town of the Netherlands, 18 m. E. of Bruges, on the road to Phillipina. Pop. about 3,500.

Capua, a strong city of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, and an archbishop's see, with a citadel. It is two miles from the ancient Capua, and was built out of its ruins. No city in Italy, except Rome, contains a greater number of ancient inscriptions. In 1803 it suffered much by an earthquake, and a number of cavalry were buried under the ruins of their barracks. It stands at the foot of a mountain, on the river Volturno, 20 m. N. of Naples. Long. 14. 19. E. lat. 41. 7. N.

Cara, a river of Russia, which issues from the north extremity of the Ural mountains, and flows into the gulf of Karskoi, in the Arctic Ocean; forming the boundary between Europe and Asia, for the space of about 140 miles.

Caracas, a territory extending along the northern coast of South America, between the 64th and 70th degree of W. long. It was first discovered by Columbus, on his third voyage, in 1498. Several attempts were immediately after made by Spanish adventurers to form settlements, which being partially effected, it was sold by Charles V. of Spain to a company of German trading adventurers, who, by their intolerable oppressions, were expelled the country in 1550. It was then formed into a captain-generalship, under the command of a supreme governor appointed by the king of Spain, under whose sovereignty it remained in undisturbed possession up to 1806. When the events of the war, which desolated Europe from 1793 had cut off all direct intercourse between Spain and her external possessions, a futile attempt was made by General Miranda to revolutionize this part of South America. In 1810, however, when the French had obtained the entire possession of Spain, and proclaimed the sovereignty of all its external possessions, a congress was convened of deputies from all the provinces of the captain-generalship of Caracas, to devise measures either for the establishment of an independent government, or for effecting some modification in the then existing one. This led to internal dissensions and inveterate hostility between the two parties; one, advocates for maintaining the government as it then existed, which were supported by Spain on the restoration of Ferdinand in 1812, and the other, who placed General Bolivar in the command of their armed forces, resolved upon acceding to nothing short of unqualified independence. The contest continued with alternate success up to the close of the year 1819, when on the 19th of December a union was effected between the provinces of Caracas and those of New Granada, and on the 24th of June, 1821 the last battle was fought, which decided the fate of the pretensions of Spain and the final extinction of its authority over all this part of South America. This territory then became one great republic under the denomination of Colombia.

Caracas, or Leon de Caracas, the chief town of New Venezuela, a province of the republic of Colombia, is situated on an elevated plain, 2,900 feet above the level of the sea, at a distance of about 8 m. from the shore, in the lat. of 10. 31. N. and 67. of W. long. Notwithstanding its altitude, it is watered by two or three streams, whilst, by its elevation it enjoys a comparatively temperate and delightful climate. The town is regularly laid out and has two or three squares, a cathedral, college, and several churches, but none remarkable for architectural beauty. The population in 1802 was estimated at 42,000, but an earthquake in March, 1812, destroyed 12,000 of the number, as well as great part of the town. Its markets are well supplied with almost every luxury as well as necessary of life. (See Laguaira.)

Caraman, a town of France, in the department of Upper Garonne, 20 m. S. E. of Toulouse. Pop. about 2,300.

Caramania, a province of Asiatic Turkey, to the east of Natolia. It comprehends the ancient Pamphilia, and a great part of Cilicia, Pisidia, and Cappadocia. It contains several lakes, which abound with fish, and furnish great quantities of salt, and the Kisil Jermak river intersects the eastern part of the province, running north into the Black Sea. Cogni, or Konieh, in the lat. of 38. 10. N. and 32. 25. of E. long. is the capital.

Caramanta, a district of Colombia, included in the south part of the province of Magdalena; bounded on the west by Ystmo, south by Popayan and east by Zulia. It is a valley surrounded by high mountains, and there are waters whence the natives get salt. The capital, of the same name, is seated on the Cauca, 240 m. N. N. E. of Popayan. Long. 75. 15. W. lat. 5. 18. N.

Carangas, a town of Peru, capital of a district which contains valuable silver mines, and feeds a great number of cattle. It is 45 m. W. of Potosi.

Carara, properly Carrara, a town of Italy, in the principality of Massa, celebrated for its quarries of marble of various colours. It is 5 m. N. N. E. of Massa.

Carasus, a lake of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, 55 miles in circumference, containing several islands. It is formed by a branch of the Danube, not far from its entrance into the Black Sea.

Carabaya, a town of Peru, capital of a jurisdiction of the same name. It is 160 miles S. E. of Cuzco. Long. 69. 36. W. lat. 14. 40. S.

Carbonne, a town of France, in the department of Upper Garonne, on the east bank of the river Garonne, 25 m. S. by W. of Toulouse. Pop. about 2,000.

Carcagante, a town of Valencia, on the south bank of the river Xumar, 25 m. S. of the city of Valencia.

Carcassonne, a city of France, capital of the department of Aude, and a bishop's see. It is situated on the line of the grand canal of Languedoc, and divided into the upper and lower town by the Aude, over which is a stone bridge. In the upper town, called the city, are a strong castle and the cathedral. The lower town is square, regularly built, and kept very neat, by means of an aqueduct which brings the waters of the Aude to different fountains. Here are manufactures of all sorts of cloth. It is 35 m. W. of Narbonne, and 50 S. E. of Toulouse. Pop. about 15,000.

Caracalla, or Caricall, a town of Hindoostan, in Canara, chiefly inhabited by shopkeepers. In an open temple here is the image of a naked man, 38 feet in height by 19 in thickness, made of one piece of granite. Much rice, ginger, turmeric, and betel-nut, is raised in the vicinity. It is seated between two lakes, or tanks, which give source to two rivers, 26 m. N. by E. of Mangalore.

Cardiff, a borough and seaport of Wales, capital of Glamorganshire. It is seated on the Taaf, over which there is a handsome bridge of five arches. Its castle was an elegant Gothic structure, but has lately undergone a motley repair. The town was formerly encompassed by a wall, and vestiges of its four gates yet remain. The constable of the castle is the chief magistrate, who is called mayor; and here the assizes for the county are held. Near the town are some iron works, and a canal, extending 25 miles, to the great iron works at Merthyr Tydvil. In the castle died Robert, duke of Normandy, eldest son of William the Conqueror, after having been blinded, and confined 28 years, by his brother Henry I. Cardiff is 40 miles west of Bristol, 47 east of Swansea, and 160 west of London. Long. 3. 12. W. lat. 51. 28. N. Pop. in 1821, 3,521.

Cardigan, a maritime county of South Wales, extending for about 50 miles along the shore of St. George's Channel, from the river Tivy, which divides it from Pembroke and Caermarthenshire on the south, to the Dovey, which divides it from Merionethshire, north; being about 30 miles in mean breadth, bounded on the east by the counties of Montgomery, Radnor, and Brecknock. The Rheidal and one or two other rivers intersect the county from east to west. Parts of this county are very fertile, both in tillage and pasture, which enables the inhabitants to produce a considerable surplus of grain, and small black cattle, with which, and some few sheep and wool, they obtain a tolerable supply of manufactured and colonial productions. The principal towns beside Cardigan are Aberystwith and Llanbeder.

Cardigan, the chief town of the preceding county, is situate at the mouth of the Tivy, over which is a handsome bridge of seven arches, at the S. W. extremity of the county. It had formerly a strong and an extensive castle, of which but little now remains. It was from hence that the first descent upon Ireland was made by the English. The church is a spacious edifice; the county gaol and hall have been rebuilt within the present century. It is a corporate town, governed by a mayor, 12 aldermen, &c. and unites with Aberystwith and Llanbeder in returning one member to Parliament. Pop. in 1821, 2,397. It is 25 m. E. N. E. of St. David's Head, 132 m. west of Gloucester, and about the same distance due east of Waterford, in Ireland. Its commerce by sea is confined to the coast.

Cardigan Bay, is formed by St. David's Head, the western point of Pembrokehire, south, in the lat. of 51. 44. N. and 5. 17. W. long. and Bardsey Island, off the S. W. point of Caernarvonshire north, in the lat. of 52. 44. and 4. 39. of W. long.; the main coast of Caernarvonshire being in the long. of about 4. it gives a stretch of about 40 miles from W. to E. and 50 from S. to N. within the bay.

Cardona, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, with a castle. Near it is a mountain of solid rock salt, of which are made vases, snuff boxes, and trinkets; and there are vineyards that produce excellent wine. It is seated on the Cardenero, 36 m. N. W. of Barcelona. Pop. about 3,000.

Carolia, or Russian Finland. (See Wiburg.)

Carotian, a town of France, in the department of Manche, with an ancient castle, 8 miles from the sea, and 21 W. of Bayeux. Pop. 2,860.

Cares, or Kareis, a town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, situate on Mount Athos, 17 m. S. E. of Salonica.

Carew, a village of Wales, 4 miles E. by N. of Pembroke, noted for the noble and extensive remains of its castle, situate on a gentle swell above an arm of Milford Haven. Pop. 975.

Carhaix, a town of France in the department of Finisterre, on the river Yer, 19 m. S. of Morlaix.

Carham, a village in Northumberland, Eng. 5 miles east of Kelso. Near it a battle was fought between the English and Danes, in which 11 bishops and 2 English counts were slain, beside a great number of soldiers. Here likewise was a battle between the English and Scots, in 1018, in which the latter were victorious. In 1370, sir John Lilburne was defeated near this place, and taken prisoner by the Scots. Pop. 1,370.

Cariaco, a city in the Colombian new province of Orinoco, containing a population of about 6,000. It is about 50 m. E. of Cumana.

Cariati, a town of Naples, on the sea coast, in Calabria Citeriore, near the Gulf of Taranto, 25 m. N. of Severino.

Caribbean Sea, that part of the Atlantic Ocean lying between Cuba, St. Domingo, and Porto Rico, on the north, and the north coast of the new republic of Colombia on the south, and extending west from the 62nd to the 84th degree of W. long.

Caribbes Islands, the most eastern islands of the West Indies, divided into Windward and Leeward Islands. See Indies West.

Caribou, a considerable island in Lake Superior, toward the east end, claimed by the United States, as being wholly within their boundary line.

Carical, a town of Hindoostan, in the Carnatic, where the French had a settlement, which was taken by the British in 1760. It stands at the mouth of a branch of the Cavery, 8 m. S. of Tranquebar.

Carignan, or Carnignano, a town of Piedmont, in a district of the same name, in the south part of the province of Turin, with a castle, seated on the river Po, 12 m. S. of Turin. Pop. about 7,000.

Carimo, an island in the straits of Malacca, at the entrance into the China Sea, in the lat. of 1. N. and 104. E. long.

Carimon Java, a cluster of islands to the north of Java, at the principal of which ships touch for refreshment, in their voyage to Borneo. Long. 110. 12. E. lat. 5. 56. S.

Carinacou, the chief of the Grenadilla Islands, in the West Indies, 16 m. N. N. E. of Grenada. It produces much cotton, and has a good harbour. See Grenada.

Carini, a town of Sicily, seated on a point of land near the sea, about 16 m. N. W. of Palermo; it was the birth-place of Laïs.

Carinola, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, seated near Mount Massico, about 8 m. from the sea, and 25 m. N. W. of Naples.

Carinthia, Duchy of, an interior province or division of the Austrian empire, lying between the lat. of 46. 21. and 47. 6. N. and 12. 30. to 14. 50. of E. long. comprising an area of about 3,500 English sq. miles; the west end borders on the Tyrol, and it is bounded on the north by the bishopric of Salzburg and Upper Styria, east by Lower Styria and south by Upper Carniola, and the Venetian territory. The river Drave, which rises in the Tyrol and falls into the Danube at Belgrade, intersects Carinthia its whole extent from W. to E. receiving several tributary streams, both from the north and south; there are also several lakes. It is a mountainous and woody district, the mountains, yielding abundance of iron, lead, and copper, as well as quicksilver, bismuth, and zinc, and also the purest marbles, and a variety of gems; whilst the forests abound with the finest timber, the valleys afford some excellent pasturage, as well as fertile lands for tillage; but being edged in by mountains both on the north and south, whilst the remoteness of the course of the Drave precludes it from being availed of as a channel of conveyance, the rich store of natural products which this district contains are of little advantage either to the inhabitants or to the world. Could a water communication be obtained with the Adriatic, which, by a social and reciprocal order of society, might be effected from the west end of the province, either by the Tajamento, or the Piave; Carinthia might then rank among the most interesting and important districts of Europe; but under the bigoted, blind, and unsocializing policy of Austria, the inhabitants pass away their time in indolence and apathy, such supply of foreign productions as they get being obtained chiefly by means of cattle, which they drive to the markets of the towns of Italy. It is divided for local jurisdiction into two parts, Upper, West; and Lower, East; the former containing about 175,000 inhabitants, and the latter about 105,000. The principal towns in the upper part are Gmund and Villach, and in the lower, Clagenfurt, (which is the capital of the duchy) Wolsberg, Wolfenmarck, Pleyburg, &c. The inhabitants, who speak chiefly the Slavonian language, are bigoted adherents to the mummeries of the Romish church, and contribute to the Austrian government an impost of about £250,000 English per annum.

Carisbrook, a village contiguous to Newport, in the Isle of Wight, Eng. remarkable for its castle and church, which are both very ancient. The church had once a convent of monks annexed, part of which is now a farm-house, still retaining the name of the priory. The castle stands on an eminence, and was the prison of Charles I. in 1647, before he was delivered to the parliament forces. It is now nominally the seat of the governor of the Isle of Wight.

Caristo, or Castel Rosso, an episcopal town of Greece, at the south extremity of the island of Negropont. Long. 24. 35. E. lat. 38. 34. N.

Carlely, Old and New, two towns on the coast of West Bothnia, about 50 m. N. of Wasa.

Carlentini. See Lentini.

Carlingford, a populous parish and town in the county of Louth, Ireland. The parish comprises a promontory between Dundalk and Carlingford Bays; and in 1821, contained a population of 10,921. The town is situate on the south shore of the bay of Carlingford, and is noted for its oyster fishery; it is a corporate town, and returned two members to the Irish Parliament. It is 8 m. S. of Newry, and 52 N. of Dublin, and in 1821 contained 1,275 of the inhabitants of the parish.

Carlinwark, or Castle Douglas, a village of Scotland, at the N. corner of a lake of its name, 7 m. N. E. of Kirkecudbright, with a considerable manufacture of cotton. Pop. 750.

Carlisle, a city, bishop's see, and capital of the county of Cumberland, Eng. is situate at the junction of three rivers, the Calder, Petterill, and Eden, about 6 m. above the entrance of the united streams into the Solway Frith, and 13 m. from the S. W. frontier of Scotland. Carlisle has held a distinguished rank among the cities of England, in every period of British history, and is supposed to have been first founded by Lull, a native Briton, long before the irruption of the Romans into England. The contiguity of Carlisle to Scotland, during the less social habits and distinctiveness of interest, of the people of that country, frequently exposed it to their depredations; to avoid which, the Romans, on their possessing themselves of this part of England, erected a wall from Solway Frith to the German Ocean, which included Carlisle on one side, and Newcastle on the other, within its southern limits. After the departure of the Romans from England, Carlisle was surrounded with a wall, by Egfrid, king of Northumberland; and after the Norman conquest it was further protected by a citadel and castle, having three gates, called the English, Irish, and Scottish, with reference to their bearing on the side of each respective country, built by William Rufus. These defences, however, did not prevent it from falling into the possession of the Scots, who held it alternately with the English from the period of William Rufus, to that of Henry VII.; it was constituted a bishop's see by Henry I., destroyed by fire by the Scots, in the reign of Henry III., and experienced the same disaster twice in the following reign. In 1568 the castle was made the prison house of the unfortunate Mary of Scotland; in 1645 it surrendered, through famine, to the parliamentary forces; and in 1745 fell into the possession of the partizans of the Pretender, but was immediately after retaken by the duke of Cumberland, who demolished the gates and part of the wall; and it has since that period enjoyed an uninterrupted tranquillity. Since the commencement of the present century, it has undergone great improvement: on the site of the citadel two commodious court-houses have been erected, the county gaol rebuilt, a handsome stone bridge built over the Eden, with other improvements, have contributed to render it one of the most agreeable and interesting cities of England. The castle is still kept in repair, and serves, with other purposes, for a magazine, and an armoury of about 10,000 stand of arms. The cathedral is a stately and venerable edifice, partly of Saxon and partly of Gothic architecture; there are two other churches, as well as several sectarian meeting houses. The population, which in 1800 was 10,875, in 1816 was 12,531, and 1821, 15,476, exclusive of about 1,000 in an adjoining out-parish. The cotton manufacture has long been established here upon an extended scale, whilst the architectural and external appearances of the city indicate great prosperity. The conveyance of its commodities of commerce has been facilitated by a canal to the Solway Frith, and it is a point of union and interchange for the mails to all parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Its corporation consists of a mayor, 12 aldermen, &c. It returns two members to parliament, and is 101 m. S. E. of Glasgow, 91 S. by E. of Edinburgh, and 303 N. N. W. of London.

Carlisle, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass., 20 m. N. W. Boston. Pop. 566.

Carlisle, p.t. Schoharie Co. N. Y., 40 m. W. Albany. Pop. 1,748.

Carlisle, p.t. Cumberland Co. Pa., 18 m. S. W.

Harrisburg. It is a pleasant town regularly built, the houses are generally of brick or limestone. Here is a seminary called Dickinson College, which was founded in 1783. It was suspended for some years, but is now in operation. It has 4 instructors, 21 students, and libraries containing 7,000 volumes. There are two vacations in April and September, of ten weeks. Commencement is in September.

* * There are also townships called Carlisle in Ken. and Indiana.

Carlisle Bay, on the south coast of Jamaica west coast of Barbadoes; and island of Antigua.

Carlo, an island off the coast of East Bothnia, about 20 miles in circumference; it is opposite to the harbour of Leaborg.

Carlobago, a town of Morlachia, at the foot of a craggy rock, near the channel that separates the island of Pago from the continent. The commerce consists chiefly of wood. Pop. about 12,000. It is 46 m. S. E. of Buccari. Long. 15. 13. E. lat. 44. 55. N.

Carlo, St., a city in the interior of the new Colombian province of Apure, situate on one of the branches of the Apure River, about 85 m. S. S. W. of Valencia. The inhabitants are principally descendants of settlers from the Canary Isles, who are more industrious and social than those from Spain. Under the newly formed government of Colombia, St. Carlo promises to become a flourishing place, being situate in a very fertile country, affording great inducements to agricultural enterprise. Pop. in 1826, about 10,000; but since that period it has greatly increased.

* * There are several other towns in Old Spain, and her late dominions in America, dedicated to San Carlo, but they are all unimportant.

Carlo de Monterey, San, the principal settlement of New California, on the west coast of N. America, in the lat. of 36. 36. N. and 121. 34. of W. long. It is beautifully situated within a small bay of the same name, first discovered by Cabrillo in 1542. It was afterwards visited by the count de Monterey, from whom it received its present name. The forests and mountains preclude much intercourse with the interior; no does it appear that there is any considerable river either north or south, for some distance, other wise it would be an inviting spot for colonization.

Carlow, or Catherlogh, an interior county in the S. E. part of Ireland; it is bounded on the west by the Barrow River, which divides it from the county of Kilkenny, and is intersected on the east by the Slany River, which falls into Wexford Haven; it is one of the smallest counties of Ireland, but exceedingly fertile; its butter, out of the produce of which the absentee rentals and other exactions are mainly discharged, is the most esteemed of any in the country. The only towns besides Carlow, the capital, are Tullow and Hacketsown.

Carlow, the chief town of the preceding county, is situate on the east bank of the Barrow river, at the N. W. extremity of the county, bordering on Queen's county. In 1821 it contained 8,035 inhabitants; the ruins of a castle overhanging the river, the ruins of a very fine abbey, a convent, and Roman Catholic college, are the principal objects of interest in the town. It has also a respectable market-house, county court-house, gaol and cavalry barracks, and manufactures some woollen cloths. It is one of the 34 places in Ireland each of which returns one member to the parliament of the United Kingdom. It is 18 m. N. E. of the city of Kilkenny and 39 S. W. of Dublin.

Carlowitz, a town of Sclavonia, where a peace was concluded between the Turks and Germans, in 1669. It is seated on the south bank of the Danube, just below Peterwaraden, 38 m. N. W. of Belgrade. Pop. about 5,600.

Carlsbad, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Saatz, celebrated for its hot baths, discovered by the emperor Charles IV. as he was hunting. It is seated on the Topel, near its confluence with the Egra, 24 m. E. N. E. of Eger, and 70 S. E. of Dresden. Pop. about 3,000.

Carlsburg, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Bremen, on the river Geeste, at the mouth of the Weser, 30 m. N. by W. of Bremen. Long 8. 45. E. lat. 53. 32. N.

Carlsburg, a city of Transylvania. (See Weissenburg.)

Carlscrena, or Carlscreon, a city and seaport of Sweden, in Blekingen. It was founded in 1680 by Charles XI., who removed the fleet from Stockholm to this place, on account of its central situation, and the superiority of its harbour, the entrance of which is defended by two strong forts. The greatest part of the town is built of wood, and stands upon a small rocky island, which rises gently in a bay of the Baltic. The suburbs extend over another small rock, and along the mole, close to the basin where the fleet is moored; and are fortified, towards the land, by a stone wall. Here are excellent docks for the repairing and building of ships, foundries for cannon, and manufactures of gunpowder, ropes, sails, &c. The Admiralty Board was transferred back to Stockholm in 1770. The inhabitants are estimated at 15,000. It is 220 m. S. S. W. of Stockholm. Long. 15. 26. E. lat. 56. 7. N.

Carlskaven, or Carlskamm, a town of Sweden, in Blekingen, with a woolen manufacture, a forge for copper, and a timber yard, 22 m. W. of Carlscrena.

Carlsruhe, a town in the northern part of the territory of the grand duke of Baden, and recently adopted as the seat of government. It was first founded in 1715, but has not been of much importance until subsequent to the peace of 1814; it was taken possession of by the French in 1796; the streets are laid out in regular order; the ducal palace is in the centre of the town, and has a lofty spire, and being, as well as several other public buildings, with the houses generally, built of stone, the whole presents rather an imposing appearance. The population in 1826, amounted to about 12,000. It is about 40 m. N. by E. of Strasburg, and about the same distance W. by N. of Stuttgart.

Carlstadt, the capital of Croatia, with a fortress; seated on the Kulpa, a branch of the Save, at the influx of the Coruna, 180 m. S. by W. of Vienna, and 45 E. N. E. of Fiume.

Carlstadt, a town of Sweden, capital of Wermland, and a bishop's see. It stands on the north side of the lake Wener, and on the island of Tingwalla, which is formed by two branches of the Clara. The houses are built of wood, and painted; the episcopal palace is also of wood, and has an extensive front. The inhabitants carry on a trade in copper, iron, and wood across the lake. It is 155 m. west of Stockholm. Pop. about 1,500.

Carlstadt, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Wurtzburg, seated on the Maine, 13 m. N. by W. of Wurtzburg. It is now included in the Bavarian circle of Lower Maine. Pop. about 2,200.

Carlton, there are about 30 villages of this name in different parts of England, probably derived from the Saxon word Carle, implying a small or mean town.

Carmagnola, a fortified town of Piedmont, with a citadel, seated on a small river, which runs into the Po, 14 m. south of Turin. Pop. about 12,000.

Car. For some places that begin thus, see under Caor, and Kar.

Carmel, a mountain of Syria, in Palestine, about 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, on the north side of the Bay of Acre; noted for having been the retreat of the prophet Elias, and for a monastery of Carmelites. It is 50 m. N. of Jerusalem.

Carmel, p.t. Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 237.

Carmel, p.t. Putnam Co. New York, on the east bank of the Hudson, 88 m. south of Albany. Pop. 2,379.

Carmi, p.t. White Co. Illinois, on the Little Wabash.

Carmona, a town of Italy in Austrian Friuli, on a mountain near the river Indri, 7 m. N. W. of Goritz.

Carmona, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, with many remains of ancient walls, inscriptions, &c. The gate towards Seville is one of the most extraordinary pieces of antiquity in all Spain; and its castle, now in ruins, was formerly of immense extent. It is seated on a high hill, 24 m. E. N. E. of Seville.

Carnatic, a territory of Hindoostan extending along the east coast from Cape Comorin, the southern extremity of Asia, in the lat. of 8.4. N. to near the mouth of the Kristna in the lat. of 16. N. varying in breadth from 50 to 100 miles, bounded on the west by the Mysore, and on the E. for about two degrees of lat. by the Gulf of Manara and Palka Strait, which divides it from the north end of the island of Ceylon, the remainder of its eastern boundary being better known by the name of the coast of Coromandel. The principal towns on the coast, beginning from the south are Negapatam, Pondicherry, Madras, Pullicat, and Gangapatam, and those in the interior, beginning also from the south, are Tinevelly, Madura, Trichinopoly, Tanjore, Arcot, Nellore, and Ongole. Numerous streams and rivers from the westward intersect this territory, the principal of which are the Cauvery, Cuddalore, Paliare, and Pennar. The soil is various in quality, being in some places exceedingly fertile, and in others sandy and barren; the inhabitants are occasionally exposed to great privations for want of water. Since 1801, it has been uninterruptedly possessed by the British, and included in the presidency of Madras, which see.

Carnaul, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Dehli. Here in 1739, Kouli Khan gained a victory over the army of the great mogul; and in 1761, the Seiks, under Abdalla, defeated the Mahrattas. It is seated at the junction of the Hissar canal with the Jumna. It is 80 m. N. W. of Dehli.

Carnesville, p.t. Franklin Co. Geo. 114 m. N. Milledgeville.

Carmola, duchy of, a territory of the Austrian empire, lying between the lat. of 45. 30. and 46. 30. N. and 13. 25. and 15. 40. of E. long. comprising an area of about 4,600 square miles, and containing about 400,000 inhabitants. It is bounded on the north by Lower Carinthia the-south-west point jetting upon the gulf of Trieste. It is intersected from the north-west to the south-east by the Save river, which receives several tributary streams, both from the north and south. In feature, character, and productions, it is very similar to Carinthia, somewhat more diversified and fertile, and having the advantage of a nearer proximity to the sea, the inhabitants are somewhat more active and enterprising. It is divided into four parts, viz. Upper, north; Inner, south-west; Middle and Lower, south-east. Laybach, in the middle district, is the chief town. For commercial purposes it has the advantage of the port of Fiume, as well as Trieste.

Carthage, Cape, a promontory on the east coast of the kingdom of Tunis, near which stood the famous city of Carthage, razed by the Romans, and some of the ruins are to be seen on the coast. It is 10 m. N. E. of Tunis. Long. 10. 20. E. lat. 36. 50. N.

Carthagena, a seaport of Spain, in Murcia, built by Asdrubal, a Carthaginian general, and named after the city of Carthage. It is the see of a bishop, and a great mart for merchandise. It has the best harbour in Spain; also the most considerable docks and magazines. The principal crops of barilla are produced in its vicinity; and a fine red earth, called almagra, used in polishing mirrors, and preparing tobacco for snuff. Carthagena was taken by Sir John Leak in 1706, but the Duke of Brunswick retook it. It is seated on a gulf of the same name, 27 m. S. of Murcia. Long. 1. 0. W. lat. 37. 35. N. and 240. S. S. E. of Madrid. Pop. about 25,000.

Carthagena, a city of South America, in the New Colombian province of Magdalena. It is situate on an island off the shore of the Caribbean Sea, in the lat. of 10. 25. N. and 75. 27. of W. long. about 70 m. S. S. W. of the mouth of the Magdalena, and 180 N. N. E. of the Gulf of Darien. It has a commodious and safe harbour, and for nearly three centuries has ranked among the most considerable cities of America. It was the port first resorted to by galleons from Spain during the monopoly of the commerce of America with that country. It has experienced various alternations of fortune, having been several times captured, and was an object of severe contention between the royalist and republican forces from 1815 down to the period of the final extinction of Spanish domination in America in 1823. The island is united to the main land by two wooden bridges. The houses are chiefly built of stone, and it has several churches and convents, some of which are elegant edifices. Its harbour will doubtless contribute towards its retaining a high rank among the cities and seaports of the new republic. Pop. in 1826, about 26,000.

Cartmel, a town in Lancashire, Eng. It has a spacious old church, with a curious tower, being a square within a square, the upper part set diagonally within the lower. Casey, an interior county of the state of Kentucky. Pop. 4,342. Liberty is the chief town.

Cashan. See Kasan.

Cashel, a borough of Ireland, capital of the county of Tipperary, and an archbishop's see. It had formerly a wall; and part of two gates are still remaining. The old cathedral is supposed to have been the first stone edifice in Ireland. A synod was held here by Henry I. in 1158, by which the kingdom of Ireland was confirmed to him. The new cathedral is an elegant edifice; it has several other public buildings, and barracks for infantry. It is seated on the east bank of the Suir, 43 m. N. N. E. of Cork, and 77. S. S. W. of Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 5,974.

Cashgur, or Little Bokharia, a country of Usbec Tartary, which commences on the north and northeast of Cashmere in Hindoostan (from which it is separated by the Himmaleh mountains) and extends to 41. N. lat. Great part of it is a sandy desert; the other parts are populous and fertile. Here are mines of gold and silver, which the natives do not work, because they are employed wholly in feeding cattle. The musk-animals are found in this country. It likewise produces diamonds and several other precious stones. Ireen is the capital.

Cashgur, a city of Usbec Tartary, formerly the capital of the country of the same name. It has a good trade with the neighbouring countries, and stands at the foot of the Himmaleh Mountains, 11 m. S. of Ireen. Long. 73. 25. E. lat. 41. 30. N.

Cashmere, a province of Hindoostan, subject to the king of Candahar, or sultan of the Afghans, bounded on the west by the Indus, north by Mount Himmaleh, and east and south by Lahore. It is an elevated valley, 90 m. long and 50 broad, lying between the 34th and 35th deg. of N. lat. and 73. to 76. of E. long. surrounded by steep mountains, which tower above the regions of snow. The periodical rains, which almost deluge the rest of India, are shut out of Cashmere by the height of the mountains, so that only light showers fall here: but these are sufficiently abundant to feed some hundreds of cascades, which are precipitated into the valley. The soil is the richest that can be conceived, and its productions those of the temperate zone. Numerous streams, from all quarters of the valley, bring their tribute to the Chelum, a large navigable river, running from east to west, falling into the Indus. It contains several small lakes, some of which contain floating islands. But the country is subject to earthquakes; and to guard against their most terrible effects, all the houses are built of wood. Among other curious manufactures of Cashmere is that of shawls; and the delicate wool of which the finest are made is the product of a species of goat of this country, or of the adjoining Thibet. Here are bred a species of sheep, called Hundoo, which are employed in carrying burdens. The Cashmereans are stout and well made, but their features often coarse and broad: even the women are of a deep brown complexion; but they are gay and lively, and fond of parties of pleasure on their beautiful lakes. They have a language of their own, said to be an interior to that of the Sanscrit; and a religion too, it is thought, different from that of the Hindoos. The superstition of the inhabitants has multiplied the places of worship of Mahadeo, Beshan, and Brama. All Cashmere is holy land, and miraculous fountains abound. In addition to their shawls, in the manufacture of which about 16,000 looms are supposed to be employed, saffron, otto of roses, and some drugs, form the chief articles of commerce.

Cashmere, or Serinaghur, a city of Hindoostan, capital of the province or valley of Cashmere. Here are many fountains, reservoirs, and temples. The streets are narrow and dirty. The houses, many of them two and three stories high, are slightly built of brick and mortar, with a large intermixture of timber; and on the roof is laid a covering of fine earth, which is planted with a variety of flowers. This city is without walls, and seated on both sides of the Chelum, 285 m. E. by S. of Cabul. Long. 73. 11. E. lat. 33. 49. N.

Caspian Sea, a large inland sea of Western Asia, bounded on the south by the Persian province of Mazandran, in the lat. of 36. 40. and north by the Russian government of Astracan, in the lat. of 46. 50., thus being about 700 m. in length from south to north; its eastern and western boundaries are very irregular, extending from the long. of 46. 30. to 57., whilst the mean breadth does not exceed 260 miles. The eastern coast is indented by several bays, the more prominent of which are Calkan, in the lat. of 39., Alexander, in 43., and Mertvoi, or Koutjouk, in 45. N. The Persian province of Khorassan extends along the east coast to the Bay of Balkan, and further north the east coast is occupied by the Turcomans, Kirgees, and other Tartar tribes; and the west coast by the governments of Ghilan, Baku, Derbent, and the Caucasus. Numerous rivers flow into this sea from all points, the most important of which are the Oural, the Volga, and the former at its north extremity and the latter at the N. W. It contains several islands near both the eastern and western coasts, and the depth is very irregular, being in some places unfathomable with a line of 450 fathoms, whilst in other places the navigation is difficult with vessels drawing only 10 feet of water; the water is as salt as that of the ocean, with a bitter taste, which taste is ascribed to the prevalence of the naphtha on the western coast. (See Baku.) Its waters have no visible outlet, their equilibrium must therefore be maintained either by subterraneous channels, or by evaporation. Salmon, sturgeon, and other fish abound in all parts of this sea, and seals are extremely numerous. Of birds properly aquatic, it contains the grebe, the crested diver, the pelican, the cormorant, and several species of gull, while geese, ducks, storks, herons, crows, &c., frequent the shores. The Russians are the only people who derive much benefit from this great natural basin, although so well calculated to facilitate an extensive and reciprocal intercourse between all its surrounding nations; and were a communication to be effected with the Black Sea, by means of canals, Europe at large might participate in the advantages of an extended intercourse.

Castellon de la Plana, a town of Spain, in Valencia, 28 m. S. S. W. of the city of Valencia. It contains many vestiges of ancient grandeur, and is still populous, having upwards of 10,000 inhabitants.

Castelnaudary, a town of France, in the department of Aude, on an eminence, at the foot of which is the grand basin of the Canal Royal. It is 15 miles west of Carcassonne. Pop. about 8,000.

Caster, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers, seated on the river Eret, 9 m. E. of Juliers.

Castiglione, a town of Tuscany, in the Siennese, on a lake of the same name, which communicates with the sea, and produces much salt. It is 12 m. S. by E. of Massa.

Castiglione, a fortified town of Italy, in the Mantuan, with a castle. It was taken by the Austrians, in 1701; and the French defeated them near it, in 1706, and again in 1796. It is 20 m. N. W. of Mantua. Pop. about 4,000.

Castile, the principal and most opulent of the kingdoms into which Spain was formerly divided. It now forms the two provinces of Old and New Castile; the former having been recovered from the Moors some time before the latter.

Castile, Old, a province of Spain, bounded on the north by Asturias, and Biscay, east by Navarre and Arragon, south by New Castile, and west by Leon, being in extreme length from north to south about 240 miles, and 100 in mean breadth. It is subdivided into four inferior provinces, after the name of the four chief towns. The superficies and population of each province, in 1810, were as follows: viz.

	Sq. leag.	Inhab.
Burgos - - N.	642	470,588
Soria - - - E.	341	198,107
Segovia - - S.	290	164,007
Avilla - S. W.	215	118,061

Old Castile - - 1498 950,763

The Ebro rises on the north part of Burgos, and forms the boundary of Old Castile, on the side of Biscay and Navarre. Several streams fall into the Ebro, but the waters of Old Castile run chiefly to the westward, into the Douro. The chief productions of this part of Spain is wood, of which commodity about 6,000,000 lbs. are annually exported to England. King-craft and priestcraft preclude all social exertion in this as well as every other part of Spain.

Castile, New, lies to the south of the preceding province, and is divided into five inferior provinces as follows: viz.

	Sq. leag.	Inhab.
Guadalaxara N.	163	121,115
Madrid - N. W.	110	228,598

Cuenca - - E.	945	294,397
Toledo - - S. W.	734	370,841
La Mancha - S.	631	205,548

New Castile - - 2583 1,220,114

The Tagus, Guadiana, and Xucar, all afford to New Castile the advantage of a facility of intercourse, which, to a social community, would be highly appreciated, but to a besotted and priest-ridden people they are of no avail. See each of the inferior provinces.

Castillon, a town of France, in the department of Gironde, seated on the Dordogne, 25 m. E. of Bordeaux. Pop. 2,600.

Castine, a seaport of the state of Maine, chief town of Hancock county, situate on Penobscot Bay, 65 m. W. S. W. of Machias. It has an excellent harbour and commands the entrance to the Penobscot. Pop. 1,155. It was taken by the British in 1814, but restored at the peace in 1815. Long. 69. 0. W. lat. 44. 26. N.

Castle Cary, a town in Somersetshire, Eng. 12 m. S. E. of Wells, and 113 W. by S. of London. Pop. 1,627.

Castle Rising, a borough in Norfolk, Eng. The Market is now disused, its harbour choked up, and the castle, whence it has its name, is in ruins. It, however, returns two members to parliament. Pop. 343. It is seven miles N. E. of Lynn, and 103 N. N. E. of London.

*. * There are 24 other towns and villages in England to the names of which Castle is prefixed.

Castlebar, a parish and town in the county of Mayo, Ireland. The parish, exclusive of the town in 1821 contained a population of 4,169, and the town 5,404, a considerable portion of whom are employed in the linen manufacture. The town is also the seat of assize, and a chief place in the county, having a spacious church, a handsome court-house, gaol, and cavalry barracks. It is situate at the east end of a small lake, 11 m. E. by N. of West-port and 113 W. by N. of Dublin.

*. * There are about 20 other parishes, towns, and villages, in different parts of Ireland, to the names of which Castle is prefixed, but none of any particular importance.

Castleton, a village on the peak of Derbyshire, five miles north of Tideswell, Eng. It is situate at the foot of a rock, above 250 feet high, on which are the remains of a castle, ascribed to William FEVEREL, natural son of the conqueror. Three of the seven wonders of the peak are in its neighbourhood; the Devil's Cave, Mam Tor, and Elden hole. The first is in a cavern in the rock above mentioned, whose arched entrance is 42 feet high and 120 wide. It becomes narrower as it proceeds, and the roof descends to within two feet of the surface of a brook; this being passed over, another large cavern succeeds, with several high openings in the roof. It descends again to a second brook; after which is a third cavern, called Roger Rain's House, because of the perpetual dripping: the length of the whole cavern is 617 yards. Mam Tor, a mile west of the village, is a mountain, 1,300 feet above the level of the valley on the top and sides of which is a camp, supposed to be Roman: it overtops the whole Peak country; and the vulgar story is, that this hill is continually crumbling, without being diminished. Elden hole, a mile south of Mam Tor, is a perpendicular gulf or chasm in a limestone rock, the depth of which is unfathomable its sides being so very shelving and irregular, it has been plumbed from 192 to 295 yards, 70 of which seemed to be in water. Pop. of the village in 1821, 993.

Castleton, a township in the parish of Rochdale, Lancashire, Eng. Pop. in 1821, 7,894. See Rochdale.

Castletown, the capital of the Isle of Man, near the south coast, with a rocky and shallow harbour, which checks its commerce, and renders it inferior to Douglas in most respects. In the centre of the town, on a high rock, is Castle Rushen, a magnificent pile, built of free stone, in 960, by Guttred, a prince of the Danish line, who lies buried in the edifice. It is occupied by the governor of the island, and on one side of it are the chancery offices, and good barracks. Near the town is a fine quarry of black marble, whence the steps to St. Paul's church, in London, were taken. Long. 4. 38. W. lat. 55. 4. N. Pop. in 1821, 2,036.

Castletown, a town of Richmond Co. N. Y. on Staten Island, at the entrance of New York harbour, where is the quarantine Ground and Marine Hospital for that city. Pop. 2,204.

Castres, a city of France, capital of the department of Tard, and lately an episcopal see. In the reign of Louis XIII. it was a kind of protestant republic; but in 1629, its fortifications were demolished. It is the birthplace of Rapin Thoyras and M. Dacier, has a good trade, and contains a number of beautiful edifices and about 12,500 inhabitants. In the vicinity turquoise stones have been found. It is seated in a fine valley, on the Agout, 36 m. E. of Toulouse.

Castries, Bay of, a bay on the north-east coast of Chinese Tartary, in the strait of Saghalen, visited by Peyrouse. Long. 142. 1. E. lat. 51. 29. N.

Castro, a town of Italy, in the patrimony of St. Peter, capital of a duchy of its name. It is 56 m. N. W. of Rome.

Castro, a town of Naples, in Terra d'Otranto, six miles S. S. W. of Otranto.

Castro, a town of the island of Chiloe, with a castle, which commands the harbour. It is 180 m. S. of Valdivia. Long. 75. 5. W. lat. 42. 4. S.

Castro, the ancient Mytilene, a seaport and capital of the island of Metelin, with two harbours, one of which will admit large vessels. There are two castles, the one ancient, the other modern, in each of which is a Turkish governor and commander. Considerable vestiges still remain of its former grandeur and magnificence. The chief trade is ship-building. It is 80 m. W. of Adramitti, and 60 N. W. of Smyrna. Long. 26. 39. E. lat. 39. 14. N.

Castro de Uriales, a town of Spain, in Biscay, with a castle and an arsenal, on the seacoast, 22 m. N. W. of Bilbao.

Castro Giovanni, a town of Sicily, in Val di Demona. It was the ancient Enna, famous for the worship of Ceres and Proserpine. It is 40 m. W. of Catano. Pop. about 12,000.

Castro Marim, a strong town of Portugal, in Algarve, seated near the mouth of the Guadiana, 15 m. E. N. E. of Tavira, and 62 S. by E. of Beja. Long. 7. 20. W. lat. 37. 12. N.

Castro Reale, a town of Sicily, in Val di Demona, 15 m. W. of Messina. Pop. about 8,000.

Castro Verde, a town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, on the Corbes, 18 m. S. S. W. of Beja.

Castro Vireyna, a town of Peru, in the province of Guamanga, noted for good tobacco and fine wool. It is 125 m. S. E. of Lima. Long. 74. 45. W. lat. 13. 50. S.

There are several other towns in Italy, Spain, and Portugal, to the names of which Castro is prefixed.

Castria, a town of Austrian Istria, a few miles W. of Fiume.

Castrop, a town of Westphalia, in the county of Mark, 7 m. W. of Dortmund.

Castropol, a town of Spain, in Asturias, 14 m. N. E. of Mondonedo.

Carroll, a county of North Carolina, bordering on Pittsylvania county, Virginia. It is a square of 20 miles each way, intersected by numerous streams falling into the Roanoke. Pop. 15,499. The principal town is Pittsborough.

Cat Island, the name at present given to Guanahani, or St. Salvador, one of the Bahamas and the spot when the first discovery of America was made. Columbus discovered this island on the 12th of October 1492, landed upon it and took formal possession in the name of the King and Queen of Spain. The island is about 60 m. long and 15 wide, but is not a place of any commercial or political importance. It is in lat. 24. 30. N. long 75. W.

Catabamba, or Cotobamba, an interior town of Peru, in a district of the same name, in the 14th degree of south latitude. The town is seated on the south-west bank of the Apurimac River about 60 m. S. of Cuzco.

Catabaw, properly Catawba, a river of the United States, rising from numerous sources in the north-west part of North Carolina, in the lat. of 36. N. and 82. of W. long. running in a S. S. E. direction into South Carolina, in which state it is called the Wateree until it reaches the centre of the state, where it is joined by the Saluda or Congaree and numerous other streams from the S. W. where it is called the Santee, falling into the Atlantic Ocean, in the lat. of 33. 5. N. and 79. 15. of W. long. about 40 m. N. of Charleston, with the harbour of which city it is connected by a canal from a point 50 m. above its entrance into the sea.

Catabaw, or Catawba, an Indian town on the banks of the preceding river at its entrance into South Carolina. The native inhabitants amount to about 450, the remains of a once powerful nation, who have degenerated in physical energy, and progressively decreased in number, since their association with Europeans.

Catahoula, or Ocatahool, a parish in the western district of Louisiana, about 60 miles in extent from north to south, and 30 in mean breadth; it is intersected by the Washita and several other rivers and lakes. Pop. 2,576. A town of the same name, on the west bank of the Washita, is 260 m.

N. W. of New Orleans, by the course of the Mississippi, and about 160 in a meridional line.

Catalonia, a province of Spain, lying along the shore of the Mediterranean, in a N. N. E. direction from the lat. of 40. 30. to 42. 30. N. separated from France on the north by the Pyrenees, and bounded on the west by Arragon, being in the shape of a right angled triangle, of which the Pyrenees are the base, and the seacoast the hypotenuse. It contains 1,003 square leagues, and in 1810, a population of 858,818. Barcelona is the chief town; the other towns of note being Tortosa, Lerida, Tarragona, Manresa, Gerona, and Rosas. The river Ebro intersects the south end of the province, and the united streams of the Pallaresa and Segre run from the Pyrenees into the Ebro near the frontier of Arragon. The Llobregat, Ter, and several other streams of minor note, fall into the Mediterranean. The Catalonians are the bravest, and least bigoted, and the most active and enterprising of the Spanish people; but the subduing tendency of the national policy of Spain precludes all advance towards social improvement. The chief surplus products of the soil of Catalonia are cork, nuts and brandy; woollens, hardwares, and cutlery, are manufactured for distribution over the other parts of Spain, and partially for exportation.

Catamandoo, a city, and capital of Nepaul, containing about 50,000 inhabitants, 200 m. due north of Patna. See Nepaul.

Catanduanes, one of the Philippine Islands, lying off the S. E. coast of Luzon; it is about 30 m. in extent from north to south, and 20 in breadth; the inhabitants are much employed in building of boats for the neighbouring islanders.

Catania, a celebrated city on the east coast of Sicily; it is a place of great antiquity, but has suffered greatly, as well by the eruptions of Mount Ætna, as by earthquakes; it was nearly overwhelmed with lava from the former, in 1669, and in 1693 an earthquake destroyed a great portion of the city, and buried 18,000 persons in its ruins; it appears, however, to have risen from each succeeding disaster with increasing splendour, and in 1825 ranked among the finest cities in Europe. It is the see of a bishop, and seat of the only university in Sicily. The principal square, formed by the cathedral, college, and town-hall, is very grand; it has about 30 convents and 50 churches, some of them fine edifices, a museum of natural history and antiquities, the remains of a Roman amphitheatre, and other vestiges of ancient splendour, render it a place of peculiar interest to an intelligent and enquiring traveller. It is situate at the foot of Mount Ætna, on the south side, 35 m. N. of Syracuse, in the lat. of 37. 26. N. and 15. 15. of E. long. Pop. about 50,000.

Catanzaro, a city of Naples, capital of Calabria Ulteriore, and the see of a bishop. The chief manufacture is silks of various kinds, and these, with corn and oil, are the principal articles of trade. It is seated on a mountain, near the gulf of Squillace, 42 m. S. E. of Cosenza. Long. 15. 48. E. lat. 39. 0. N.

Catawissa, or Hughesburg, a town of Pennsylvania, in Northumberland county, situate at the mouth of the Catawissa Creek, on the east branch of the Susquehanna, 25 m. E. N. E. of Sunbury, and 100 N. W. of Philadelphia.

Catharinburg, a town of Russia, capital of a province of the same name, in the government of Perm. The chief gold mines of Siberia are in its vicinity, and above 100 founderies, chiefly for copper and iron. It is seated at the foot of the Ural Mountains, on the east side, near the source of the Iset, 310 m. W. S. W. of Tobolsk. Long 61. 25. E. lat. 56. 45. N.

Catharine, p.t. Tioga Co. N. Y. 210 m. W. Albany. Pop. 2,064.

Catharinenslaf, a government of the Russian empire, divided into two provinces, namely, Catharinenslaf, which includes New Russia; and the late government of Asoph, and Taurida, which includes the Crimea.

Catharinenslaf, a town of Russia, capital of a government of the same name. It was built by the late empress Catharine, and is seated near the confluence of the Kiltzin and Samara, with the Dnieper, 178 m. N. E. of Cherson. Long. 35. 15. E. lat. 47. 23. N.

Catherine, St. the principal island on the coast of the south part of Brasil, with a harbour defended by several forts. It is 27 miles long, but not more than 6 broad, but exceedingly fertile; it forms a separate government of the Brazilian empire. Pop. about 30,000. There is a town of the same name, the chief place on the island. Long. 49. 17. W. lat. 27. 35. S.

Catrine, a village of Scotland, 14 miles east of Ayre, on the river Ayr. Here is a flourishing cotton manufacture.

Catskill, p.t. Green Co. New York, situate on the west bank of the Hudson River, nearly opposite to the town of Hudson, and 31 m. S. of Albany. Pop. 4,861.

Catskill Mountains, a branch of the Shawangunk ridge, being a detached portion of the great Apalachian chain of mountains; forking off from the ridge toward the north near the Hudson, and afterwards making a bend towards the west. The general height of these mountains is about 3,000 feet, and they abound with the most beautiful scenery. The quarter most visited by travellers is at the eastern extremity of the ridge, where on a spot called the Pine Orchard, 2,274 feet above the waters of the Hudson, has lately been erected an elegant hotel called the Catskill Mountain House.

Few places of fashionable resort present stronger attractions to the tourist than this spot. A few years ago this delightful retreat was almost unknown and rarely visited, but by the hardy hunter in pursuit of the deer, the bear, and the wolf, who had hitherto maintained undisturbed possession of its cliffs and caverns. At length the tale of the extent and beauty of the prospect and the grandeur of the scenery, drew the attention of individuals of taste, and the glowing descriptions they gave, effectually roused the attention of the public. Each successive season the number of visitors increased till the temporary buildings, at first erected for their accommodation, gave place to a splendid Hotel, 140 feet in length and four stories high. This establishment was erected by the Mountain Association, at an expense of about $22,000. It occupies the Eastern verge of a table of rock some six acres in extent. An excellent line of stages is established to this place from Catskill, a distance of twelve miles. The ride to the foot of the mountain is not particularly interesting—but as you ascend, every moment develops something magnificent and new. The sides of the mountain, steep and seemingly inaccessible, tower far above you, clothed in the rich, deep foliage peculiar to such regions; while below your path a clear stream runs, one moment bubbling over its rocky bed, and the next leaping down in cascades to the valley. The road is extremely circuitous, and so completely hemmed in by the luxuriant growth of forest trees that the traveller is for a long time unable to judge of his progress in the ascent by any view of the country he has left. At an abrupt angle of the road, however, he obtains at once a full view of the Mountain House—perched like the eyrie of an eagle among the clouds—or rather like the enchanted castle in a fairy tale; seemingly inaccessible to mortal foot, still it reminds him of such terrestrial comforts as are sure to be acceptable after exercise in the pure air of the mountains. Another turn and it again disappears, and the traveller next finds himself on the level rock of the Pine Orchard, and approaching the Hotel from the rear. A moment more and he is on the edge of the precipice in front of the noble building. From this lofty eminence all inequalities of surface are over-looked. A seemingly endless succession of woods and waters—farms and villages, towns and cities, are spread out as upon a boundless map. Far beyond rise the Tagkanuc Mountains, and the highlands of Connecticut and Massachusetts. To the left, and at a still greater distance, the Green Mountains of Vermont stretch away to the north, and their blue summits and the blue sky mingle together. The beautiful Hudson, studded with islands, appears narrowed in the distance, with steam-boats almost constantly in sight; while vessels of every description, spreading their white canvasses to the breeze, are moving rapidly over its surface, or idly loitering in the calm. These may be traced to the distance of nearly seventy miles with the naked eye; and again at times all below is enveloped in dark cloud and rolling mist, which, driven about by the wind, is continually assuming new, wild, and fantastic forms.

From the Pine Orchard a ride or walk of a mile or two brings you to the Kauterskill Falls. Here the outlet of two small lakes, leaps down a perpendicular fall of 180 feet—then glides away through a channel worn in the rock to a second fall of 80 feet. Below this it is lost in the dark ravine through which it finds its way to the valley of the Catskill. The waterfall, bold as it is, forms however, but one of the many interesting features of this scene. Standing on the edge of the first fall, you look down into a dreary chasm whose steep sides, covered with the dark ivy and the thick foliage of summer, seem like a green bed prepared for the reception of the waters. Making a circuit from this spot, and descending about midway of the first fall, you enter a footpath which conducts into an immense natural amphitheatre behind the waterfall. The effect of this scene is imposing beyond description. Far over your head projects a smooth surface of rock, forming a magnificent ceiling to this amphitheatre. In front is the ever-falling water, and beyond, the wild mountain dell with the clear blue sky above.

Cattaraugus, a county toward the west extremity of the state of New York, bordering on Pennsylvania; it is a square of about 35 miles each way. The Alleghany River, falling into the Ohio, is, however, navigable for more than 30 miles within this county, which will doubtless tend to excite industry, and thereby increase its population; it is bounded on the north by Catta-raugus River, or creek, which falls into the east end of Lake Erie. Pop. 16,726. Elliottsville is the chief town.

Cattaro, a town of Dalmatia, with a castle, seated on a gulf of its name, in the Adriatic, which forms two extensive and secure harbours. The town is built at the extremity of the inner basin, surrounded by rocks, and strongly fortified. It is 24 m. S. of Scutari. Long. 19. 15. E. lat. 42. 12. N.

Cattgat, a gulf of the German Ocean, between Sweden and Jutland, extending for about 120 m. from north to south, and 70 from E. to W., through which the Baltic Sea is entered by three straits, called the Sound, the Great Belt, and the Little Belt.

Cattiaio, a town of Italy, in the Paduan, 5 m. S of Padua.

Catterick, a village in West Yorkshire, Eng. near Richmond. It has a bridge over the river Swale, and a Roman highway crossed the river here, on the banks of which are the foundations of great walls, and a mount cast up to a vast height.

Catwyck, a village of South Holland, on the German Ocean, near which the river Rhine is lost in the sands. It is six miles north by west of Leyden.

Cattenellenbogen, or Kutzenellenbogen, a town and castle of Germany, in the circle of Upper Rhine, which gives name to a county. The town has an iron mine near it, and is 10 m. N. E. of St. Goar.

Caub, a town of Germany, with a citadel; seated on the Rhine, 2 m. N. by E. of Bacharach.

Cauca, a river of Colombia, rising near Popayan, in the lat. of 3. N. running north through the valley of Popayan, between the 2d and 3d ridges of the Andes, falling into the Magdalena about 120 m. above the entrance of that river into the Caribbean Sea in the lat. of 11. N.

Caucasia, a government of Asiatic Russia, divided into the two provinces of Astracan and Caucasus. The province of Caucasus comprises the Cuban, and all that district to the east and south, now in the possession of Russia, between the rivers Don and Cuban, and between the Black Sea and the Caspian, extending as far as the confines of Georgia.

Caucasus, a chain of mountains extending from the mouth of the Cuban, in the Black Sea, to the mouth of the Kur, in the Caspian. Their tops are always covered with snow; and the lower parts abound in honey, corn, wine, fruits, gum, hogs, and horned cattle. The Caucasian mountains are inhabited by seven distinct nations, each speaking a different language: namely, the Turcomans, the Abkaks, the Circassians, the Osmi, the Kisti, the Lesgius, and the Georgians.

Caudefec, a town of France, in the department of Lower Seine, 18 m. W. by N. of Rouen. Pop. about 3,000.

Caudette, a town of Spain on the frontiers of Murcia and Valencia, about 50 m. W. of Denia. Pop. about 6,000.

Caudhuly, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Coimbatore. It is the first place of any note above the Ghauts, and a principal thoroughfare between the country below and that above those mountains. The inhabitants are chiefly traders. It is 60 m. S. E. of Seringapatam.

Cazamarco, a town of Peru, capital of a territory of its name, in the province of Truxillo. Here the Spanish general, Pizarro, in 1532, perfidiously seized the Inca, Atahualpa, and the next year, after a mock trial, caused him to be publicly executed. It is 70 m. N. E. of the city of Truxillo. Long. 78. 20. W. lat. 7. S.

Cazamarquilla, another considerable city of Peru, also in the province of Truxillo, about 40 m. S. S. E. of Cazamarca.

Caxtambo, another city of Peru, in the province of Tarma, about 200 m. S. by E. of Cazamarquilla, and 140 N. by E. of Lima.

Caxton, a town in Cambridgeshire, Eng. 10 m. W. by S. of Cambridge, and 49 N. of London. It was the birthplace of Caxton, who introduced the art of printing into England; and also of Matthew Paris, the historian. Pop. about 400.

Cayamba, a town of Peru, in the province of Quito, 30 m. N. E. of Quito.

Cayenne, a rich town and island on the coast of Guiana, capital of the French settlements there, bounded on the west by the Dutch colony of Surinam. The island is about 50 miles in circumference, separated from the continent by a very narrow channel. The surface is low and marshy, and covered with forests. Cayenne pepper, sugar, coffee, cloves, and the singularly elastic gum called caoutchouc, are the principal commodities. The French settled here in 1625, but left it in 1654, and it was successively in the possession of the English, French, and Dutch; but the latter were expelled by the French in 1677. It surrendered to the English in 1809, but was restored to France at the peace of 1814. Long. 52. 15. W. lat. 4. 56. N. See Guiana.

Cayte, a town of Brazil, in the government of Para, near the mouth of the Cateyera, 15 miles N. E. of Para. Long. 46. 12. W. lat. 0. 56. S.

Cayuga, a county of the state of New York, the north end of which borders on Lake Ontario, extending south about 50 miles, and being about ten miles in mean breadth, it contains about 500 square miles. Pop. 47,947. Auburn is the chief town.

Cayuga Lake, bounds the west side of the above county for about 25 miles, extending about 10 miles further south into Tompkins county. It is three to four miles wide, and discharges its waters at the north end through Seneca River into Lake Ontario, from which the north end of Cayuga Lake is distant about 25 miles. The Erie canal runs past, near the north end of Cayuga. There is a town of the same name on the east bank, five miles west of Auburn.

Cayuta, p.t. Tioga Co. New York, 173 m. W. Albany. Pop. 642.

Cazauborn, a town of France, department of Gers, on the banks of the Adour, 80 m. N. N. E. of Bayonne.

Cazenovia, the chief town of Madison county, state of New York, situate on the bank of a small lake, a few miles south of the line of the Erie canal, 130 m. W. by N. of Albany. Pop. 4,344.

Cazeres, a town of France, in the department of Upper Garonne, about 35 m. S. W. of Toulouse.

Cecil, a county of the state of Maryland, at the head of Chesapeake Bay, being about 25 miles from north to south, and 15 in mean breadth, forming the north-east extremity of the state; bounded on the east by Newcastle county, Delaware, and west by the Susquehanna River. Pop. 15,432. Elkton, is the chief town.

Cecil, t. Washington Co. Pa

Cazimir, a town of Little Poland, in the palatinate of Lublin, seated on the Vistula, 80 m. E. of Zarnaw. Long. 22. 3. E. lat. 51. 0. N.

Cedar Creek, a water of James River, in Virginia, in the county of Rockbridge; remarkable for its natural bridge, justly regarded as one of the most magnificent natural curiosities in the world. It is a huge rock, in the form of an arch, 90 feet long, 60 wide, and from 40 to 60 deep, lying over the river more than 200 feet above the surface of the water, supported by abutments as light and graceful as though they had been the work of Corinthian art. This bridge gives name to the county, and affords a commodious passage over a valley, which cannot be crossed elsewhere for a considerable distance. It is about 100 m. W. of Richmond, and 160 S. S. W. of Washington city.

Cedar Point, a seaport of Maryland, in Charles county. The exports are chiefly tobacco and maize. It is seated on the Potomac, 12 miles below Port Tobacco, and 40 south by east of Washington.

Cedogna, a town of Naples, in Principato Ulteriore, at the foot of the Apennines, 20 m. N. N. E. of Conza.

Cefalonia, or Cephalonia, the most considerable of the Ionian Isles, in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Greece, opposite the gulf of Lepanto. It is 40 miles long, and from 10 to 20 broad, fertile in oil and muscadine wine. The capital is of the same name, on the south-east coast. Long. 20. 56. E. lat. 38. 12. N.

Cefalu, a seaport of Sicily, in Val di Demona, and a bishop's see, with a castle; seated on a promontory, 40 m. E. by S. of Palermo. Long. 13. 58. E. lat. 38. 15. N. Pop. about 5,500.

Celano, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Ulteriore, near a lake of the same name, 30 miles in circumference. It is 15 m. S. of Aquila.

Celaya, or Silao, a town of Mexico, situate on a spacious plain 6,000 feet above the level of the sea, a few miles N. N. W. of the city of Guanajuato.

Celbridge, a town of Ireland, in the county of Kildare, 10 miles W. of Dublin. Pop. in 1820, 1,260.

Celebes, or Macassar, a very irregular and singularly shaped island in the Eastern Sea, lying between Borneo and the Moluccas. The centre of the island is intersected by the line of 120. of E. long. and 2. of S. lat. From this centre four tongues of territory project, terminating as follows viz.

	Lat.	Long.
1st, at Bontham,	5. 34. S.	120. 32. E.
2d, at Cape Lessen,	4. 54. S.	121. 28. E.
3d, at Cape Talabo,	0. 48. S.	123. 57. E.
4th, at Cape Rivers,	1. 15. N.	120. 34. E.

5th, from Cape Rivers another tongue projects eastward, in nearly a straight line wholly north of the equator to the long. of 125. 5. E. The centre from whence the tongues respectively diverge, comprises an extent of territory of about 150 miles from north to south, and 110 from west to east, the mean breadth of the projections, each being about 55 miles, gives an aggregate extent of surface of about 67,000 square miles. The Portuguese, who first doubled the Cape of Good Hope into the eastern seas in 1493, formed a settlement upon the south-west point of Celebes in 1512. The Portuguese were expelled by the Dutch in 1667, by whom the possession was called Macassar. They held it undisturbed till after the commencement of the present century, about which period the English, in their turn, with one or two unimportant exceptions, dispossessed every European state of their Asiatic possessions; but all the former possessions of the Dutch in the eastern seas were restored by the English at the peace of 1815, and confirmed to them by treaty in 1825. Celebes abounds in all the varieties of productions common to its climate and geographical position. Minerals, gems, animals, vegetables, esculent, ambrosial, and medicinal; as well as reptiles, birds, and fishes, all abound to display the varied, liberal, and unsparing hand of creation, and to afford to man all the means of the highest possible degree of human enjoyment. Yet these advantages are balanced by some dreadful scourges. The great boa constrictor is an inhabitant of this island. He is 25 or 30 feet long, and proportionally thick. He is the most gluttonous and rapacious, as well as the most formidable of the serpent tribe. He has been known to kill and devour a buffalo. His strength is prodigious, and he crushes his prey within the twinings of his enormous folds. A Malay sailor in 1799 was seized by a boa in this island, and almost instantaneously crushed to death. Before swallowing his prey, the serpent licks it over and covers it with a gelatinous substance, to make it slip down his jaws; in this condition he will swallow a mass three times his own thickness. When gorged in this manner with food, they crawl into some retreat, and fall into a stupid heavy sleep, in which they become so unwieldy and helpless that they may be easily killed. Whilst the inhabitants are said to be brave, ingenious, high-spirited, daring in adventure, enterprising in pursuit, and honest in dealing, and that to a degree which renders their martial character celebrated all over the eastern seas, they are, on the other hand, said to be suspicious, cruel, and ferocious. An acquaintance with the natives of those islands in the eastern seas, with whom Europeans appear to have had no trading intercourse, leads to infer that the extension of the commerce of Europeans, with all their pretensions to scientific attainment and social refinement, has operated as a curse rather than a blessing; rapine and cruelty, subjugation and misery, having marked its progress, and followed in its train, wherever it has extended itself. Such cannot be necessary consequence of commercial intercourse; and when reciprocity and justice, instead of selfishness and chicanery, shall constitute the basis of its pursuit, Celebes, in common with the whole eastern Archipelago, will afford an unbounded field for exertion and enterprise. The total population of Celebes is supposed to amount to about 3,000,000, under the surveillance of several separate rajahs, among whom polygamy and the other sensualities of Mahometanism generally prevail. The following are the principal towns or ports in each of the five projections previously described:

- 1st, Bonthin, Macassar, Maros, and Tannette.
- 2nd, Mountainous, and very thinly inhabited.
- 3rd, Ditto, ditto, Waya and Tayabo.
- 4th, Palos, Dondó; fine and fertile.
- 5th, Bool, Castricom, and Manado.

And of the main part of the island are Bonny, Sofin, and Mamoojoo. The principal river of the island, the Chirrana, falls into the Bay of Bony or Bugges, which see; and see also Tobo Tominie, Cambyna, and Bouton, other bays and islands connected with Celebes.

Cell, or Maria Zell, a town of Stiria, with a celebrated abbey, seated on the Salza, 17 m. N. N. E. of Bruck.

Ceneda, a town of Italy, in Trevisano, 18 m. N. of Treviso.

Cenis, a mountain of the Maritime Alps, in Savoy, which is a noted passage from the north of France to Turin. The summit of the pass, which is about 9,000 feet above the level of the sea, is 35 m. W. N. W. of Turin. The facility of intercourse by this route was much improved by Napoleon.

Centre, a county of the W. District of Pennsylvania, being in conformity with its name, in the centre of the state. Its shape is an irregular square, about 35 m. each way. The main ridge of the Alleghany Mountains terminates in a bluff towards the north side of the county, near to which runs the west branch of the Susquehanna River, a branch of which bounds all the west side of the county, Bald Eagle Creek intersecting it from S. to N. eastward of the mountain ridge. Pop. 18,765. Bellefonte, is the chief town.

Centre Harbour, p.t. Strafford Co. N. H. 110 m. from Boston: 70 from Portsmouth. Pop. 577.

There are 8 towns called Centre, and 17 called Centerville, in the U. States.

Cephalonia. See Cefalonia and Ionia.

Ceram, one of the Molucca Isles, extending from 128. to 130. 51. of E. long. being about 35 m. in mean breadth between the lat. of 2. 51. and 3. 55. S. The island of Amboyna, on which the Dutch have their principal spice plantations, lies off the south-west end of Ceram, on which island, they endeavoured to destroy all the spice trees, and succeeded to a very great extent. Sago is now the prominent production of Ceram. The salsagan, whose edible nests command such an exorbitant price in China is common in the island.

Cerdagna, a district of the Pyrenees, partly in Spain, in the province of Catalonia, and partly in France, in the department of Eastern Pyrenees. Puycerda is the capital of the Spanish part, and Mont Louis of the French.

Cere, St. a town of France, in the north-east corner of the department of Lot, 37 m. N. E. of Cahors, and 280 south of Paris. Pop. about 4,000.

Cerenza, or Gercanaz, a town of Naples, in Calabria Citeriore, seated on a rock, 10 m. north by west of Severino.

Ceret, a town of France, in the department of Eastern Pyrenees, with a magnificent bridge of one arch over the Tet. Here the commissioners of France and Spain met, in 1660, to settle the limits of the two kingdoms. In 1794, the French defeated the Spaniards near this town. It is 14 m. W. S. W. of Perpignan.

Cerignola, a town of Naples, in Capitanata, celebrated by Horace for its excellent bread. Near this town is the ancient Salapia, the ruins of which are still called Salpe. It is 20 m. south of Manfredonia. Pop. about 12,000.

Cerigo, (the ancient Cythera), an island of the Mediterranean, lying off the S. E. promontory of the Mores; it formerly belonged to the Venetians; the French took possession of it in 1797; it surrendered to the English in 1809, and at the peace of 1815 was included in the Ionian republic, under the protection of England. It is about 17 m. long from north to south, and 10 in breadth, mountainous, and but little cultivated. The inhabitants are principally Greeks, whose chief occupation is in attending to their flocks of sheep and herds of goats. There is a town of the same name near the south-end of the island, containing about 1,200 inhabitants; the extreme south point of the island is in lat. 36. 9. and 22. 57. E. long.

Cerigotto, (the ancient Ægilia), a small island, lying between the S. E. point of Cerigo, and the N. W. point of Candia. Lat. 35. 51 N. and 23. 44. W. long. It is unproductive, and has but few inhabitants.

Cerilly, a town of France, in the department of Allier, 25 m. west of Moulins, and 40 south by east of Bourges.

Cerina, a seaport, (the ancient Cerynia), on the north coast of Cyprus, and a Greek bishop's see, with a castle on an immense rock. The chief exports are barley, silk, cotton, oil, and carob beans. It is 20 m. N. W. of Nicosia. Long. 32. 55. E. lat. 25. 45. N.

Cerne Abbey, a town in Dorsetshire, Eng. It is surrounded by high chalk hills, and on the side of one of them is cut the figure of a man, 180 feet in height, holding a club in his right hand, and extending the other. Here was formerly a stately abbey, and part of its remains is now converted into a house and barn. It is seated on the river Cerne, 7 m. N. N. W. of Dorchester, and 120 west by south of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,060.

Cernetz, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Grisons, with a mineral spring; seated on the river Inn, 24 m. S. E. of Coire.

Cerrito, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, with a cathedral and collegiate church, 5 m. N. N. E. of Teles.

Certosa, a town of Italy, in the Milanese, with a celebrated Carthusian monastery, five miles north of Pavia.

Cervera, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, with a university, 34 m. north by west of Tarragona. Another on the borders of France and the Mediterranean, eight miles north of Roses, and five or six others in different parts of Spain.

Cervia, a town of Italy, in Romagna, seated near the Gulf of Venice, whence canals are cut to admit sea water, from which much salt is made. It is 10 m. S. E. of Ravenna.

Cervin, Mont, the most conical point of the Alps, in Savoy, contiguous to Mont Blanc.

Cervinara, a town of Naples, in Principato Ulteriore, 12 m. S. W. of Benevento.

Cesena, a town of Italy, in Romagna, seated on the Savio, 18 m. S. by E. of Ravenna.

Cesenatico, a sea-port of Italy in Romagna. In 1800, the inhabitants having arrested a messenger with despatches, the English set fire to the moles of the harbour, and destroyed 16 vessels. It is seated on the Gulf of Venice, 16 m. S. E. of Ravenna, and 8 E. of Cesena.

Cessicaux, a town of France, in the department of Isere, 27 m. E. S. E. of Lyons.

Cette, a sea-port of France, situate on the tongue of land, stretching along the coast of the department of Hérault, on the Gulf of Lions. A considerable quantity of salt is made from the water of the inlet. It has a manufacture of soap, and sugar refinery, and exports a considerable quantity of brandy; the canal of Languedoc falling into the inlet, occasions Cette to be the medium of an extensive intercourse between the eastern and southern departments of France. Pop. about 8,000. The lighthouse is in lat. 43. 24. N. and 3. 42. W. long. and about 18 m. S. W. of Montpellier.

Ceva, a town of Piedmont, with a fort. It was taken by the French, in 1796, and retaken by the Piedmontese peasants in 1799. It stands on the Tanaro, 8 m. S. E. of Mondova. Pop. about 5,500.

Cevennes, a late territory of France, in the province of Languedoc. It is a mountainous country, and now forms the department of Gard.

Ceuta, (the ancient Abyla), a town of Fez, at the N. W. extremity of Africa, opposite to Gibraltar, from which it is distant only 14 m. It was taken from the Moors, by the Portuguese in 1499; it fell into the hands of the Spaniards in 1640, and confirmed to them by the treaty of Lisbon in 1668, and in whose possession it still continues. The Moors besieged it in 1694, and maintained a close blockade before it on the land side, for nearly 30 years, when they ultimately retired with great loss. Its fortress, like that of Gibraltar, to which it is considered a counterpart, may be regarded as impregnable; and, as such, both are poetically termed the Pillars of Hercules. It has a tolerably good harbour for vessels not of very large burthen, in the lat. of 35. 54. N. and 5. 17. W. long.

Ceylon, an island of the Indian Ocean, lying off the south-west coast of the promontory of Hindoostan, from which it is separated by the Gulf of Manara and Palk's Strait, about 90 miles in breadth. The form of Ceylon has not inaptly been compared to that of a pear, the north part forming the stem. It is 270 m. in extreme length from Point de Galle, in the lat. of 6. 4. to Point Pedro, in 9. 50. N. and 120 in extreme breadth between the long. of 80. and 81. 52. E.

The early history of Ceylon is involved in obscurity, but supposing it to be the Taprobana adverted to by Strabo, Pomponius, Mela, and Pliny, it must have ranked high in population and influence among the nations of Asia, for ages antecedent to the Christian era, having sent an embassy over land to Rome, in the reign of the emperor Claudius. It appears to have been visited by some Nestorian missionaries, in the ninth century. About the middle of the thirteenth century, it was visited by Marco Polo, a Venetian, who travelled over a great part of Asia, and afterwards published an account of his travels. The information, however, which he communicated being of a general, rather than of a circumstantial nature, but little was known of Ceylon, beyond its actual existence as an island, until after the discovery of the passage by the Cape of Good Hope; and its being visited by the Portuguese in 1505, who found it divided into several petty sovereignties, which subsequently merged into one, under the title of the kingdom of Candy. The Portuguese held settlements on different parts of the coast for upwards of 150 years, when they were expelled by the Dutch, who possessed themselves of the entire circuit of the coast for 10 to 20 miles from the sea, and the whole of the north part of the islands; confining the dominions of the king of Candy entirely to the interior. The Dutch possessions of the island all surrendered to the English in 1796, after sustaining a siege of three weeks: and in 1815 a British force marched into the interior, took the king of Candy prisoner, deposed him, and possessed his territory, thereby rendering the whole island a part of the British dominion. The entire revenues yielded by the island to the British government have been estimated at £250,000. The general character of the surface of the island of Ceylon is mountainous and woody, with an ample extent of soil; and sufficiently intersected by streams of water, to afford the most abundant means of subsistence and comfort to a population more than tenfold its present extent. The most lofty range of mountains divide the island nearly into two parts, and terminates completely the effect of the monsoons, which set in periodically from opposite sides of them. The seasons are more regulated by the monsoons than the course of the sun; for the coolest season is during the summer solstice, while the western monsoon prevails. Spring commences in October, and the hottest season is from January to the beginning of April. The climate on the coast, is more temperate than on the continent of Hindoostan; but in the interior of the country the heat is many degrees greater, and the climate often extremely sultry and unhealthy. The finest fruits grow in vast plenty, but there is a poisonous fruit called Adam's apple, which in shape resembles the quarter of an apple cut out, with the two insides a little convex, and a continued ridge along the outer edges; and is of a beautiful orange colour. Pepper, ginger, and cardamons are produced in Ceylon; with five kinds of rice which ripen one after another. One of the most remarkable trees in the island is the talipot, which grows straight and tall, and is as big as the mast of a ship; the leaves are so large as to cover 15 men; when dried, they are round, and fold up like a fan. The natives wear a piece of the leaf on their head when they travel, to shade them from the sun; and they are so tough that they are not easily torn. Every soldier carries one, and it serves for his tent: other trees and shrubs, some valuable for their timber, and others for their resin, gums, and flowers, are interspersed over every part of the island; but the most important of all its vegetable productions is the cinnamon tree, the bark of which is distributed over every part of the habitable globe.

Ceylon also abounds with topazes, garnets, rubies, and other gems; besides ores of copper, iron, &c. and veins of black crystal. Common deer, as well as Guinea deer, are numerous; but the horned cattle are both very small and scarce, six of them weighing altogether only 714 lbs. and one of these only 70 lbs. Yet the island produces the largest and best elephants in the world, which occasionally form an extensive branch of traffic to different parts of Hindoostan. The woods are infested by tigers. They abound also with snakes of a monstrous size, among which is the boa constrictor, one of which has been known to destroy a tiger, and devour him at one meal. Spiders, centipedes, and scorpions also grow to an enormous size. Here the mantis, or creeping leaf, is met with; which is supposed to be a species of grasshopper, having every member of common insects, though in shape and appearance it greatly resembles a leaf: it is of a green colour. The sea coasts abound with fish. Alligators and all the lizard tribe are also numerous.

The aborigines of Ceylon consist of two classes of people, the Cingalese and the Veddahs. The latter are still in the rudest stage of social life; they live embosomed in the woods, or in the hollows of the mountains: hunting their sole employment, and providing for the day their only care. Some of them acknowledged the authority of the king of Candy; and exchanged with the Cingalese elephants' teeth and deer flesh, for arrows, cloth, &c. but this practice is not general, for two-thirds of them hold no communication with the Cingalese, and have an utter antipathy to strangers. They worship a particular god; and their religious doctrine seems to consist of some indistinct notions of the fundamental principles of the Braminical faith. In some places they have erected temples; but for the most part they perform worship at an altar constructed of bamboos, under the shade of a banyan-tree. The Cingalese, subjects of the kings of Candy, during the existence of their reign, appear to have been, beyond time of memory, a race of Hindoos, instructed in all the arts of civil life, and maintaining, if not an ascendancy, a co-equality of influence and importance with their continental neighbours. The distinction of castes into 19 grades prevails among them as scrupulously as among the Hindoos. In their devotion they are Pagans; and though they acknowledge a supreme God, they worship only the inferior deities, among which they reckon the sun and moon. In their temples are images, well executed, though their figures are monstrous; some are of silver, copper, &c. The different sorts of gods have various priests, who have all some privileges. Their houses are small and low, with walls made of hurdles, smoothly covered with clay, and the roofs thatched. They have no chimneys, and their furniture is only a few earthen vessels, with two copper basins, and two or three stools; none but their king having been allowed to sit in a chair. Their food is generally rice, and their common drink is water, which they pour into their mouths out of a vessel like a tea-pot, through the spout, never touching it with their lips. There are some inscriptions on the rocks, which must be very ancient, for they are not understood by any of the present inhabitants. The subversion of the native government of Ceylon, and the predilection of the English to force a distribution of the products of British labour, over every part of the globe, are calculated to effect a great change in the tastes and habits of the Cingalese, the result of which it is difficult to foresee. In addition to the various productions of Ceylon previously enumerated, connected with it is the pearl fishery, in the gulf of Manara, which is considered the richest source of that article in the world, and which, with cinnamon to the amount of 300,000 to 400,000 lbs. weight annually, constitutes the basis of its commerce, in exchange for European productions. The population is estimated at about 1,500,000; the principal towns are Colombo, Negombo, and Arrobo on the west coast, Trincomalee and Batacola on the east coast, Magane and Matura at the south end, and Candy nearly in the centre of the island.

Chabeuil, a town of France, in the department of Drome, with about 4,000 inhabitants, 8 m. S. by E. of Valhuce.

Chablais, a fertile province of Savoy, bounded on the north by the lake of Geneva, east by Valois, south by Faucigny, and west by the Genevois. Thonon, 22 m. E. N. E. of Geneva is the capital.

Chablis, a town of France, in the department of Yonne, celebrated for its excellent white wine. It is 12 m. E. by N. of Auxerre.

Chacao, a seaport at the N. E. end of the island of Chiloe, on the strait that separates it from the main land, in the lat. of 41. 53. S.

Chachapoyas, a town of Peru, in the province of Truxillo, capital of a district lying east of the main ridge of the Andes. It is seated on a river, 160 m. N. N. E. of Truxillo. Long. 77. 30. W. lat. 6. 20. S.

Chaco, or Gran Chaco, an interior district of South America, bordering east on the Paraguay River, which, under the influence of the Incas, and more recently of the domination of the Spaniards, was a sort of country of refuge for the native Indians. Its length is estimated at 750, and its breadth 450 miles. It is well watered, and yields most of the productions of other parts of Peru: it is now merged into the United provinces of Buenos Ayres.

Chaddeston, a township of Eng, in the parish of Oldham, Lancashire, with 5,124 inhabitants in 1821. See Oldham.

Chafalia, properly Atchafalaya, a diverging branch of the Mississippi river, which see.

Chagang, a city of Birmah, with a small fort. It is the principal emporium for cotton, which is brought from all parts of the country, and embarked here in boats up the river Irrawaddy into the province of Yunen. Here also is the only manufacture of marble idols, whence the whole Birman empire is supplied; none being allowed to be made in any other place. It is situate opposite Ava, the present capital, on the north side of the Irrawaddy, which here turns north and parts it from Ummerapoora, the present capital.

Chagre, a town and fort on the isthmus, connecting the two great divisions of the western hemisphere, at the mouth of a river of its name, to the S. W. of Porto Bello, forming the easiest channel of communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Ocean. The fort was taken by Admiral Vernon in 1740. Long. 80. 17. W. lat. 9. 10. N.

Chais Dieu, a town of France, in the department of Upper Loire, with a celebrated Benedictine abbey, 12 m. E. of Brioude.

Chalco, a town of Mexico, 18 m. S. E. of the city of Mexico.

Chaleur, Bay of, a spacious bay on the west side of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, which divides the district of Gaspé, Lower Canada, from the province of New Brunswick. Miscou Island, at the entrance of the bay, is in lat. 48. 4. N. and 64. 14. W. long. from which point the bay runs about 80 miles further west, being about 20 miles in breadth, indented on the north by Cascapedia, and on the south by Nipisiguit bay. It receives several rivers, the principal of which is the Ristiti gouche, at its head. Along the coast are numerous inhabitants whose occupation is fishing and ship-building.

Chalford, or Chafford, a village in Gloucestershire, Eng. 2 m. S. E. of Stroud. It stands on the Stroud canal, and has a considerable manufacture of broad cloth. See Stroud.

Challans, a town of France, in the department of Vendee, situate about 12 m. from the coast, and 21 m. N. of Sables d'Oloone.

Challone, a town of France, in the department of Mayenne and Loire, situate on the S. bank of the Loire, 30 m. E. N. E. of Nantes. Pop. about 5,000.

Chalons sur Marne, a city of France, capital of the department of Marne, and lately an episcopal see. It contains several public buildings and 12,000 inhabitants, who carry on a considerable trade in shalloons and other woolen stuffs. Here is an academy of the sciences, arts, and belles-lettres. Chalons is seated on the river Marne, over which there is one very handsome, and two other bridges. It is 25 m. S. E. of Rheims, and 95 E. of Paris.

Charleston, a maritime district of the state of South Carolina, extending for about 70 miles along the shore of the Atlantic Ocean, in a north-eastern direction, from the lat. of 32. 30. to 33. 5 N. and inland about 50 miles; it is bounded on the north by the Santee River, and intersected by Ashley, Cooper, and one or two other rivers of inferior note. It contains a good deal of swampy land; but is on the whole very productive in maize, rice, and cotton. The coast is broken into numerous islands, which yield a cotton of very superior quality, known by the name of Sea Isl and.

Charleston, the chief city of South Carolina, stands upon a point of land at the junction of Ashley and Cooper Rivers, with a good harbour, but difficult of entrance. It is regularly built, with many fine streets and elegant buildings. Its situation is low and flat, but the mildness of the climate, and the lively verdure of the country in the neighbourhood, make it a very agreeable residence, except during the heat of summer. Most of the houses are furnished with a piazza extending from the ground to the top, giving each story an open shaded walk. Except in the commercial part of the city, the houses are surrounded with gardens, trees, and shrubbery, and their white walls gleaming among the green foliage give the whole a peculiarly romantic appearance. The most celebrated edifices of the city are the orphan asylum and the circular church. The society of the place is refined, intelligent, and affable. Charleston has considerable commerce, principally in the exportation of cotton. It is much resorted to in winter by visitors from the northern states and the West Indies. Chatham, a town in the county of Kent, England, situate on the south bank of the river Medway, about eight miles above its confluence with the Thames. It is one of the stations for building, fitting, and victualling of the national marine; and the apparatus and accommodation for this purpose, in conjunction with its fortifications, and marine artillery barracks, render it one of the most magnificent establishments of the kind in the world, and every way worthy of the distinguished character of the British nation. The local advantages of its situation are very great, whilst the lines of the fortifications command the segment of a circle from the river of several miles in extent, and are as complete and efficient as art and execution can make them; there are six slips for building ships of the first rate, and four docks for repairing; and 12 to 15 first-rate ships are generally lying off the town. The dock-yard was first established in the time of Elizabeth; and the Dutch, in the hey-day of their valour, in 1667, ascended with a naval force up the river, and did considerable damage. In 1558 the fund for relieving the wounded in the naval service was established at Chatham; but the chest (the term by which the accounts of the fund were called) was transferred to Greenwich in 1802. In 1592 a hospital for decayed marines, shipwrights, and their widows was founded by Sir John Hawkins.—This hospital has been rebuilt during the present century, on a commodious and extensive scale. The town was very inconsiderable till after the peace with Holland, in 1678. It increased greatly in population after the declaration of war against France in 1793, and in 1821 contained a population of 14,754, independent of Gillingham, which forms the boundary of the fortification on the east, containing a further population of 6,363, and the city of Rochester on the west, with a further number of 9,300, to which it is immediately contiguous. Chatham is 30 m. E. S. E. of London bridge, on the road from London to Dover. It has a weekly market on Saturdays, and two or three public breweries. See Gillingham, Rochester, and Sheerness.

Chatham, p.t. Middlesex Co. Conn. opposite Middletown. Pop. 3,646. Also towns in N. J., Pa. and S. C.

Chatillon, a town of Piedmont, 10 m. S. E. of Aoust. There are several towns in France called Chatillon, which implies a town, and as such is generally a prefix, as Chatillon-sur Seine, sur Loire, &c. &c. implying Chatillon, or the town, on the Seine, Loire, &c. There are none that merit any particular notice.

Châttonnay, a town of France, in the department of Isere, 12 m. east of Vienne and 22 S. E. of Lyons.

Chatre, La, a town of France, in the department of Indre, with a woolen manufacture, seated on the Indre, 22 m. S. S. E. of Chateauroux. Pop. about 4,000.

Chatsworth, a village in the peak of Derbyshire, Eng. near the river Derwent, 6 m. west of Chesterfield. Here is a magnificent seat of the dukes of Devonshire; which, for its fine situation, park, gardens, fountains, &c. is justly deemed one of the wonders of the peak. In its first age it was the prison of Mary, queen of Scots, for 17 years, and afterwards of the French marshal Tallard, taken prisoner at the battle of Blenheim.

Chatteris, a town of Cambridgeshire, England, with a population of 3,283, in 1821. It is 75 m. N. by E. of London, and 11 W. of the city of Ely.

Chatterponr, a town of Hindoostan, in the country of Allahabad, capital of the circar of Bundeelund. It is 130 m. W. S. W. of Allahabad. Long 79.56. E. lat 25. 0. N.

Chauders, a river of Lower Canada, which falls into the St. Lawrence about six miles below Quebec; it rises on the frontier of the state of Maine; it might perhaps easily be united with the Kennebeck, and thereby open a communication between the St. Lawrence and Atlantic Ocean.

Chaumont, a town of France, capital of the department of upper Marne. Here is a manufacture of woolen cloth, and a trade in deer and goat skins. It is seated on a mountain, near the river Marne, 55 m. E. by S. of Troyes. Pop. about 6,000. It is also the name of another town in the department of the Loire, about 5 m. E. by N. of St. Etienne. Pop. about 5,000. It is also the name of several other towns in different parts of France.

Chaumont, a town of Jefferson county, state of New York, beautifully seated at the head of a small bay, at the east end of Lake Ontario, 187 m. N. W. of Albany.

Chaussy, a town of France, in the department of Aisne, on the river Oise, 20 m. E. of Noyon. Pop. about 450.

Chataouque, a county at the S. W. extremity of the state of New York, bordering on the south on Pennsylvania, and west on Lake Erie. Pop. 34,687. Mayville is the chief town. There is a lake of the same name about 10 miles in length and two broad, in the centre of the county, which discharges its waters, by the Alleghany River, into the Ohio, although the N. W. end of the lake is within six or seven miles of that of Erie.

Chaux de Fonds, a village of Switzerland, in the principality of Neuchâtel. The inhabitants, about 3,000, make numerous watches and clocks; and the women are employed in the lace manufacture. It is seated in a fertile valley, 9 m. N. N. W. of Neuchâtel. Pop. about 3,000.

Chaves, a town of Portugal, in Trás os Montes, with two suburbs, and two forts. Between the town and the suburb Magdalena is a Roman stone bridge. It stands near the confines of Spain, on the river Tamega, 26 m. west of Braganza.

Chazy, a small river in Clinton county, state of New York, which falls into Lake Champlain. A town of the same name in Clinton Co. on the north bank of the river, is 171 m. due north of Albany. Pop. 3,097.

Cheadle, a town in Staffordshire, Eng. Here is a large tape manufactory, and in the vicinity are several copper and brass works, and rich coal mines. Four miles S. E. are the ruins of Croxden abbey. It is seated in the most fertile part of the Moorland, 12 m. N. N. E. of Stafford, and 146 N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,862.

Cheadle, a parish in Cheshire, Eng. lying on the S. W. side of Stockport (which see.) Pop. in 1821, 6,508.

Chedabucto Bay, Nova Scotia. See Halifax.

Chedabucto Bay, at the east end of Nova Scotia, opening into the Atlantic Ocean, at the entrance of the Gulf of Canso, in lat. 45. 20. N. and 61. of W. long. Salmon river, which abounds in the estimable fish of that name, falls into this Bay.

Cheddar, a village contiguous to Axminster, in Somersetshire, England. It is situate in a delightfully picturesque part of the county, on the S. W. side of the Mendip hills, and is deservedly celebrated for the excellence of its cheese. Pop. in 1821, 1,797.

Cheduba, an island in the Bay of Bengal, on the coast of Birmah, 45 m. long, and ten broad. It yields abundance of rice, and the most western point is in long. 93. 35. E. lat. 18. 56. N.

Chago Muddi, a town of Hindoostan, in the country of Cutch, at the mouth of the Caggar, 23 m. S. W. of Boogebooge, near the mouth of the eastern branch of the Indus.

Chetore or Chitore, a town of Hindoostan, in the territory of Oudipour. It was the capital of the ranna, or chief prince, of the Rajpoots, in the days of his greatness; and was a fortress and city of great extent, situate on a mountain; but it has been in ruins since the time of Aurungzebe, in 1631. It is 43 m. N. N. E. of Oudipour, and 88 S. S. W. of Agimere. E. long. 74. 50. and 24 35. N. lat.

Chelm, a town of Poland, in Red Russia, capital of a palatinate of its name and a bishop's see. In 1794, the Poles were defeated by the Prussians near this town. It is 100 m. E. S. E. of Warsaw. Long. 23. 29. E. lat. 51. 20. N.

Chelmer, a river, in Essex, Eng. which rises near Thaxted, and flows by Dunmow and Chelmsford, to Malden, where it joins the Blackwater.

Chelmsford, the county town of Essex, Eng. Here is a stately church, a magnificent shire-house, theatre, and barracks, an excellent conduit, and a free school founded by Edward VI. It is situate at the confluence of the Can with the Chelmer, 29 m. E. N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,994.

Chelmsford, a town of Massachusetts, in Middlesex county, situate on the south side of the Merrimac, over which is a curious bridge, at Pawtucket Falls, connecting this town with Dracut. It is 28 m. N. N. W. of Boston. Middlesex canal from the Merrimac to Boston harbour, commences at Chelmsford, which contributes considerably to its importance and interest; there is an extensive quarry of very fine granite in this vicinity. Pop. 1,387.

Chelsea, a parish lying along the north bank of the Thames, to the S. W. of London, and of which it forms an integral part. This section of the metropolis is distinguished for its hospital for the support of decayed and maimed soldiers, founded in the time of Charles II.; its chief promoter was Sir Stephen Fox, who contributed £13,000 towards the building. It was finished in the time of William and Mary; the building is a quadrangle, the wings extending towards the river, the base, which is nearly 800 feet in extent, is entered from the centre of the north front into a noble vestibule; the east side is appropriated to a chapel, and the west to a hall, in which the inmates dine; the wings, which are divided into wards, are each 360 feet in length, 80 wide, and three stories high; the infirmary, other out-buildings and gardens compose an area of nearly 50 acres. Sir Christopher Wren was the architect, and in respect to proportion and convenience, the edifice is worthy of his high reputation, and the whole produces an imposing effect; but being built mostly of brick, it is inferior in magnificence to the marine hospital at Greenwich. The number of inmates is 336, exclusive of officers and the necessary attendants; there are about 20,000 out-pensioners. In 1801 a military asylum, contiguous to the hospital, was established for the education of 1,000 children of non-commissioned officers and soldiers, towards the support of which the whole army contributes one day's pay per annum; the building which is principally of brick, cost about £150,000. Chelsea is also distinguished for its Botanic garden, formed by Sir Hans Sloane, and presented by him in 1721, to the Apothecaries' Company of London, on condition of paying a quit rent of £5 per ann. and presenting annually to the Royal Society 50 different specimens of plants grown in the garden, until the number of new specimens amounted to 2,000. This section of the metropolis, during the first 20 years of the present century exceeded most others in the increase of its population, the number in 1821 having been 26,860, and in 1801 only 11,604. It is surrounded by extensive nursery grounds, which with the usual routine of shop-keeping, constitutes the chief occupation of the inhabitants, among which are numbers of retired families on comparatively small incomes. A handsome new church, in the Gothic style, was completed in 1825. The hospital is about two miles W. S. W. of Westminster Abbey, and four miles in the same direction from the Royal Exchange.

Chelsea, p.t. Orange Co. Vt. Pop. 1,958.

Chelsea, p.t. Suffolk Co. Mass. separated from the city of Boston by the harbour, and from Charlestown by Mystic river, over which is a very long bridge. Here is a United States Marine Hospital. Pop. 770.

Chelsea Landing, a village in Norwich, Conn. 14 m. above New London, on the Thames.

Cheltenham, a town in Gloucestershire, Eng. situate in a fertile vale, near the foot of Coldswold Hills, 94 m. N. W. of London, on the road to Gloucester. Till within the present century it was an inconsiderable place, participating partially in the woolen manufactures of the neighbouring district. It acquired some distinction by the discovery of a medicinal spring in 1740, and being visited by George III. in 1789, it became somewhat celebrated; the population, however, in 1801 amounted only to 3,076, since which it has greatly increased in numbers and importance, and in 1826 it was one of the chief resorts of gaiety and fashion in the kingdom; a theatre was erected in 1803; baths, assembly rooms, libraries, public walks, and other attractions, have progressively been extended for the accommodation of an increasing population, which in 1811 amounted to 8,335, and in 1821 to 13,306. Its waters, which increase in quantity in proportion to the demand for them, and increase of visitors, operate both as aperient and restorative, being impregnated with salts, sulphur, steel, and calcareous earth. The parish church is an ancient and venerable structure; there are several sectarian places of worship; its market on Thursday, is well supplied with every necessary.

Chelum, or Behut, a river of Asia, the westernmost of the five eastern branches of the Indus. It rises above Cashmere, flows through the province of that name, into that of Lahore, and joins the Chunaub, 16 miles below Koochaub. This river is the Hydaspes of Alexander.

Chelva, or Chulilla, a town of Spain, situate on the north bank of the Guadalquivir, about 20 m. N. W. of Valencia.

Chemnitz, or Kemnitz, a town of upper Saxony, in Misnia, surrounded by walls and ditches. It has four suburbs, and a castle about a mile from the town. Great quantities of cottons and other fine stuffs are made here; and the bleaching business is considerable. It is situate on a river of the same name, 38 m. S. W. of Dresden, and about the same distance S. E. of Leipzig. Pop. about 10,000.

There is another town of the same name in the north part of the circle of Leutmeritz in Bohemia, about 42 m. S. E. of Dresden.

Chemung, p.t. Tioga Co. N. Y. 190 m. W. Albany. Pop. 1,462.

Chemungo, an interior county on the south side of the state of New York, it is intersected by a river of the same name, which flows from north to south into the Susquehanna; population 37,406. Norwich is the chief town; there is also a town of the same name at the entrance of the river into the Susquehanna, in the adjoining county of Broome, N. Y. near the frontier of Pennsylvania, 127 m. W. S. W. of Albany. Pop. 3,716.

Chennapatam, or Chinnypatam, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, near which is a handsome stone fort. It has manufactures of sugar, glass, and excellent music-wire, and a great trade in the produce of the palm-gardens in its vicinity. It is 40 m. E. N. E. of Seringapatam.

Chencour, or Chenkon, a town of Armenia, on the frontiers of Georgia, with a beautiful castle, grand caravanserais, and several mosques, 160 m. N. E. of Erivan.

Chen-si, or Shen-si, a western frontier province of China, lying between the lat. of 32. and 38. N. and 103. to 110. of E. long. It is bounded on the south by the province of Setchuen, and on the east partially by the province of Honan, but mainly by the Hoang-ho, or Great Yellow river, which divides it from Chan-si, on the north, partly by the great wall which divides it from Chinese Tartary, and on the west by the dreary country of the Monguls, containing an area of about 147,000 square miles. The Hoang-ho, in the eccentricity of its course, skirts the N. W. part of the province, running in a northerly direction; whilst on the east side it runs a course due south. Numerous streams intersect this province in all directions, some falling into the Hoang-ho on the west, and some into the same river on the east, and others into the Kiang Kien, or Great River, which intersects the province of Setchuen; a province so extensive, as may be expected, comprises much diversity of soil and features. It abounds with drugs, rhubarb, musk, cinnaabar wax, honey, and coals; of which last it contains inexhaustible veins. It has also rich gold mines, which, for political reasons, are not allowed to be opened. It produces little rice, but plentiful crops of wheat and millet; but is occasionally subject to long droughts, when clouds of locusts, from the forests of Mongul Tartary, destroy the entire vegetation of extensive districts; the inhabitants, however, make a food of the locusts, and esteem them as a delicacy. The population is estimated at upwards of 30,000,000.

Chen-yang, Chin-yan, or Mou-den, a city of eastern Tartary, capital of a province of the same name, otherwise called Leatong. It is situate on the bank of a fine river, running south into the Gulf of Leatong. The walls are 10 miles in circumference; and it is ornamented with several public edifices, and provided with arsenals and storehouses. It is 350 m. E. N. E. of Pekin. Long. 123. 5. E. lat. 41. 55. N.

Chepello, an island in the Bay of Panama, about 20 m. from the city of Panama, which it supplies with provisions and fruit.

Chepstow, a town in Monmouthshire, Eng. It is seated on the side of a hill, on the Wye, near its confluence with the Severn. It was surrounded by a wall, traces of which are observable; and on a perpendicular rock are the remains of a large castle. Here was also a priory, part of which is converted into a church, and comparatively it was in former times of much greater consequence than at present. It is now the port of entry for all the towns on the rivers Wye and Lug, and sends a few ships annually to the Baltic and British America, for timber, deals, &c.; ships coast-way, a considerable quantity of timber, bark, &c. and has two ship-yards, where vessels of 500 to 600 tons are generally in a course of building. The spring tides rise to the height of 70 feet; the neaps are consequently attended with great inconvenience, and preclude it from materially extending its commerce. There is a fine bridge of iron over the Wye, erected at the joint expense of the counties of Monmouth and Gloucester. It is about 10 m. N. of Bristol, and 130 W. N. W. of London. Pop in 1821, 3,068.

Cher, an interior department in the centre of France, including part of the late province of Berry. It receives its name from a river which rises in Auvergne, and flows into the Loire, below Tours. Bourges, 126 m. due S. of Paris, is the capital. It contains about 3,000 sq. m. and 230,000 inhab.

Cherasco, a fortified town of Piedmont, capital of a fertile territory of the same name, with a strong citadel. It is seated on a mountain, at the confluence of the Stura with the Tanaro, 94 m. S. S. E. of Turin. Pop. about 11,000.

Cherbourg, a seaport of France, in the department of Manche, with an Augustine abbey. Here was a sea-fight between the English and French, in 1692, when the latter were beat, and upward of 20 of their men of war burnt, near Cape la Hogue. The English landed here in 1756, took the town, with the ships in the basin, demolished the fortifications, and ruined the works for improving the harbour. These works were resumed on a stupendous scale, by Louis XVI.; but their progress was interrupted by the revolution; resumed again under Napoleon in 1803; and the works destroyed by the fury of the elements in 1806; after which a new plan of operations was resolved upon, by excavating a basin out of the reach of the violence of the ocean, which in 1813 was so far accomplished, as to hold 50 sail of the line, having 50 feet depth of water. Other works of corresponding magnitude have since been carried on, and it now appears destined to become the chief naval station of France, and to rival in extent and magnificence every establishment of the kind in the world. Its situation is very advantageous, either for dispatching a fleet to any part of the world, west or south; or for commanding the channel between France and England. It is about 70 m. due south of the south side of the Isle of Wight, and 190 W. N. W. of Paris, in N. lat. 49. 39. and 1. 37. W. long.

Cheribon, a seaport on the north coast of the Island of Java, about 150 m. N. of Batavia; it exports large quantities of coffee.

Cherokees, an Indian tribe occupying an extensive tract of country, between the Chatahoochee and Tennessee rivers, at the S. extremity of the Appalachian chain. The Cherokees were among the bravest and noblest of the American race. This nation has been long distinguished, for being in advance of the other Indian tribes in the arts of civilization. Some of their chieftains have been really great men, fully sensible of the disadvantages of their condition, and sagacious in devising means to remedy them. Among these chieftains, the late Charles Hicks, and John Ross, now at the head of the nation, were pre-eminent. Under their directing counsels, and aided by the policy of the general government, they have outstripped all the other tribes in the march of improvement.

Advantageously situated in the northwest of Georgia, and extending themselves into Alabama and Tennessee, they occupy a well watered and healthy country, conveniently divided into hill and dale. The northern part is quite mountainous; but the southern and western parts are composed of extensive and fertile plains, covered with the finest timber, and furnishing excellent pasturage. The winters are mild, and the climate healthy. Large herds of cattle and horses are owned by the natives, and they are used for cultivating the earth. Numerous flocks of goats, sheep, and swine, cover the hills. The valleys and plains furnish the best soil, and produce Indian corn, cotton, tobacco, wheat, oats, and potatoes. The natives carry on considerable trade with the adjoining states, and some of them carry their cotton down the Tennessee, and even down the Mississippi, to New Orleans. Apple and peach orchards are very common, and much attention is paid to gardens in the nation. There are many public roads in the nation, and houses of entertainment kept by the natives.

Numerous and flourishing villages are to be seen in every section of the country. Cotton and woollen cloths, and blankets, are manufactured here. Almost every family raises cotton for its own consumption. Industry and commercial enterprise are extending themselves through the nation. Different mechanical trades are pursued. The population is rapidly increasing, and the female character is much respected. The religion of the nation is Christian—that religion which, wherever it reigns, whether in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America, elevates its professors above those of other religions.

Another proof is given by this people of their capacity of self improvement, in the alphabet invented by one of their native chieftains, called Guess. Like Cadmus, he has given to his people the alphabet of their language. It is composed of eighty-six characters, so well adapted to the peculiar sounds of the Indian tongue, that Cherokees, who had despaired of acquiring the requisite knowledge by means of the schools, are soon enabled to read, and correspond with each other. This invention is one of the great triumphs of the aboriginal intellect. Like the Greeks and the Latins, the Indians have now found a means of perpetuating the productions of mind. They have erected a barrier against the inroads of oblivion. Henceforth their peculiar forms of expression, their combinations of thought, and the suggestions of their imaginations, will be preserved. An empire of intellect is founded on a stable foundation; and when did such an empire experience a decline, till it had first attained the climax of human grandeur? A printing press established in the nation issues a newspaper, periodically imparting information, both of domestic and foreign origin, throughout the tribe.

Their political constitution affords another proof of their capacity of self government. Republican in its character, its provisions are better calculated, as expressed in the preamble, "to establish justice, insure tranquillity, promote the common welfare, and secure to ourselves and posterity the blessings of liberty," than many of the more elaborate contrivances of their European brethren. The government is representative in its form, and is divided into executive, legislative, and judicial departments. The trial by jury is established; and the particular provisions of the constitution, while they are calculated to accustom the Cherokees to the principles of our system of jurisprudence, are peculiarly well adapted to the anomalous condition, in which the nation is placed. The whole is well suited to secure to the tribe the improvements already made, and to stimulate them to further advances in civilization.

The sympathies of the public have within a short time been strongly excited in their behalf in consequence of a determination manifested by the government of Georgia to expel them from their territory. The Cherokees refuse to depart. They avow themselves to be independent of the state of Georgia and under the protection of the United States.

Their numbers amount to about 14,000. Their capital is New Echota, on the Coosa river, within the limits of the territory claimed by Georgia.

Cheroniso, a town of European Turkey, on the N. E. coast of the island of Negropont, 25 m. E. of Negropont.

Cheroy, a town of France, in the department of Yonne, 10 m. W. of Sens.

Cherryfield, t. Washington Co. Me. Pop. 563.

Cherryton, t. Northampton Co. Va. on the eastern shore.

Cherryvalley, p.t. a flourishing town of New York, in Otsego County, at the head of a creek of its name, 18 m. S. of Canajoharie, and 55 W. by N. of Albany. Pop. 4,098.

Cherryville, villages in Pa., and Louisiana.

Cherso, an island in the Gulf of Venice, between the coasts of Istria and Croatia. On the south it is separated from Osero by a very narrow channel, and the two islands are united by a bridge. The soil is stony; but it abounds in cattle, wine, oil, and honey. It has a town of the same name, with a good harbour. Long. 14. 45. E. lat. 45. 10. N. The two islands contain together a population of about 10,000, and were ceded to Austria by the treaty of Campo Formio, in 1796, after having for nearly eight centuries formed a part of the Venetian republic.

Cherson, the capital of New Russia, in the government of Catharineslaf, founded by Catharine II. on the north bank of the Dniester, 10 miles below the influx of the Ingulec. The church and many of the houses are built of stone. Here is a dock from which several men of war and merchant ships have been launched; but owing to some sand banks in the river, the naval establishment has been transferred hence to Nicolayef, and its commerce to Odessa; the population, which at one time amounted to about 50,000, has progressively decreased to below 10,000. In 1787, the empress made a triumphant journey to this capital, and here met emperor Joseph II. At this place, in 1790, the philanthropic Howard fell a victim to his indefatigable humanity; and a monument was erected to his memory by the Russian admiral. Cherson is 50 m. E. of Oczakow. Long. 32. 56. E. lat. 46. 38. N.

Chertsey, a town in Surrey, Eng. Here was formerly an abbey, of which only a part of the walls now remain; it was the first burial place of Henry VI. who was afterward removed to Windsor. It is seated near the Thames, over which is a handsome bridge, 20 m. W. by S. of London. Pop. in 1821, 4,270.

Chesapeake, the largest and safest bay in the United States. Its entrance is between Cape Charles in Maryland, and Cape Henry in Virginia, 12 m. wide. It extends 270 m. to the north; is from 10 to 40 miles broad, and generally nine fathoms deep; containing several islands and many commodious harbours. It receives the Susquehannah, Potomac, Rappahannock, York, and James rivers, which are all large and navigable.

Chesapeake, a village in Cecil Co. Maryland.

Chesapeake and Delaware canal, unites the two bays of that name. It begins at Delaware city on the Delaware, and proceeds nearly west through Delaware and Maryland to Back Creek, a branch of Elk river. It is 14 miles long, 60 feet wide, and navigable for vessels drawing 10 feet. At every half mile are recesses where the canal is widened for the passage of vessels. Four miles of the canal pass through a hill in some places 90 feet high, being the deepest cut upon any canal in the world. Here a bridge of a single arch is thrown across it. This canal was finished in 1829, and cost 150,000 dollars per mile. It has a great navigation.

Chesham, a town in Buckinghamshire, Eng. with manufactures of lace and wooden ware, such as malt-shovels, butchers' trays, &c. It stands in a vale, 27 m. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 6,032.

Cheshire, a county palatine of England, bounded on the north by the river Mersey, which divides it from Lancashire, N. E. by Yorkshire, E. by Derbyshire, S. E. by Staffordshire, S. by Shropshire, W. by the river Dee, which divides it from Denbighshire and Flintshire, and N. W. by the Irish Sea, into which projects a peninsula, 13 m. long and six broad, formed by the mouths of the Mersey and the Dee. This county extends 33 miles from north to south, and 42 from east to west, without including the peninsula just mentioned on the west, and narrow tract of land, which stretches between Lancashire and Derbyshire, to Yorkshire on the N. E. Antecedent to the invasion of Britain by the Romans, this part of the country was occupied by a tribe called the Cornacii; and Cheshire was constituted a county palatine by William the Norman, who conferred it upon his nephew, Hugh Lupus; but the succeeding palatines, exercising an authority incompatible with justice to other parts of the country, such as affording sanctuary, &c., Henry VIII. who, whatever faults he might possess, is entitled to the gratitude of the present age for having been instrumental in breaking up the strong holds of priest-craft, and numerous other kinds of local tyranny, abrogated most of the privileges of this palatinate, the forms of which, however, it still retains. Its principal towns besides the city of Chester, are Stockport, Macclesfield, Congleton, and Nantwich: Stockport, at the N. E. extremity of the county, and the surrounding country, participates largely in the cotton manufacture; Macclesfield and Congleton are extensively engaged in the silk manufacture; and Nantwich is celebrated for its salt springs; and ship-building is extensively carried on at the city of Chester.

In addition to the rivers Mersey and Dee, the county of Cheshire is intersected by the rivers Weaver and Bollin, and contains several small lakes well stored with fish; it is also intersected by several canals, affording it a facility of communication with all parts of the kingdom. The river Dee is united by a canal of one entire level, about 14 miles in length, from the city of Chester to the Mersey, about 12 miles above Liverpool; other canals diverge from the city of Chester to Northwich, and into Wales. The Trent and Mersey Canal (see Runcorn and Preston) intersect the heart of the county, whilst the Duke of Bridgewater's is carried nearly parallel with the Mersey to Manchester, and the Peak Forest Canal intersects the N. E. end of the county. The E. and N. E. parts of the county supply abundance of coal and various minerals; but the distinguishing characteristics of the county are its salt and cheese; the supply of the first is inexhaustible, and celebrated for its purity; whilst the cheese stands unrivalled for the excellence of its quality. The salt is produced both in a rock or solid state, and by evaporation of the water from the numerous springs. The quantity consumed in Great Britain since 1779 has averaged about 55,000 tons per annum, produced chiefly by evaporation; and the quantity exported since that time has averaged about 250,000 tons per annum, in the proportion of about 35,000 tons of rock, and the remainder produced by evaporation, constituting in the aggregate an exchangeable money value of about £300,000 per annum, exclusive of the tax of £30 per ton levied on that consumed in Great Britain during the period 1806-1822, (in which latter year the tax was repealed,) yielding in the aggregate about £1,500,000 per annum. The £300,000 produce of the salt is principally distributed, in the first instance, for labour, and for reparation of machinery, buildings, and pans, used in the process of evaporation and stoving. The total exchangeable money value of the cheese annually produced in this county may be estimated at about £750,000 per annum, and the aggregate exchangeable money value of all its other agricultural productions, may be estimated at from double to treble that amount, out of which a land-rent tax of about £700,000 per annum is exacted. For the relative proportion of this amount to that exacted in other counties, as well as for territorial extent, population, &c. &c. see England. The south and west part of the county it is, that is the most productive in cheese, and in which the salt springs abound. This part of the county is rather level than hilly, and subdivided by hedge rows, well stocked with timber, into comparatively very small enclosures, intersected by numerous paved roads, which imply either a Roman origin; or perhaps found necessary on account of the sandy prevalence of the surface. On the north and east side of the county about 100,000 persons are employed in the silk and cotton manufacture. See Congleton, Macclesfield, and Stockport. The 250,000 tons of salt per annum exported, are conveyed by the river Weaver, into the Mersey, about 20 m. above Liverpool, at which port it is principally shipped.

Cheshire, a county of New Hampshire, bounded on the west by the Connecticut River, which separates it from Vermont; it is about 20 miles in mean breadth, and is, upon the whole, a tolerably fertile district; the south-end borders on Massachusetts. Pop. 27,016. Keene, in the interior of the county, 60 m. S. W. by W. of Concord, is the chief town.

Cheshire, is also the name of a town in Berkshire County, Massachusetts. Pop. 1,049. And of another in New Haven County, Connecticut. Pop. 1,764.

Cheshunt, a parish in Hertfordshire, England. Pop. in 1821, 4,376. Waltham Cross, at the entrance of the parish from London, is 11 m. from Shoreditch church, on the line of the great north road.

Chester, a city of England, an ecclesiastical see, and capital of the county of Cheshire, is situate on the banks of the river Dee, at the western extremity of the county, 183 miles N. N. W. of London, and 24 due south of Liverpool. Chester is one of the most ancient and interesting cities of England; it is surrounded by a wall, nearly two miles in circumference, still kept in a good state of repair, the top affording, in its entire circuit, a delightful promenade. It has four gates, in the position of the four cardinal points, two of them very ornamental, and the whole interesting for their antiquity. Within the present century, the city has undergone vast improvements. Formerly, the houses in the principal streets projected over the foot-path, forming a covered way five or six feet wide; which although agreeable enough in wet weather, rendered the shops and rooms on the ground floor dark and disagreeable, and gave an uncouth feature to the city. This defect is now wholly, or nearly so, removed, whilst several public edifices, unequalled in the British dominions for their architectural taste and grandeur, ornament different parts of the city; the most distinguished of these, are the county gaol, on the site of the old castle, and the county hall contiguous thereto; the porticoes of these two edifices, in their appropriateness of design, exactness of proportion, and grandeur of effect, have no parallel in Britain, and cannot be surpassed in any part of the world. Here are a public library, an exchange, &c. The cathedral is a venerable structure of reddish sand stone, built in the 8th century; there are eight other churches, and several dissenting places of worship, a county infirmary, and several schools. Two annual fairs, in July and October, each of which continues several days, are very numerous attended, giving rise to great traffic in linens from Ireland, and woolen cloths and stuffs from Yorkshire, and for the accommodation of which, a commodious hall was erected in 1809, and another in 1815. Chester, in 1825, had nine public breweries, seven establishments for the cutting of corks, five iron founderies, two paper and four extensive flour mills, six manufactories of pipes, and nine of tobacco, and several other manufactories of minor importance. The river Dee is navigable up to the city for vessels of considerable burthen; and ships of 300 to 400 tons are always in a course of building, and occasionally eight or ten at a time; on the whole, however, Chester has more the character of a provincial, than of a seaport town. The contiguity of Liverpool having superseded it in its latter character. Its local jurisdiction is vested in a mayor and 24 aldermen; it returns two members to Parliament by about 1,400 electors. The population, which in 1801 was 15,052, in 1821 amounted to 19,949, exclusive of about 1,500 in two adjoining out parishes.

Chester, a county at the S. E. extremity of the state of Pennsylvania in the E. District, bounded on the N. E. by the Schuylkill River, and intersected by the Brandywine. The county is about 35 miles from north to south, and 15 in mean breadth. Pop. 50,908. West Chester, on the east border of the county, 18 miles from Philadelphia, on the great western road to Pittsburgh, is the chief town.

Chester District, a county or district in the north part of the state of South Carolina, bounded on the east by the Catawba River, and west by Broad River, distant from each other about 25 miles. The district is about 20 north to south. Pop. 19,182.

Chester, p.t. Rockingham Co. N. H. 43 m. from Boston; 30 from Portsmouth. Pop. 2,039. The town is about 12 miles in extent, and the village consists of a single street a mile long. Most of the trade of the county centres here. Plumbago of a good quality is found in this town. Here are two remarkable caves, one of which exhibits columns of stalactites.

Chester, p.t. Windsor Co. Vt. Pop. 2,320.

Chester, p.t. Hampden Co. Mass. Pop. 1,406.

Chester, p.t. Orange Co. N. Y. There are 13 other towns and villages called Chester in the U. States.

Chesterfield, a town in Derbyshire, England. It has three establishments for the manufacture of baskets or skips, much used in the conveyance of cotton yarn from the mills to the dealers, five tanneries, two iron founderies, nine potteries chiefly coarse ware, some trifling manufactures of hosiery, &c. and next to Derby it is the most important trading town in the county. It has mines of coal, lead, and iron in its vicinity, and a canal, communicating with the Trent below Gainsborough; a prison for debtors, a market-house, town-hall and sessions-room are all combined under one roof. In 1821 the town contained 5,077 inhabitants, and the parish, which includes eight contiguous townships and hamlets, 4,113 inhabitants more. It is 155 miles N. by W. of London, on the direct road from thence through Nottingham to Sheffield, from which it is distant 13 miles, and 26 from Nottingham.

Chesterfield, a county of Virginia bounded on the east and north by James River, and south by the Appomattox River. Pop. 18,637. The court house of the county is 15 miles S. by W. of Richmond. The county contains about 300 square miles.

Chesterfield District, a frontier district of South Carolina, bordering on North Carolina, bounded on the east by the Great Pedee River, and west by Lynche's Creek; it contains 450 square miles, and a population of 8,472. The chief town is of the same name.

Chesterfield, p.t. Cheshire Co. N. H. 100 m. from Portsmouth; 90 m. from Boston.

Chesterfield, p.t. Hampshire Co. Mass. Pop. 1,417.

Chesterfield, Essex Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,671. Also a town in Burlington Co. N. J.

Chesterfield Inlet, an inlet extending about 200 miles westward from the north end of Hudson's Bay: the entrance to the inlet is in lat. 63. 30. N. long. 90. 40. W.; its mean breadth is about 15 miles.

Chester-le-Street, a parish in the county of Durham. Eng. containing 18 townships. The total population of which in 1821 was 13,936; the parish abounds in coal, and is intersected by the river Wear; the township of Chester-le-Street is situate on the west bank of the Wear, six miles north of Duram, and 18 south of Newcastle, and in 1821 contained 1,892 of the population.

Chestertown, port of entry and capital of Kent Co. Maryland, on Chester river, flowing into the upper part of Chesapeake Bay from the East. An academy which was originally incorporated as a college, is established here and receives an annuity from the state.

Chesterville, Kennebec Co. Me. Pop. 923.

Chesterville, p. v. Kent Co. Maryland.

Chestnut Hill, a township in Northampton Co. Pa.

Cheviot Hills, a ridge of mountains in England, which run from north to south through Northumberland and Cumberland, famous for its free chase, formerly much used by the English and Scotch gentry. These hills are now chiefly wild and open sheep-walks; goats also are fed among them, and some of the finest cattle in the kingdom, in parts of the Scotch border. Near these many an obstinate battle has been fought between the English and Scotch, before the two kingdoms were united; among which may be numbered the encounter between the earls Percy and Douglas, celebrated in the ancient ballad called Chevy Chase. The altitude of the peak called Cheviot Hill, which is about 20 m. W. by N. of Alnwick, is 2,658 feet above the level of the sea, other peaks of the range rise 300 to 400 feet higher.

Chiapa, a province of America, uniting the two grand divisions of the western hemisphere. This province extends from the lat. of 14. 50. to 17. 30. of north lat. and lies between the long. of 90. 20. and 92. 50. W. being about 180 miles in extreme length but the mean breadth not exceeding more than about 100 miles, its area may be stated at 18,000 square miles. It is bounded on the north by the province of Tabasco, which encloses it on the side of the Atlantic Ocean, and on the south by part of the province of Guatemala, which encloses it on the side of the Pacific Ocean; on the east by Vera Paz; and west by Guaxaca, the extreme southern province of Mexico. The Andes run into this province in broken ridges at its S. E. extremity; but towards its more western boundary, the grand mountain chain may be said to be completely divided. The Tabasco River rises at the foot of the termination of the mountain chain, runs first in a W. N. W. direction, and afterwards takes a northerly course through the province of Tabasco, into the Bay of Campeachy, thereby affording an advantageous opening with the Atlantic Ocean. Four or five other streams of inferior importance intersect the central and eastern side of the province, all uniting into one, near its northern frontier; afterwards running through the province of Tabasco, also into the Bay of Campeachy, there being no river of any note running out of Chiapa into the Pacific Ocean. With the exception of the S. E. part, Chiapa may be considered a level rather than a mountainous country, and exceedingly fertile; and having hitherto been uncursed with the discovery of any gold or silver mine, the native inhabitants are proportionably more numerous, more social, and exhibit more primitive characteristics than in any other part of the western hemisphere. Nearly all the animated creatures and vegetable productions common to the tropical section of this division of the globe, are common in Chiapa. The most prominent of the animal race is the horse, the breed of which, first introduced from Europe, is deservedly celebrated, and cherished with great care by the inhabitants, with whom the horse constitutes their most important branch of traffic, great numbers being constantly sent into Mexico. When, instead of chicane and oppressive exactions, integrity and mutual reciprocity shall constitute the basis of commercial intercourse, no part of the world will afford a fairer field for enterprise than the province of Chiapa. Its forests will supply abundance of cypress, cedar, pine, walnut, and other timber, whilst the cultivated parts will yield abundance of cotton, cocoa, coffee, sugar, and cochineal, with a boundless variety of aromatic resins, gums, and dyes, to constitute fit and ample equivalents to exchange for the varied useful productions of European art. Most of the domestic animals and fowls common to Europe, as well as the horse, have become naturalized in Chiapa, and in greater plenty and excellence than in almost any other part of America south of the United States; and its climate, in reference to its geographical position, being of a genial and moderate, rather than of an extreme temperature, it affords as favourable a domicile for a portion of the population of the denser inhabited parts of Europe as any part of the world. This territory is comprised within the republic of Guatemala, or Central America, as it is sometimes called.

Chiapa, the chief town of the preceding province, is situate on the west side of the river Tabasco, near the N. W. extremity of the province, in the lat. of 17. 5. N. and 92. 40. of W. long. The number of inhabitants is estimated at 20,000, chiefly Indians, hence it is called Chiapa de los Indios, in contradistinction to another town about 20 miles west, called Chiapa de los Espanoles, in consequence of being inhabited chiefly by persons of Spanish descent: the latter is sometimes called Ciudad Real, and in the see of a bishop, having a stately cathedral, and several monastic establishments; its population is, however, inconsiderable, not exceeding more than 2,000.

Chiarenza, a town of European Turkey, in the Morea, on the river Sittus, situate near the sea, opposite the east end of the island of Cefalonia. Long. 21. 23. lat. 37. 46. N.

Chiari, a town of Italy, in Bresciano, where the Austrians defeated the French in 1701. It is situate between two rivers which fall into the Oglio, on the east side, 14 m. N. N. E. of Crema. Pop. about 7,000.

Chiaromonte, a town of Sicily, in Val di Noto, seated on a mountain 25 miles west of Syracuse; it gave the surname to the family of the virtuous and amiable pope Pius VII.

Chiavari, a town of the territory of Genoa, situate at the mouth of a river falling into the gulf, about 20 m. S. E. of Genoa. It has several manufactures. Pop. about 8,000.

Chisvanna, a town of Switzerland, capital of a country of its name, subject to the Grisons. It is a trading place, especially in wine and delicate fruits, being the principal communication between the Milanese and Germany. The governor's palace and the churches are magnificent; and the inhabitants are Roman Catholics. Here are the ruins of a once celebrated fortress, on the summit of a rock; and close to the town is a rock of asbestos. It is seated on the banks of the river Maira, which falls into the north end of the Lake of Como. Pop. about 3,000. The district, which is mountainous, contains a population of about 18,000.

Chicago, a town with a military post called Fort Dearborn, at the southern extremity of Lake Michigan in the state of Illinois. A river of the same name here flows into the lake.

Chickasaw, a nation of American Indians, settled on the head branches of the Tombecbe and Yazoo rivers, in the N. E. corner of the state of Mississippi; the N. W. extremity of their territory jets upon the river of that name; they have seven towns, the central one of which is in long. 89. 43. W. lat. 34. 23. N. Their numbers have lately been on the increase and they are now about 4,000. They have many mills and work-shops, and pay considerable attention to agriculture.

Chichacotta, a fortified town of Bootan, on the south frontier, frequently taken and relinquished by the British India troops, in the war with the Booteas in 1772. It is 48 m. S. by E. of Tasasudon. Long. 89. 35. E. lat. 26. 35. N.

Chichester, a city, the capital of Sussex, Eng. and a county of itself. It is a bishop's see, and has seven churches, beside the cathedral, a spacious edifice, 410 ft. in length, with a tower, surmounted by a spire rising to the height of 297 feet. The city is walled round, and had formerly four gates. It exports corn, malt, &c. has some foreign commerce, and a manufacture of needles. The haven affords fine lobsters. It is seated in a plain, on the river Levant, near its entrance into an arm of the English Channel, 12 m. E. N. E. of Portsmouth, and 61 S. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 7,362.

Chichester, p.t. Merrimack Co. N. H. 45 m. N. W. Portsmouth. Pop. 1,064.

Chilefa, a town of Independent Greece, in the Morea, near the Gulf of Coron, 14 m. W. of Colocythia.

Chiem-See, a lake of Bavaria 35 miles in circumference. In the midst of it are two islands; on one of them is a convent of Benedictine nuns, and on the other an Augustine monastery. It lies 23 m. W. N. W. of Salzburg, and discharges its waters by the river Alza, in a northerly direction into the Inn.

Chieri, a town of Piedmont, surrounded by an ancient wall, in which are six gates. It has four grand squares, many churches and religious houses, and considerable manufactures of cloth and silk. It is 7 miles east of Turin. Pop. about 11,000.

Chieti. See Civita di Chieti.

Chigwell, a village in Essex, Eng. 10 m. N. E. of London. It is noted for a free-school, founded by archbishop Harnett, who had been vicar of this place, and lies buried in the church. Pop. in 1891, 1,666.

Chihuahua, a city in the province of Durango, situate in the lat. of 28. 50. N. on the high road from the city of Mexico to Santa Fe, about 700 m. N. N. W. of Mexico. Chihuahua is a considerable place, having several public buildings, and about 11,000 inhabitants. The principal church is a beautiful edifice; the surrounding country is productive in silver.

Chilca, a small seaport of Peru, about 30 m. S. of Lima.

Chile, a territory of the southern division of the western hemisphere, extending from the lat. of 24. 20. to 43. 50. S. and from 68. 50. to 74. 20. W. long. bounded on the west by the Pacific Ocean, and on the east by the Andes, which divides it from the United Provinces of Buenos Ayres, being about 1,350 miles in length, from north to south, and 130 in mean breadth, in a position from the south, of N. N. E. Antecedent to the irruption of the Spaniards into this part of the world, Chile was divided into several independent states, of whom the earliest information hitherto obtained respecting them, is, that in 1450 Upanqui, the then Inca of Peru, made inroads upon the Chilian territory, and subdued the four northern provinces, at the southern boundary of which their progress was stayed by the bravery of a tribe called the Promancians. The Peruvians, however remained masters of the four provinces, up to the period of 1535, when it was first visited by the Spaniards, who invaded it from Peru with a force of 170 Europeans and 15,000 Peruvians, under the command of Almagro, the companion of Pizarro. Two-thirds of the number of this expedition perished with fatigue on the march, the remainder, however, succeeded in reaching the northern province of Chile, and the Spaniards were received by the inhabitants with cordiality and respect; but the perfidy and baseness of Almagro indulged in the wanton massacre of some of the chief men of the country, and thereby raised the indignation of the whole population against him: and having in a general engagement with the Promancians, sustained a complete defeat, and dissatisfaction prevailing among his troops, he returned to Peru in 1538. In 1540 however, Pizarro dispatched another expedition, under the command of Valdivia, who, after much resistance, succeeded in extending his arms as far as Mapocho, and from that period the Spaniards maintained possession of the country, though not without repeated conflicts with the natives, and occasional reverse of fortune. Such has been the bravery of the Araucans, a tribe of Indians, occupying the southern part of the territory, from the lat. of 37. to 42. S. that up to the present time they have never been subdued. The last conflict in which they were engaged with the Spaniards was in 1773, in which great slaughter ensued, without a decided triumph to either party. From that period, however, tranquillity has generally prevailed, the Araucans having since then had a resident at Santiago, more in the character of representative of an independent nation, than a conquered or dependent province.

In 1742, Don Josef Manto, the then Spanish governor, under whose administration peace and order generally prevailed, founded several new towns, and divided the country into the 29 following provinces, commencing at the north, viz

- | | |
|-------------|-------------|
| 1. Copiapo | 4. Cuscos |
| 2. Huasco | 5. Pectora |
| 3. Coquimbo | 6. Quillota |

- | | |
|---------------|----------------------|
| 7. Melipilla | 15. Concepcion |
| 8. Rancagua | 16. Aconcagua |
| 9. Colchagua | 21. Santa Rosa |
| 10. Curico | 18. Mapocho |
| 11. Maule | 19. Isla de Maule |
| 12. Canquenes | 20. Chillan |
| 13. Itata | 21. Rere |
| 14. Puchacay | 22. Isla de la Laja. |

Of these, the first five divisions extend from the Pacific Ocean to the Andes; Nos. 6 to 15 are bounded on the east by the seven remaining provinces, which with Concepcion, are bounded on the south by the Biobo River, in the lat. of 36. 50. S.; the more southern portion of the territory to the lat. of 42. S., being occupied by the Araucans, and the island of Chiloe projecting into the Pacific Ocean forms the southern extremity of the territory, which is separated from Peru on the north, by the dreary Desert of Atacama. The Andes, which flank the whole eastern boundary, rises to an average altitude of 12,000 to 14,000 feet above the level of the sea, having in the course of this range 14 volcanoes in a state of constant eruption, and several others which emit occasionally. All of them are, however, too remote from the inhabited parts of the territory, either to occasion inconvenience, or inspire terror, by the violence of their eruption. The several provinces are mostly divided from each other by ranges of hills, each intervening valley being intersected by one or more streams of water, contributing alike to the beauty and fertility of the country, which, as a whole, for diversity, beauty, and grandeur of feature, is unequalled in the world. Although the soil and climate of Chile are alike favourable to the culture and breed of all the fruits, grain, and animals conducive to the well-being, comfort, and enjoyment of society, its more distinguishing feature is the abundance of its mineral productions, in gold, silver, copper, tin, and iron. Such, however, for nearly three centuries, was the subduing and perverse policy of the Spaniards, that with means to command every comfort, the inhabitants of this fine and fertile territory were kept in a state of barbarism, and on the verge of want. The ties of Spanish bondage, however, now appear broken, never to be united. The first movement of resistance to Spanish authority, which took place in 1809, for some time, appeared likely to succeed without interruption; but in 1814, a Spanish force from Peru subdued nearly the whole country, and held it again in subjection until 1817, when a force, in the cause of independence, under the command of general San Martin, entered Chile from Buenos Ayres, and turned again the tide of victory against Spanish domination. On the 12th of February, 1819, the Chilians formally renounced all obligation to Spanish authority, and declared themselves independent; which the battle of Maypu, in the following April, not only confirmed to them, but enabled them to extend their arms, in pursuit of their oppressors, into Peru. The new government is, however, for the present, too unstable to justify any positive conclusion as to the future destiny of the country. The population, according to a census taken in 1812, amounted to about 1,230,000, exclusive of some scattered tribes of Indians. Santiago, or St. Jago de Chile, (as it is sometimes written) in the province of Mapocho, in the lat. of 33. 20. is the chief city, to which Valparaiso, distant 100 miles west, is the seaport. The other seaports are Copiapo, Coquimbo, Concepcion, and Valdivia.

The Chilians are gay and hospitable, and are highly fond of bull fights, music, and dancing. They sleep from noon till sunset, after which the shops and streets are lighted up, and all the public places are thronged till midnight.

A traveller in Chile in 1820, has furnished us with the following remarks:

The merchants and other principal inhabitants reside in the houses built along the base of the cliffs in Valparaiso, and along the streets of the Almendral. But the poorer people live chiefly in the Quebradas, or ravines. This class of society have been the least affected by the changes in the political state of the country, and retain, as we were informed, nearly the same manners and habits as before; a circumstance which gave them a higher interest to us; and induced us frequently to rove about, in the cool hours of the evening, amongst their ranchos, or cottages. We were every where received with the utmost frankness, and, as far as the simple means of the inhabitants went, with hospitality. They were chiefly brick-makers, day-labourers, and washerwomen, who were always gratified by the interest we took in their affairs, replying readily and cheerfully to our inquiries. Their first anxiety was that we should be seated, in order, to use their phrase, that we might "feel ourselves in our own house." Their next wish was that we should taste something, no matter how little; some offering us spirits, or milk and bread; others, who could afford nothing else, presenting a cup of water. Yet, however wretched the cottage, or poor the fare, the deficiency was never made more apparent by apologies: with untaught politeness, the best they had was placed before us, graced with a hearty welcome.

These ranchos, as well as the houses in the town, are built of large flat bricks dried in the sun; and thatched with broad palm leaves, the ends of which, by overhanging the walls, afford shade from the scorching sun, as well as shelter from the rain. Each cottage is divided into two rooms; one for the beds, and the other as a dining room; a portion of the mud floor in this apartment is always raised seven or eight inches above the level of the other parts, and being covered with mats, serves as a couch for the siesta sleepers after dinner.

In one cottage we found a young woman grinding corn in a very primitive mill, which consisted of two stones, one a large grooved block placed on the ground, the other polished, and about twice the size of her hand. The unground corn appeared to be baked till it could be crumbled into powder between the finger and thumb; this coarse flour, when mixed with water, made an agreeable drink called Uipa.

In some of the Quebradas, we occasionally discovered houses of a better class, generally occupied by elderly ladies of small incomes, who had relinquished the fashionable and expensive parts of the town, for more remote, though not less comfortable dwellings. Nothing could exceed the neatness and regularity which prevailed in these houses, where we were often received by the inmates with a politeness of manners, indicating that they had known better days. These good ladies generally entertained us with the celebrated Paraguay tea, called mattee, a beverage of which the inhabitants are passionately fond. Before infusion, the Yerba, as it is called, has a yellow colour, and appears partly ground, and partly chopped; the flavour resembles that of fine tea, to which, indeed, many people prefer it. The mattee is made in an oval-shaped metal pot, about twice as large as an egg-cup, placed nearly full of water, on the hot embers of the brazier, which always stands in the middle of the parlour; when the water begins to boil, a lump of sugar burnt on the outside is added. The pot is next removed to a filagree silver stand, on which it is handed to the guest, who draws the mattee into his mouth through a silver pipe seven or eight inches in length, furnished at the lower extremity with a bulb pierced with small holes. The natives drink it almost boiling hot, and it costs the stranger many a tear before he can imitate them in this practice. There is one custom in these mattee drinkings, to which, though not easily reconcilable to our habits, a stranger must not venture to object. However numerous the company be, or however often the mattee pot be replenished, the tube is never changed; and to decline taking mattee, because the tube had been previously used, would be thought the height of rudeness. A gentleman of my acquaintance, becoming very fond of this beverage, bought a tube for himself, and carried it constantly in his pocket; but this gave so much offence, that he was eventually obliged to throw away his private bombilla, as it is called, and follow the customs of the country.

The people in general, and particularly the peasantry, and the lower orders in the outskirts of the town, appeared to us much better bred than the corresponding ranks in other countries. In their domestic circle, they were at all times remarkably polite to one another; the children being respectful and attentive, and the parents considerate and indulgent. But this was conspicuous only at home; for, when abroad, the men were very negligent of good manners; and, although actual rudeness was contrary to their nature, they were, in general, careless of the wishes of the women, and never sought opportunities of obliging them, nor seemed to take any pleasure in being useful on trivial occasions. This habitual inattention on the part of the young men, rendered the women, in some degree, distrustful of the civility with which strangers, as a matter of course, treated them; and, at first, we often observed a look of embarrassment and doubt, when we paid them the most ordinary attention.

Chili, p.t. Munroe Co. N. Y. 241 m. W. Albany. Pop. 2,010.

Chilka, a lake in the Deccan of Hindoostan, which bounds the five Circars on the north. It lies on the coast of the Bay of Bengal, and seems the effect of the breach of the sea over a flat sandy surface, whose elevation was something above the level of the country within. It communicates with the sea by a very narrow but deep opening, and is shallow within. It is 40 miles long and 14 broad, with a narrow slip of ground between it and the sea. It contains many inhabited islands. On the N. W. it is bounded by a ridge of mountains, a continuation of that which extends from the Mahanuddy to the Godavery River and shuts up the Circars towards the continent.

Chillan, one of the seven inland provinces of Chile; it is inconsiderable, and the least important of them all. The chief town, of the same name, is about 105 miles N. W. of Concepcion. A river of the same name intersects the province from east to west, falling into the Itata in the maritime province of Puchacay.

Chillicothe, the chief town of Ross County, Ohio, and second in rank in the state; seated on a point of land formed by Paint Creek, and the west bank of the Scioto-River, 70 miles by the water-course, above its entrance into the Ohio, it has several mills and manufactures in its vicinity. It is 45 miles south of Columbus, the capital of the state, and 90 E. by N. of Cincinnati. Pop. 2,846.

Chillon, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Berne, at the end of the lake of Geneva or Lemman. On a rock in the lake is an ancient castle, which has lately been used as a state prison, and is immortalized in the verse of Byron. It is 5 m. E. S. E. of Vevay.

Chiloe, Island and Archipelago of; the Island of Chiloe forms the southern extremity of the territory of Chile, separated from the province of Araucan on the north by a channel four to five miles wide. It is 140 miles in length and about 50 in mean breadth, separated on the east from the main land by a gulf about 60 miles wide, containing 46 small islands, 15 uninhabited, forming the Archipelago of Chiloe. The total population is about 30,000. Castro, seated at the head of a bay, opening into the Archipelago, is the chief town.

Chilpanzingo, a considerable town, 2,500 feet above the level of the sea, 65 m. N. by E. of Acaapulco, on the road to Mexico.

Chilques y Masques, a district of the province of Cuzco, Peru, lying east of the Apurimac River, having a ridge of the Andes for its east boundary. It is a fertile district, containing about 16,000 inhab. Parino, in the lat. of 12. 45. S. and 71. 35. of W. long. is the chief town.

Chiltern, a chain of chalky hills in England, passing from east to west, out of Hertfordshire, through the middle of Buckinghamshire, to the Thames at Henley. This district formerly belonged to the crown, which, for time immemorial has had the nominal office of steward of the Chiltern Hundreds, by the acceptance of which a commoner vacates his seat in parliament.

Chilvers Coton, a village in Warwickshire, England, contiguous to Nuneaton, (which see). Pop. in 1821, 2,169.

Chimay, a town of the Netherlands, in the forest of Thierarche. Near it are mines of iron, with foundries and forges. It is seated near the French frontier, 12 m. N. W. of Rocroy.

Chimborazo, commonly esteemed the highest peak of the Andes, is in the province of Quito, Colombia; lat. 1. 50. S. On the 23d of June, 1797, this mountain was ascended, by the Prussian traveller, Humboldt, to the height of 19,300 feet above the level of the sea, when a chasm several hundred feet wide prevented the summit being attained; the extreme altitude of which is 21,440 feet. At the height attained, the cold was intense, and respiration rendered difficult by the extreme tenuity of the air. The peak is about 100 m. N. N. E. of Guayaquil, and presents a most magnificent spectacle for many leagues out at sea in the Pacific Ocean.

Chimera, a town of European Turkey, in Albania, with a fort, seated on a rock, at the entrance of the Adriatic, 24 miles S. of Avlona.

China, an empire of Asia, extending from the lat. of 21. 30. to 41. N. and from 98. to 122. of E. long. giving an extreme length of about 1,400 miles, and about the same number in an extreme breadth; but its boundaries being somewhat irregular if resolved into a square, it would comprise about 15 1-2 degrees of lat. between 22. 30. and 38. N. and 18 degrees of long. between 102. and 120. E. thereby giving a superficial area of about 1,200,000 square miles, or more than 20 times the extent of England and Wales, exclusive of the eastern provinces of Leaotong and the Corea, and the vast territory of Tartary on the north, (each of which see, under their respective heads). The above limits, comprise what may be considered as constituting China Proper, which has about 1,700 miles of sea coast, on the S. S. E. and E. from the long. of 108. E. in the lat. of 21. 30. N. to the long. of 120. E. in the lat. of 40. N. or from the Gulf of Tonquin to the Gulf of Leaotong. The N. and N. E. part of China Proper is bounded by a wall, which divides it from Mongul Tartary, and the west by Kokonor and Sifan, provinces of Thibet, at present but little known; and the S. W. province of Yun nen, borders on the Briman Empire, and the territory of Tonquin or Tonkin. Every part of this extensive territory appears to be intersected by streams of water, falling into two grand rivers, both rising in Thibet, and falling into the sea, one in the lat. of 31. 30. and the other in lat. 34. N. the most northerly of these is called the Hoang-ho or Great Yellow River, and the other the Kiang-keou, or the Great River, (each of which see, under their respective heads). There are also several lakes in the interior; two, south of the Kiang-keou, called Tong-tong and Poyang; each contains about 300 square miles of surface, and in the latter are several islands. The coast also, from the Gulf of Tonkin to the mouth of the Great River, is flanked by a chain of small islands; and, as forming an integral part of China Proper, are the islands of Hainan Formosa; the former at the south extremity of the empire, intersected by the lines of 19. N. lat. and 113. of E. long., and the other, intersected by the line of the Tropic of Cancer, and the 121st of E. long.; and the dependent islands, are the Loo Cheo Group, the principal of which is about 150 miles in length, from north to south, and 30 to 40 in breadth, in the long. of 139. E. and the lat. of 26. N. Between these and Formosa is another group 30 or 40 in number, nearly all of which are inhabited. Mountain ridges, run in various directions over nearly every part of China Proper: but there are none remarkable for their altitude; and, in and aggregate sense, it may be considered a level, rather than a mountainous country.

Of all the communities at present existing, that of China is unquestionably the most ancient, and, from a very early period it had obviously made great progress in the arts of social life, but of the origin of the community, nothing satisfactory is at present known; for although their records appear to have been preserved with great care, the peculiarity, and formerly supposed difficulty of acquiring a knowledge of the written characters of their language (being symbolic) together with the peculiarly jealous character of the people, had anteceded to the close of the 18th century, precluded Europeans from obtaining any correct knowledge either of the past or present extent and condition of the people. In the absence of all authentic, and correct data on the subject, numerous, vague, and exaggerated statements, relating alike to their antiquity and extent of numbers, obtained current belief in Europe; but since the commencement of the 19th century, the supposed difficulty of acquiring a knowledge of their language has proved erroneous, and the details of the several local divisions and institutions of the county are becoming every year more extensively and accurately known.

Of their origin, the most rational supposition, is, that about 4,000 years before the Christian era, the Chinese were among the first portion of the wandering tribes spread over the northern hemisphere, dispersed from some of the populous districts of that time, who formed themselves into a social community; whilst an examination of the localities and natural advantages of the territory of China Proper, as well with reference to the natural fertility of its soil, as the variety and adaptation to the wants of a social community, of its indigenous productions, will sufficiently account for the numerical extent and peculiarity of manners of its population. By the writings of Confucius (the only Chinese that appears to have obtained immortality among them) who flourished 520 years before our era, China had then attained nearly, if not quite as high a degree of sociality and refinement as prevails there at the present time. In the 15th century, China Proper may be considered as having been subjected to the arms of the Mongul Tartar chief Genghis Khan, who subverted the ruling power, and established a Tartar dynasty in the government of China; but notwithstanding this change in the government instead of the territory of China yielding itself up as a dependent province of Tartary, the superior fertility of China brought Tartary into its subservience; thereby reversing the usual result of conquest, and the conquerors became the dependents. The dynasty of Genghis gradually declined in influence, until it became entirely supplanted again by one of Chinese origin, which ruled undisturbed until the commencement of the 17th century, when a host of Manchoo Tartars from the N. E. part of Asia poured down their arms and the ruling power in China was again subverted, but with the same result to the country as in the former instance, the revolution having only extended itself to the central government, and the substitution of a Tartarian, for a Chinese sovereign. Manchoo like Mongul became a dependent province on China; and amid the various changes which have taken place in the ruling power, no material alteration appears to have been effected in the character, habits, or manners of the people.

According to an account furnished by an intelligent native of China to the agents of the English East-India Company, in Canton, in 1823, the territory of China Proper was then divided into 19 civil and military jurisdictions. Notwithstanding all the magnified impressions which have heretofore prevailed, in reference to the supposed populousness of China, relatively to the extent of territory in the two countries, its population is but little more than half that of England and Wales; and, although the numerical military force of China is represented as exceeding 1,200,000 men, the state revenues will be seen relatively not to amount to 100th part of those of England. Yet, notwithstanding the abject and servile condition to which centuries of severe rules have subjected them, the Chinese are, in general, a cheerful people; indeed, every thing relating to and connected with China, in comparison with the communities and institutions of Europe, seems anomalous. With a soil of more than ordinary fertility, in which all the fruits and vegetable productions common to Europe flourish, and which abounds in a variety inestimably valuable peculiar to itself, and a people proverbially and really industrious, famine frequently prevails extensively. To unfold, however, these mysteries belongs more to the philosopher than to the geographer.

In some of the provinces of China, part of the exactions for the support of the government are levied in kind, in grain and rice. This fact, whilst it serves to show somewhat the nature of the soil in the respective provinces, leads to the consideration of a feature in the policy of China peculiar at this time to itself but which appears in past times to have been acted upon in Egypt and in Rome; viz. that of storing up grain to meet the exigencies of occasional dearth. The average stock maintained in China for this purpose is about 30,000,000 of Sai, equal to about 2,000,000 of English tons, in the proportion of one-sixth rice, and the remainder in grain, chiefly maize and wheat; and although this quantity is not more than equal to two month's subsistence for the aggregate population, yet, when it is considered that China Proper extends through 20 degrees of latitude, partly within the tropic of Cancer, and 25 degrees of longitude, in which extensive range it is not likely that a scarcity would at most pervade more than one-fifth part, if so much, at one time, it is probable that the quantity in question has proved, by the experience of centuries, adequate to its proposed object; and it is unquestionably a measure, if duly regulated, worthy the adoption of every social community.

As there is scarcely a town or even a village in China which has not the advantage either of an arm of the sea or a canal, navigation is so common that almost as many people live on the water as on land. The great canal runs from north to south, from the city of Canton to the extremity of the empire; and by it all kinds of foreign merchandize entered at that city are conveyed directly to Peking, a distance of 825 miles. This canal is about 50 feet wide, passes through or near 41 large cities, and has 75 large sluices to keep up the water, besides several thousand bridges. China owes a great part of her riches to these numerous canals, which are cut through any kind of private property, not even excepting the gardens of the emperor.

Among the birds may be mentioned the cormorant, which the Chinese train up for the purpose of fishing. They tie a leather thong round the lower part of their necks that they may not swallow the fish they catch, and then throw the cormorants into the river. The birds dive under water and pursue the fish, and when they have caught them, rise to the top and swallow their prey as far as possible. After each bird has, in this manner swallowed five or six fish, the keepers call them and oblige them to vomit up all they have taken.

Among the fruits peculiar to China, and in addition to the orange, lemon, lime, citron, pomegranate, and the vine in great variety, are the tee-tse, a kind of fig; the li-tchi, of the size of a date, its stone covered with a soft juicy pulp, of an exquisite taste, but dangerous when eaten to excess; the long yen, or dragonseye, its pulp white, tart, and juicy, not so agreeable to the taste, but more wholesome than the li-tchi. Of esculent plants they have an infinity unknown to Europe. They cultivate also the bottom of their waters; the beds of their lakes, ponds, and rivulets, producing crops unknown to us, particularly of the pitsi, or water chestnut, the fruit of which (found in a cover formed by its root) is exceedingly wholesome, and of a very delicate taste.—Among the trees peculiar to China are the tallow-tree, the fruit of which is white, of the size of a small walnut, and the pulp has the properties of tallow; the wax-tree producing a kind of white wax, almost equal to that made by bees; the tsichu, or varnish tree, which produces the admirable Chinese varnish; the tie-ly-mou, or iron wood, the wood of which is so hard and heavy that it sinks in the water, and the anchors of the Chinese ships are made of it; the camphire-tree; the bamboo reeds, which grow to the height and size of a large tree; and, besides being used as natural pipes to convey water, are employed for numberless other purposes; the tea-plant, whose leaves and flowers are of the following shape also cotton, betel, and tobacco; the flowering shrubs, flowers, herbs, and medicinal plants, are exceedingly numerous. The tea plant grows best in valleys and on the banks of rivers, or the slopes of mountains facing the South. In 7 years it grows to the height of a man's head, when it is cut down and a new crop of shoots spring forth. The leaves are picked one by one. They are steamed over boiling water and then dried by the fire.

In the mountains and forests are wild animals of every species; but that valuable quadruped, the muskdeer, is peculiar to this country. Gold and silver are said to be common in several parts of the empire; but the working of the mines is interdicted, to prevent, as is pretended, the produce leading to a derangement of their general system of policy. The mountains, also, chiefly in the north and west parts of the empire, contain mines of iron, tutenag, copper, and quicksilver, as well as quarries of marble, coal, lapis lazuli, jasper, rock crystals, granite, and a kind of sonorous stones, of which musical instruments are composed; and here is potters' earth, of such various and superior kinds that the fine porcelain of China is unrivalled. The number of domestic animals appears to be very limited, and animal food, though not interdicted either from state or religious scruples, as is the case over a great part of Hindoostan, is very uncommon.

The manufactures of China embrace every possible commodity to gratify artificial wants; and their fabrics in porcelain, silk, and paper more especially, cannot be surpassed; nor is their carving in ivory, and other works of fancy, equalled in any other part of the world; but in all that requires skill, combined with superior physical power, they are inferior to the least settled parts of Europe. Ignorant of the laws of geometry, as well as of the laws of nature, their fortifications for defence, their habitations, public edifices, and monuments, in which a display of taste has been aimed at, are ridiculously fantastic; and when solidity has been the object, exceedingly clumsy; hence the water communication between the northern and southern parts of the empire, which Gazetteers have adorned with the designation of Grand, and as surpassing any thing of the kind in the world, is a mere connection of natural streams displaying no evidence of genius or skill beyond that of finding the nearest level whereby to effect the union. The only work of art connected with China having the least claim to admiration is the Great Wall, which separates the N. and the N. W. parts of China Proper from Mongul Tartary, which was probably not the work of the Chinese, but of the Tartars themselves, soon after the conquest of Genghis Khan; but the accounts hitherto obtained of the period of its erection are too imperfect to justify any positive conclusion on the subject.

The most singular characteristic in the civil policy of China is the total absence of all state religion and priest-craft, which are supposed to have been subverted for the two-fold purpose of preventing a priesthood from sharing in the influence of the government, and the people from congregating in too large numbers; and the latter notion seems also to have precluded the toleration of public theatres. Both religious worship and dramatic representations are, however, universal throughout the empire; of the former, every house has its own altar and collection of gods; the form and number of which are generally in proportion to the taste of the head of the family to select, and of his ability to purchase; hence their religious worship may be said to resolve itself into one of their most extensive branches of manufacture. In like manner, the dramatic representations are all of a family nature. The performers consisting of strolling companies, who engage themselves for an evening to any one who can afford to pay them. Connected with the question of religion, (according to the notions of the English) the civil policy of China tolerates polygamy. It appears, however not to be so extensively indulged in, as in other parts of Asia and Africa. Burials are not permitted in cities or towns, and their sepulchres are commonly on barren hills and mountains. They pretend to have a great veneration for their ancestors; and some keep images of them in their houses, to which they pay a sort of adoration. They have laws which regulate the civilities and ceremonious salutations they pay to each other, for which reason they always appear to be extremely good-natured, whilst low cunning and deceit are their ruling passions; and yet, while infanticide is not unfrequent among them, they are not destitute of social affections in their families.

In person, the complexion of the Chinese is a sort of tawny; they have large foreheads, small eyes, short noses, large ears, long beards, and black hair; and those are thought to be the most handsome who are the most bulky. The women affect a great deal of modesty, and are remarkable for their little feet. The men endeavour to make a pompous appearance when they go abroad; and yet their houses are mean and low, consisting only of a ground floor. For a more ample elucidation of the nature and character of the general government, language, literature, &c. of China, see Pekin; for further particulars respecting the Great Wall, see Petcheli; of the Grand Canal, see Hoang-ho; of the public monuments, and internal traffic of China, see Nankin; of the nature and extent of its external commerce, see Canton and Kiackta. In conclusion here, it may be said, in point of aggregate efficiency, or in affording general examples of social policy worthy of imitation, China is inferior to the least important state of Europe; whilst the extent and grandeur of its natural features, the diversity, beauty, and interest of its productions, both natural and artificial, and the superlative excellence of many of its fabrics, both of utility and ornament, render research and development in the details of all these characteristics, an object in the highest degree desirable, which it is sincerely hoped will now very soon be attained.

Chinabaker, a town of Pegu, situate in the marshes of the Irrawaddy, south of Rangoon.

Chinapalabram, a town of the Mysore, 55 m. N. of Bangalore.

Chinapatam, or Chinypatam, another town of the Mysore, about 40 m. E. S. E. of Seringapatam.

Chinchilla, a town of Spain, in Murcia. 37 m. west of Almanza, and 67 N. N. W. of Murcia. Pop. about 5,000.

Chin-chi. See Quin-nong.

Chingleput, a town of the Carnatic, near the sea-coast, about 40 m. S. of Madras.

Chinachin, or Cheenchin, the chief town of the district of Jenilah, in the N. W. part of Nepal, at the foot of the Himalah Mountains.

China India, a general name comprising that part of southern Asia situated between Hindoostan and China. It contains the Birman Empire, Tonquin, Cochin China, Cambodia, Laos, Siam and the peninsula of Malacca. It is often called the Peninsula beyond the Ganges. The name of Chin India was first applied to this region by Malte Brun. See the several divisions under the head above named.

Chinon, a town of France, in the department of Indre and Loire, with a strong castle, in which Henry II. of England expired. Chinon is the birth-place of Rabelais and of Quillet. It is seated on the Vienne, 10 m. N. of Richelieu, and 150 S. W. of Paris. It has some manufactures, and contains about 5,500 inhabitants.

Chinsura, a town of Hindoostan, in Bengal, with a fortress, seated on the Hoogly, 17 m. N. of Calcutta. It was formerly the principal settlement of the Dutch in Bengal.

Chiny, a town of the Netherlands, in Luxembourg, on the river Semoy, 40 m. W. by N. of Luxembourg.

Chioslic, a town of European Turkey, in Rumania, the see of a Greek bishop, seated on a river of the same name, 47 m. W. N. W. of Constantinople.

Chiozza, a town and island of Italy, in the Gulf of Venice. Much salt is made here. The town is built on piles, and has a harbour, defended by a fort, 18 m. S. of Venice. This island contains about 20,000 inhabitants.

Chipiona, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, situated on a rock, near the sea, 5 m. W. S. W. of St. Lucar de Barrameda.

Chippenharn, a borough in Wiltshire, Eng. It has three establishments for the manufacture of fine woolen cloth. It is seated on the Lower Avon, over which is a bridge, 21 m. E. of Bristol, and 93 W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,200.

Chippewa, townships in Beaver Co. Pa. and Mayne Co. Ohio.

Chippeway, a river falling into the Mississippi, from the N. E. about 70 m. below the falls of St. Anthony. It has its source near one of the rivers falling into the west end of Lake Superior. Also a creek of Upper Canada falling into Niagara river above the cataract. A village of the same name stands at the mouth of the creek, and here was fought a battle between the Americans and British, July 5, 1814.

Chipping, a Saxon word, signifying market or fair, precedes, in all formal proceeding, the name of several towns in England, such as those of Barnet, Norton, Ongar, &c. &c.; but the prefix is now fallen into disuse, in common parlance, except in the case of Chipping Norton, which is a neat town in Oxfordshire. The church is an elegant structure of gothic architecture. It is 73 m. W. N. W. of London, on the road to Worcester.

Chirequi, a town of Veragua, on a river of the same name, 12 miles north of its mouth, in the Pacific Ocean. Long. 83. 28. W. lat. 8. 30. N.

Chirk, a village of Wales, in Denbighshire, on the top of a hill, near Wrexham. It had formerly two castles, one of which seems to have been a magnificent structure. In the vicinity, the Ellesmere Canal is carried over the vale and river Ceiriog by a magnificent aqueduct. Pop. in 1821, 1,458.

Chirme, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, on the strait that parts the continent from the Isle of Scio. It was anciently called Cysus, was celebrated for the great victory which the Romans gained here over the fleet of Antiochus, in 191 B. C., and has been distinguished by the destruction of the Turkish fleet by the Russians in 1770. It exports large quantities of raisins, and is 40 m. W. of Smyrna. Long. 26. 16. E. lat. 38. 24. N.

Chiswick, a village in Middlesex, Eng. on the Thames; 7 m. W. by S. of St. Paul's, London. Here is a celebrated villa of the duke of Devonshire; and in the church-yard is a monument of Hogarth. Pop. in 1821, 4,236.

Chitore, the chief town of a district of the same name, in the province of Ajimere, about 100 m. S. by W. of the city of Ajimere.

Chitpoor, a considerable town of Guzerat, about 30 m. N. E. Mangalore, on the shore of the Arabian sea. It has extensive manufactures of chintzes.

Chitro, or Kitro, a town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, on the west shore, near the head of the Bay of Salonichi. Here the mother, wife, and son of Alexander were murdered by Cassander. It is 36 m. S. S. E. of Edessa.

Chittagong, a province of Asia, lying between the Bay of Bengal and Arracan. It was conquered from Arracan by Aurungzebe, in 1666, and now belongs to the English East India Company. Islamabad is the chief town, which see.

Chitteldroog, or Chaltrakal, a strong fort and town of Hindoostan, capital of the N. E. district of Mysore. The plain of Chitteldroog is 10 miles long and four broad, surrounded by rocky hills, on one of which stands the fort. The town formerly occupied a great portion of the plain, and is still a considerable place but now confined entirely within the walls, which are near the foot of the rock. Hyder, who obtained possession of this place by treachery, strengthened the walls; and other works have been since added, so as to render it totally impregnable against any neighbouring power. Since the final defeat of Tippoo, in 1799, it belongs to the rajah of the Mysore; and the English keep a garrison here. It is 48 m. N. W. of Sera, and 117 N. by W. of Seringapatam.

Chittenden, a county of Vermont, bounded on the W. for about 38 m. by Lake Champlain, between the lat. of 44. and 45. N. It is about 18 m. in mean breadth, and is divided into 24 townships. Pop. 21,775. Burlington, is the chief town.

Chittenden, t. Rutland Co. Vt. Pop. 610.

Chittenharn, t. Montgomery Co. Pa.

Chittenango Creek, a stream in Onondaga County, New York, having in the course of about 10 miles, a fall of 80 feet, into Oneida Lake.

Chittle, or Chitterdroog, a fortress, and considerable town of the Mysore, about 120 m. N. by W. of Seringapatam.

Chittore, a town of Hindoostan, in the Carnatic, 28 m. N. W. of Arcot, and 70 west of Madras.

Chivas, or Chivasse, a fortified town of Piedmont, on the river Po, 12 m. N. N. E. of Turin. Pop. about 5,500.

Chiusa, a strong town of Italy, in the Veronese, on the east bank of the Adige, in a narrow pass, 14 m. N. N. W. of Verona. Also of another town in Piedmont, about 10 m. S. E. of Coni. Pop. about 6,000.

Chiusi, a town of Tuscany, in the Siennese, on the river Chiano, 35 m. S. E. of Sienna.

Chintaja, or Kutajah, a town of Asiatic Turkey, capital of Natolia Proper. Here are several mosques, and three Armenian churches; and in the vicinity are some warm baths. It stands at the foot of a mountain, near the river Pursak, 75 m. S. E. of Bursa. Long. 30. 47. E. lat. 39. 16. N.

Chmielmik, a town of Poland, in Podolia, on an island formed by the river Bog, 80 m. N. E. of Kaminiack. Long. 27. 50. E. lat. 49. 44. N.

Choco, a bay of Colombia, in the Pacific Ocean. There is a town named Buenaventura, at the mouth of a river, falling into this bay, in the lat. of 3. 50. N.

Choco, is also the name of a district in Colombia, lying between the two first western ridges of the Andes, between the 6th and 8th degrees of N. lat. The river Atrato intersects this district from south to north, falling into the Gulf of Darien; the head waters of this river were united in 1788 by the Canal de Rispadura, with the river St. Juan, falling into the Pacific Ocean about 20 m. N. W. of Buenaventura.

Chocout, t. Susquehanna, Co. Pa.

Chocatus, or Flat Heads, a tribe of Indians in the State of Mississippi and Alabama. They are about 20,000 in number, and possess a fertile soil producing cotton which they manufacture into cloth for their own use. Within a few years their condition has been much improved, and the state of agriculture among them is quite respectable. They have missionary stations in their territory at Elliot, Emmaus, Goshen, Hebron, May-hew and other places.

Chocim, a town and fortress of Moldavia, situate on the south bank of the Dneister, 110 m. N. N. W. of Jassy, and 15 S. W. of Kamienic, in Podolia. Chocim was the scene of repeated conflicts between the Turks and Poles, during the integrity of Poland, and since its dissolution between the Turks and Russians, till it was finally ceded to the latter power in 1812 and it is now included in the government of Podolia.

Choisul, a town of France, in the department of Upper Marne, 12 m. N. E. of Langres.

Chollet, a town of France, in the department of Mayenne and Loire, with a castle, 27 m. S. S. W. of Angers. Pop. about 4,800.

Cholm, or Kolm, a town of Russia, in the government of Pskov, on the river Lovat, 180 m. S. of Petersburg.

Cholmogor, or Kolmogor, a town in the government of Archangel, situate on an island in the river Dwina, 30 m. S. of the city of Archangel.

Cholula, a city of Mexico, in the intendancy of Puebla, and about seven miles west of the city of Puebla. Previous to the irruption of the Spaniards into Mexico, Cholula was the seat of government of an independent state, which, in conjunction with three other adjoining republics, had resisted the authority of the Mexicans for several centuries. Cortes halted at Cholula, on his way to the city of Mexico, in 1519, at which time it contained about 200,000 inhabitants, who carried on extensive manufactures of cotton cloths, jewelry, and earthenware. It was also the chief place of religious resort in all Mexico, having a temple in the shape of a pyramid, of great extent and magnificence; it had also, at that time, not less than 400 other places of worship. Cholula is now, comparatively, an inconsiderable place, having only about 15,000 inhabitants, being eclipsed in splendour and importance by Puebla.

Chonad, or Csonad, an episcopal town of Hungary, and capital of a county of the same name. It is seated on the south bank of the north branch of the Marosch River, 25 miles above its entrance into the Theiss, at Zegedin.

Cheptank, a river of Delaware and Maryland, flowing into the Chesapeake Bay.

Chorassan, or Khorassan, a province of Persia, extending from the lat. of 32. to 39. N. and from 54. 30. to 93. of E. long. containing an area of about 147,000 square miles. It is bounded on the west by the Great Salt Desert, Mazenderan, and the Caspian Sea; north by the Bay of Balkan, and the Desert of Karakum; N. E. by the main branch of the Gihon Amu, or Oxus River, which divides it from Great Bucharia, east by the territory of Balk; S. E. by the Lake Zeresh, or Dura, which divides it from Segistan, and the extreme south, projects upon the Desert of Kerman. A ridge of the Gaur Mountains intersects the east side of the province, from south to north; and east of this ridge is the Magrab River, which falls into the Oxus at Amol. Another river, with several tributary streams, rises near Herat, in the S. E. corner of the province, and runs in a N. W. direction into the Bay of Balkan. Meshid, in the latitude of 37. 35. N. and 57. 15. E. long. is the capital of the province; the other chief towns are Herat, Badkis, Zenzan, Abiverd, &c.

Chorley, a town in Lancashire, Eng. It is seated on the line of the Liverpool, Lancaster, and Leeds canal, 22 m. N. W. of Manchester, on the road to Preston, from which it is distant 9 miles. Chorley participates largely in that great business for which Lancashire is so celebrated, viz. the cotton manufacture. In 1825, there were four large establishments for spinning, upwards of twenty for weaving (chiefly muslins,) six for printing of calicoes, with a proportionate number for dyeing, bleaching, reed-making, &c. In the neighbourhood are quarries of ashlar, flag, and millstone; and mines of coal, lead, and alum, and also carbonate of barytes. It holds four fairs annually. The population in 1801, 4,516; and in 1821, 7,315.

There are six villages in different parts of England named Chorlton, all inconsiderable.

Christianfeld, a town of Denmark, in the duchy of Sleswick, built by a society of Moravians, under the protection of Christian VII. All articles manufactured here are of excellent quality. It is 8 m. N. of Hadersleben.

Christiania, the capital of Norway, and an episcopal see, in the government of Aggerhuys, situate at the extremity of a fertile valley, forming a semicircular bend along the shore of the Bay of Biorning, which forms the north extremity of the Gulf of Christiania. It is divided into the city, the suburbs of Waterlandt, Peterwigen, and Fierdingen, the fortress of Aggerhuys, and the old town of Opaloe. The city was rebuilt in its present situation by Christian IV. after a plan designed by himself. The streets are carried at right angles to each other, and uniformly 40 feet broad. It covers a considerable extent of ground, but has not more than 10,000 inhabitants. The castle of Aggerhuys is built on a rocky eminence on the west side of the bay, at a small distance from the city. Opaloe was the site of the old city, burnt in 1624; it contains the episcopal palace. Christiania has an excellent harbour, and its principal exports are tar, soap, iron, copper, deals and alum. It is 30 miles from the open sea, and 290 N. by W. of Copenhagen. Long. 10. 50. E. lat. 59. 50. N.

Cinaloa, or Silonia, a province and town of Mexico, in the intendancy of Sonora, on the gulf of California. The Aborigines in this province are robust and warlike, and were with difficulty brought to submit to the Spaniards, about the year 1771. This province produces abundance of maize, legumes, fruits, and cotton, and abounds in the richest gold mines. The town is seated on a river of the same name, and contains about 9,500 inhabitants. Long. 109. 35. W. lat. 26. 15. N.

Cincinnati, the largest town of the state of Ohio, and the capital of Hamilton County. It is seated on the north bank of the Ohio river, about two miles below the entrance of the Licking, from the state of Kentucky, and 20 above the entrance of the Great Miami, and about 600 above the entrance of the Ohio into the Mississippi, in the lat. of 39. 7. N. and 7. 30. W. long. of Washington city. Cincinnati has increased in population and importance more rapidly than any other town in the Union. The population which in 1805 did not exceed 500, in 1830 amounted to 26,515 with indications of still greater increase. It has extensive flour and saw-mills, worked by steam, and various manufactures. It carries on a very extensive traffic with New Orleans, in exchanging the agricultural productions of the state of Ohio for tropical and other foreign articles; and is the most important city of all the territory of America west of the Alleghany Mountains. It is regularly built in squares and many of the structures are handsome. It has a college and a medical institution.

Cineff, a town of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, in the neighbourhood of which excellent manna is collected. It is 20 m. west of Palermo.

Cineya, a town of the Netherlands, in the territory of Liege, 17 m. S. E. of Namur, and 37 S. W. of Liege.

Cinque Ports, certain ports on the south coast of England, opposite France, so called on account of their being five in number, when their first charter was granted by William I. in 1077. These were Dover, Hastings, Hythe, Romney and Sandwich; to which were afterwards added Winchelsea, Seaford, and Rye. The king appointed a constable of Dover castle (who is now called Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports) and invested him with the command of these ports, whose inhabitants had considerable privileges and immunities, for which they were to supply the government with 57 ships, at 40 days notice and to pay their crews during 15 days. At that period, the opulent traders of London were styled barons; a privilege that was enjoyed likewise by the merchants of these ports; each of which at present returns two members to parliament, the representatives being styled barons of the Cinque Ports. Their other privileges are now become nominal. See each place under its respective head.

Cinque Villas, a town of Portugal, in Beria, 6 m. N. E. of Almeida.

Cintegabelle, a town of France, in the department of Upper Garonne, on the frontier of Arriege, 17 miles south of Toulouse. Pop. about 3,000.

Cintra, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, situated between the mountains of Cintra, on the north side of the entrance of the Tagus. Here was a palace built by the Moors, which was destroyed by an earthquake, in 1655, and rebuilt by king Joseph. It is 12 m. N. W. of Lisbon, by the inhabitants of which place it is much frequented as an occasional retreat; and is distinguished for the convention concluded at it, on the 22nd August, 1808, between the English general Dalrymple and the French general Junot.

Ciotat La, a seaport of France, in the department of Mouths of the Rhone, defended by a strong fort. It is famous for muscadine wine, and seated on the Bay of Laquee, 14 m. S. E. of Marseilles.

Circars, five provinces of the Deccan of Hindoostan, on the Bay of Bengal. They were originally denominated Northern, from their position in respect to the Carnatic.—Under the Mogul dynasty the government of these provinces was vested in the nizams of the Deccan, and were assigned to the French in 1753, for arrears of pay claimed by them for auxiliary troops, with which they had supplied the nizams. In 1759 they were conquered from the French by the English; and in 1765 were formally ceded by the Great Mogul, Shah Alum, to the English East India Company, during the governorship of lord Clive. Four of these provinces, viz. Guntoor, Codapilly, Ellore, and Rajamundry, comprise about 7,000 square miles of territory, between the Mouths of the Krishna and Godavery rivers, and the line of 16. to 17. of north latitude, and the fifth, Ciscole, extends in a N.E. direction along the shore of the Bay of Bengal, from the Godavery River, in the latitude of 17. N. for about 280 miles, to the lake Chilka, and is about 60 miles in mean breadth. This is the district from whence 500,000 to 600,000 pieces of cotton manufactured goods were formerly imported into England, under the name of long cloths, Sallampores, and calicoes; and handkerchiefs under the name of Mazulipatams, &c.; it is also fertile in maize. Ciscole is now divided into two districts, viz. Ganjam and Vizigipatam, and the other four circars resolved into three districts, viz. Rajamundry, Mazulipatam, and Guntoor.

Circassia, a country of Asia, lying between the 44th and 45th degrees of north lat. and longitudinally between the Black Sea, the Sea of Azof and the Caspian; its precise boundaries are very undefined; the Caucasian Mountains dividing it from the territories of the Abkhaz, may be considered as forming its boundary on the south; but the habits of the people being completely predatory, they acknowledge no boundary but that prescribed by the force of arms. It was formerly governed by several princes; but is now almost wholly subject to Russia, and included in the government of Caucasus. It contains the districts of Great Cabarda, Little Cabarda, Beslen, Temirgoi, Abasech, Beeduch, Hatukai, and Bahani. From the peculiarly advantageous local circumstances of this country, and the extraordinary courage, and military genius of its inhabitants, it might become independent and very formidable were they united under one chief; but they are entirely a predatory people, divided into many different and hostile tribes; and want that spirit of unity necessary to make their power effectual. The Cabardians are the most powerful race, and their superiority has introduced a general imitation of their manners among their neighbours, so that from a description of these, an idea may be formed of all the rest. They are divided into three classes, the princes, the usdens, or nobles and the vassals, or people. The people are divided into certain portions, who are each governed by a princely family; the eldest of whom is considered as chief, and the judge, protector, and father of the vassals. His person is sacred; but he cannot be a landholder. His property is nothing more than his arms, horses, slaves, and what tribute he can occasionally exact from foreign powers.

They are with difficulty distinguished from their subjects, their dress and food being the same, and their houses little better. The usdens are chosen by the princes from among the people; and are their officers, the executors of the law, the ministers of the legislature. Both the usdens and the people are proprietors of land. There does not appear to be any written law: the people are governed by a kind of common law, founded on a collection of ancient usages. They have a few manufactures; and their tillage produces scarcely sufficient for their own subsistence. The principal articles of commerce are sheep and horses, particularly the latter, which sell at a high price, being much esteemed. The balance of trade would, however, be considerably against them, were it not for the slaves they make in their predatory excursions. They have no money, and all their commerce is carried on by exchange. They almost universally subsist by robbery, being trained to it from their very cradle. This disposition naturally produces a bold adventurous spirit: they are expert horsemen, and able warriors, being in general stout and well made.

Their women are famed for their beauty; and chiefly supply the seraglios of Persia and Turkey. Those that are thus sold are, however, chiefly slaves, or their descendants. They sell from 200. to 1000. according to their beauty. The women participate in the general character of the nation, taking pride in the courage of their husbands, and loading them with reproaches when defeated. They are kept extremely close; and the greatest reserve subsists between the married pairs. Their habitations are usually two huts, one for the husband, and the reception of strangers; and the other for the wife and family. The Circassians were formerly Christians; but, for want of instruction and written laws, they content themselves with a bare profession of being Christians or Mahometans. They have no letters of their own; and those who wish to write their language are obliged to make use of Arabian characters.

Circleville, p.t. Pickaway Co. Ohio on the Scioto. An ancient Indian fortress of a circular shape at this spot gave name to the town. Pop. 1,136.

Cirencester, commonly called Ceister, a borough in Gloucestershire, Eng. The ruins of the walls are yet visible; it had also a castle and an abbey, and here three Roman roads, the Foss, Irmia, and Icknild, crossed each other. It is one of the greatest marts in the country for wool; and has a manufacture of carriers knives, highly valued, and two public breweries; the church is a very stately edifice. It is seated on the banks of the little river Churn, 18 m. S. E. of Gloucester, and 59 W. of London. It communicates both with the Severn and the Thames, by a canal. Pop. in 1821, 4,987.

Cirie, a town of Piedmont, seated on the Doria, near the foot of the Alps, 8 m. N. N. W. of Turin. Pop. 3,500.

Citta Vecchia, a fortified city of Malta, formerly the capital of the island, and still the seat of the bishopric. The most remarkable edifices are the palace of the grand master, and the cathedral. Here are extensive catacombs, about 15 feet below the surface of the rock in which they are cut; they contain streets formed with such regularity, that the title of Subterranean City has been given to this place. Near the city is the Grotto of St. Paul, divided into three parts by iron grates; in the furthest part is an altar, and a statue of the saint, in white marble. This old city was considerably larger than at present; for the new city, Valetta, being more conveniently seated, has drawn away the greater number of its inhabitants. It stands on a hill, in the interior of the island, 6 m. W. by S. of Valetta.

City Point, p.v. Prince George Co. Va. on James River at the mouth of the Appomattox.

Clackmannanshire, a county of Scotland, bounded on the S. and S. W. by the Forth, and on all other sides by Perthshire. It is nine miles long and six broad; produces good corn and pasture, and plenty of coal and salt. It has also veins of lead, cobalt, and antimony. Alloa is the principal town. It has a population of 12,000, one third of whom are engaged in trade and manufactures.

Clackmannan, a parish and town of the above county. The parish comprises nearly four-fifths of the county, and contains about 800 acres of woodland. The town is seated on an eminence, and has a harbour formed by the Devon, at its influx with the Forth. On the top of a hill, 190 feet above the level of the Forth, is a square tower, which derives its name from the illustrious Robert Bruce, whose great sword and casque are here preserved. It is 27 m. W. N. W. of Edinburgh. In 1821 the parish contained 4,056 inhabitants, about a fourth of which inhabited the town.

Clagenfurt, a town of the Austrian empire, capital of Lower Carinthia. It has a strong wall, and contains six churches and three convents. Here is a manufacture of cloth, and a considerable one of white lead. This town was taken by the French in 1797, and again in 1809, when they demolished the fortifications. It stands on the river Glan, which falls into the Drave, 148 m. S. W. of Vienna. Pop. about 10,000.

Clair, St. a lake of North America, between the lakes Huron and Erie, 90 miles in circumference. It receives the waters of the lakes Superior, Michigan, and Huron, and also of the River Thames, from Upper Canada, in the lat. of 42. 32. N. and discharges them, through the strait called Detroit, into the lake Erie.

Clair, St. a county in the state of Illinois, the west side of which borders on the Mississippi River in the lat. of 38. 30. N. Pop. 7,092. Belleville is the chief town. St. Clair is also the name of a township in Alleghany County, and of another in Bedford County, both in Pennsylvania.

Clairec, or Cleurec, a town of France, in the department of Lot and Garonne. Corn and tobacco are cultivated, and a great deal of wine and brandy made here. It is seated in a valley, on the river Dort, 13 m. N. W. of Agen. Pop. about 6,000.

Clatsop, a county of the state of Mississippi, bounded on the south by the Big Black, and north by the Yazoo Rivers, and on the west for about 25 miles by the Mississippi River, between the lat. of 32. and 33. north. It is about 8 miles only in mean breadth. Pop. 9,818. Port Gibson is 78 m. N. W. by W. of Monticello, is the chief town.

Claborna, is also the name of another county, on the north frontier of East Tennessee, intersected in a N. E. direction by Clinch, a ridge of the Alleghany Mountains; it is bounded on the south by Clinch River, and intersected on the N. Before the late revolution, the chapel of an hospital in the suburb was the provision for the bishop of Bethlehem, who was fixed here in 1180, after the Christians had been driven from the Holy Land. Clamecy is seated at the confluence of the Beuvron with the Yonne, 35 m. N. E. of Nevers. Pop. about 5,300.

Clapham, a village in Surrey, an appendage to the British metropolis, 4 m. S. of London Bridge. It is composed of a number of very neat houses, built round an extensive common, presenting a very rural, picturesque, and interesting scene. The houses are occupied chiefly as the private residences of the upper class of shopkeepers, incumbents of public offices, and merchants of the metropolis. In proof of the agreeableness of its situation, the population, which in 1801 was 3,864, in 1821 was 7,151.

Clapton, Upper and Lower. See Hackney.

Clara, St. a small island of Pera, in the Bay of Guayaquil, 70 m. S. W. of Guayaquil. Long. 82. 20. W. lat. 2. 20. S.

Clare, a town in Suffolk, Eng. It is famous for the great men who have borne the title of earl and duke of it. Lionel, third son of Edward III. becoming possessed of the honour of Clare, by marriage, was created duke of Clarence; and that title has ever since belonged to a branch of the royal family. Here are the ruins of a castle; also of a priory, the house of which is now occupied by a farmer, and the chapel is a barn. Clare has a manufacture of baize, and is seated near the Stour, 15 m. S. of Bury St. Edmund, and 56 N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,487.

Clare, a maritime county in the province of Munster, on the west coast of Ireland, bounded on the north by Galway Bay, and south by the Shannon. It contains a good deal of mountainous surface; the valleys however are very fertile; and it breeds more horses than any other county in Ireland, beside a great number of cattle and sheep. Ennis, 113 m. W. by S. of Dublin, is the capital. Although it has 70 m. of sea-coast, it has no frequented harbour, its principal outport being Limerick. For subdivision, population, &c. see Ireland.

Clare, a parish and town on the north bank of the Shannon, in the preceding county. The parish in 1821 contained 3,019 inhabitants. The town, at the head of a bay, in the Shannon, 3 m. S. of Ennis, contained 505 of the above inhabitants. There is also another parish of the same name in the county of Galway, intersected by the river Clare, which falls into Lake Corrib, about 5 miles north of the town of Galway. Population of this parish 3,146.

Claremont, p.t. Sullivan Co. N. H. 97 m. from Portsmouth; 100 from Boston. The principal village is situated on Sugar River, a branch of the Connecticut. It is a flourishing town, with manufactures of woolen and paper. Pop. 2,526.

Claredon, a village in Wiltshire, Eng. near Salisbury. Here was once a royal palace, in which the parliament was several times convened; the first time by Henry II. in 1164, who enacted the laws called the constitutions of Clarendon, by which the power of the clergy was restrained.

Clerkenwell, one of the out-parishes, forming an integral part of the British metropolis, lying on the north side. The inhabitants, in 1801, amounted to 23,396, and in 1821, to 32,105, about 5,000 of whom were employed as lapidaries, working jewellers, and in all the various branches of the manufacture of clocks, watches, and time-keepers, which are here made in greater perfection than in any other part of the world. In this district are two or three extensive distilleries, several iron foundries, and various other manufactures, as also the works of the New River Company, which supply a great portion of the metropolis with water, conveyed by pipes into the several houses. Clerkenwell contains also a very elegant and spacious edifice, in which the sessions for the county of Middlesex are held; two extensive prisons, one appropriated as a house of correction for juvenile offenders, and the other, which has recently been much enlarged, to general purposes. It has a theatre for pantomime and aquatic exhibitions, called Sadler's Wells, and was formerly distinguished for an extensive establishment of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. This was destroyed by the rebels under Wat Tyler, in 1381, except the principal gate tower, which still remains entire, and forms one of the most interesting features of antiquity connected with the metropolis. It has two churches, but neither of them remarkable for their architecture; nor is the general aspect of this division of the metropolis in any way imposing to the eye; but in the extent and value of its productions, it is entitled to rank among the most important.

Clerke, or Sinde Isles, two islands near the entrance of Behring's Strait, between the coasts of Kamtschatka and North America. They were seen by Cook in 1778, and so named in honour of captain Clerke, his second in command. They were both inhabited, and not unknown to the Russians. Long. 169. 30. W., lat. 63. 15. N.

Clermont, a city of France, capital of the department of Puy de Dome, and a bishop's see. It is seated on an eminence, and sometimes called Clermont Ferrand, since the town Montfer rand, about a mile distant to the N. E., was united under the name of a suburb; the cathedral, public squares, and walks, are very fine, but the streets are narrow, and the houses built of stone of a gloomy hue. In the neighbourhood are some mineral springs: and that of the suburb St. Allyre, has formed a natural bridge over the brook into which it falls, so that carriages can pass over. Clermont is the birthplace of the celebrated Pascal, and has manufactures of ratteens, druggets, serges, and leather. It is 215 m. S. by E. of Paris, and 10 W. of Lyons. Pop. about 16,000.

Clermont, a town of France, in the department of Meuse, on an eminence by the river Ayr, 12 m. W. by S. of Verdun.

Clermont de Lodeve, a town of France, in the department of Herault, with manufactures of cloth and hats; seated on an eminence near the Loquere, 80 m. S. S. E. of Lodeve, and 24 W. of Montpellier. Pop. about 5,500.

Clery, a town of France, in the department of Loiret, once famous for the pilgrimages to our lady of Clery. Here is the tomb of Louis XI., who appears in white marble as the saint and the patriot king. It is 9 m. S. S. W. of Orleans.

Cleveland, p.t. Cuyahoga Co. Ohio, on Lake Erie, at the junction of the Ohio canal with the waters of the lake. Pop. 1,076.

Cleves, a duchy of Westphalia, bordering on the S. E. part of Holland, divided into two parts by the Rhine. It is a fine country, variegated with hills, woods, fields, towns, and villages, and the chief rivers are the Rhine, Lippe, and Roer. The capital is Wesel.

Cleves, a city of Germany, and the capital of the duchy of Cleves. It is seated on the eastern side of three hills, two miles west of the Rhine; and has a castle, built in the time of Julius Cæsar. It is 70 m. N. N. W. of Cologne, and about the same distance E. by S. of Rotterdam. Pop. about 5,000.

Cleves, p.v. Hamilton Co. Ohio.

Cliff, a Saxon word implying a rock or high ground. There are six villages in different parts of England so named, probably from their situation (in a relative sense) on high ground. There are three others named Clifford, in reference to their contiguity to a fordable stream; and 22 named Clifton, implying towns on a cliff, or high ground. None of these demand any particular notice, except Clifton contiguous to Bristol, to which city it forms a beautiful and interesting appendage; as its name implies, it is built on an eminence, at the foot of which, on the north bank of the Lower Avon, is a hot well, that contributes greatly to its advantage, by the numerous visitors who seek to avail themselves of the benefits of its restorative properties. The buildings of Clifton are in general elegant and commodious, and from their elevated site command extensive and beautiful prospects. The population, which in 1801 was only 4,457, in 1821 amounted to 8,811. See Bristol.

Clifford, t. Susquehanna Co. Pa.

Clinch, a river of Tennessee, flowing into the Tennessee river.

Clinton, a county at the N. E. extremity of the state of New York. It is bounded on the east for about 35 m. by Lake Champlain, which divides it from Vermont, and on the north, for about 32 miles, by the conventional line that separates the United States from Lower Canada. Pop. 19,344. Plattsburg is the chief town.

Clinton, an interior county in the S. W. part of the state of Ohio, in which one of the branches of the Little Miami River has its source. Pop. 11,292. Wilmington, in the centre of the county, is the chief town.

Clinton, p.t. Kennebec Co. Me. Pop. 2,125.

Clinton, a village in Oneida Co. N. Y. 9 m. S. W. of Utica. Hamilton College at this place was founded in 1812. It has 7 instructors and 77 students. The libraries have 6,000 volumes. There are 3 vacations in January, May and August of 13 weeks. Commencement is in August. Clinton, is also the name of 7 other towns in N. C., Geo., Ten., Ohio and Indiana.

Clithero, a borough town in Lancashire, Eng. seated on the east bank of the river Ribble, at the foot of Pendle Hill, on the confines of Yorkshire. It is a place of some antiquity, having the ruins of a castle built by the Lacys, in 1178; but was comparatively insignificant, until the early part of the present century, at which period the cotton manufacture was introduced. The population which in 1801 was only 1,368, and in 1811, 1,767, in 1821 had increased to 3,213. At the latter period it had two extensive works for spinning of cotton yarn, three for manufacturing of ditto, and one for printing of ditto. At the same period a neat edifice was erected for a town-hall; the church is also a neat edifice and it has a free grammar school. It communicates by a collateral cut with the Leeds and Liverpool canal, which facilitates the conveyance of large quantities of lime, dug in the vicinity of the town. It has a spring of water impregnated with sulphur. It holds a market on Saturday, and four fairs annually, and returns two members to parliament. It is 30 miles due north of Manchester, and 20 E. N. E. of Preston.

Clogher, a parish in the county of Tyrone, Ireland, which in 1821 contained 15,856 inhabitants, including a decayed city of the same name with 524 of the number. The city, which is the see of a bishop, is 20 m. W. by N. of Armagh, and 76 N. N. W. of Dublin.

Clon, there are about 100 parishes and towns in Ireland, beginning with Clon, among which the following are the most important, viz. :—

Clonahilly, a town of the county of Cork, Ireland, seated at the head of a bay on St. George's Channel. The principal part of the town is formed of a spacious square. Pop. in 1821, 4,033. It is 20 m. W. S. W. of Cork.

Clones, a town of Ireland, in the county of Monaghan, 61 m. N. by W. of Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 2,240. The parish of Clones extends into Fermanagh county, and contains an aggregate population of 15,362, including two other towns, viz. Royslea and Smithsborough, containing about 250 persons each.

Clonfert, a bishop's see, on the eastern confines of the county of Galway, Ireland. It is a miserable place, containing only 31 houses, 36 miles east of Galway, and 70 west of Dublin. There is a parish of the same name, in the county of Cork, containing 12,324 inhab.

Clonmell, a town partly in the county of Tipperary and partly in that of Waterford, Ireland. It is seated on the banks of the river Suir, over which is a bridge of 20 arches, 22 m. W. N. W. of the city of Waterford and 82 S. W. of Dublin. It is the assize town for the county of Tipperary, and returns one member to the parliament of the United Kingdom; and has considerable manufactures of woollens, a lunatic and orphan asylum, several schools, and other public buildings. It was the birth place of Sterne. Pop. in 1821, 15,890.

Clonmines, a small village at the head of Bannow Bay, 16 m. W. N. W. of Wexford.

Clontarf, a town on the north shore of Dublin Bay, two miles east of the city of Dublin. It has several neat residences in its vicinity, and is memorable in Irish history, for the last battle fought between the native Irish and the Danes, in 1015, which led to the expulsion of the latter from Ireland. Pop. 1,439.

Cloppenburg, a town of Westphalia, in the principality of Munster, 32 m. N. E. of Lingen.

Closter Neuburg, a town of Austria, with an Augustine convent of regular canons. It has a yard for ship-building, and is seated on the Danube, 7 m. N. N. W. of Vienna.

Closter Seem, or Kloster Zeven, a town of the duchy of Bremen, memorable for a convention entered into between the duke of Cumberland, and the duke of Richelieu, commander of the French armies, in 1758, by which 38,000 Hanoverians laid down their arms and were dispersed. It is 19 m. S. of Stade.

Cloud, St. a town of France, in the vicinity of Paris celebrated for its palace, which was the favourite residence of Napoleon.

Cloallty, a village in Devonshire, Eng. three m. E. N. E. of Hartland. It is built on the side of a steep rock, to which the houses seem fixed like pigeon-huts; and it has a good pier on the west shore of Barnstable Bay. Pop. 941.

Cloye, or Clois, town of France, in the department of Eure and Loire, 5 m. S. W. of Chateaudun.

Cloyen, a town of Ireland, on the east shore of Cork harbour, in the County of Cork, and a bishop's see, 16 m. E. of Cork. Pop. in 1821, 1,847.

Clundert, a town and fortress of South Holland, near an arm of the sea, called Hollands Diep. In 1793, it was taken by the French, who were obliged to evacuate it soon after; but it surrendered to them in 1795. It is 9 m. S. E. of Williamstadt.

Cluny, a town of France, in the department of Saone and Loire, with a late famous Benedictine abbey, seated on the Croasne, 13 m. N. W. of Macon.

Cluses, a town of Savoy, in Faucigny, seated on the Arve, 22 m. S. E. of Geneva.

Clywd, a river of Wales, which rises in the middle of Denbighshire, runs N. through a fertile valley of the same name, and having entered Flintshire flows into the Irish Sea, 6 miles below St. Asaph.

Clyde, a river of Scotland, which rises in the south part of Lanarkshire, passes by Lanark, Hamilton, Glasgow, Renfrew, Dunbarton, and Port Glasgow to Greenock, where it enters an arm of the sea, called the Frith of Clyde. This river runs, for several miles, between high rocks, and in its course forms several cataracts: is deservedly celebrated for its romantic and diversified scenery, and has several extensive cotton, and other works on its banks. At Glasgow it becomes navigable; and 6 miles below that city it is joined by the Great Canal from the Forth.

Clyde, Frith of, an inlet of the sea, between the coast of Ayrshire, and the Isle of Arran, which opens into the north channel, between the N. E. end of Ireland and Scotland.

Clythness, a cape of Scotland, on the S. E. coast of the county of Caithness. Long. 0. 33. E. lat. 58. 16. N.

Congo, a tributary stream of the great river Congo, in South Africa. It rises in Matamba, and runs a course nearly due north, falling into the Congo, about 100 m. above the Cataracts. It is supposed by some to be the main branch of the Congo.

Coanzo, a river of Africa, which rises in the interior parts, crosses the kingdoms of Matamba and Angola, and enters the Atlantic in lat. 9.20.S.

Coast Castle, Cape, the principal settlement of the English on the coast of Guinea, with a strong citadel. The Portuguese first formed an establishment here in 1610; but were soon after dislodged by the Dutch, who, in their turn, surrendered it to the English, in 1661. At the present period it appears increasing in commercial importance. It is in the lat. of 57. N. and 152. of W. long.

Cobbe, the capital of the territory of Darfur, in Zahara, North Africa, situate on the borders of Nubia, 150 m. W. S. W. of Sennar, and 500 S. E. of Mathan. Long. 28. 8. E. lat. 14. 11. N.

Cobbessacote, r. a branch of the Kennebec, which runs into that river at Gardiner, Me.

Cobham, a village in Surrey, Eng. on the river Mole, 7 m. S. W. of Kingston. It has several handsome villas, two medicinal springs, and a manufacture of iron and copper. Pop. in 1821, 1,340.

Cobi, called by the Chinese Shamo, a vast desert of Asia, extending from the 76th to the 110th degree of E. long. and lying between the 35th and 36th of N. lat. The western part of this vast district borders on Bochara, and the S. W. on Thibet. The Chinese province of Kan-suh (which see) projects into this desert, and the N. E. part stretches toward the frontiers of Asiatic Russia; but its limits are on every side too imperfectly defined to admit of any precise description. See, however, as well as Kan-suh, Kara-Kum and Shing-King.

Cobija, a town of Peru, on the coast of the desert of Atacama with a good harbour for vessels carrying the metals from the neighbouring mines. It is 250 miles south of Arica. Long. 34. 44. W. lat. 22. 30. S.

Coblentz, a strong city of Germany, in the circle of Lower Rhine, situate at the conflux of the Rhine and the Moselle; with a bridge of boats over the former, and a stone-bridge over the latter. In the time of the Romans it was the station of the first legion by whom it was called Confluentes; and after them, the residence of the successors of Charlemagne; and at a later period, it was the capital of the grand duchy of Treves. It contains three large churches two of which are collegiate, a college, eight convents, &c. It is memorable for having been the chief rendezvous of the French emigrant princes at the commencement of the revolution. It was taken by the French in 1794, who retained it until the peace of 1814, when it was assigned to Prussia. It transmits large quantities of excellent wine, timber, and iron, by the Rhine, into Holland. It is 235 m. W. S. W. of Berlin, 420 W. N. W. of Vienna, and 260 E. S. E. of Paris. Long. 7. 32. E. lat. 50. 24. N. Pop. about 11,000.

Coblentz, a town of Switzerland, in the district of Bayden, at the conflux of the Aar and the Rhine. It is 10 m. N. N. W. of Baden.

Cobleskill, p.t. Schoharie Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,988.

Cobre, El, a town of the island of Cuba, 10 m. W. of St. Jago.

Coburg, Saxe, a principality, at the S. W. extremity of the circle of Upper Saxony, projecting into the circle of Franconia. It is one of the petty states of the Germanic confederacy. Its area is about 400 square miles; the population in 1824 was 80,012; its quota of soldiery for support of the confederacy being 800 men, and its total revenue equal to about £50,000. It emerged somewhat from obscurity in 1816, by the alliance of its prince, to the Princess Charlotte of England. It is a tolerably fertile district, intersected by the river Itsch, which runs from north to south into the Mayne, and contains, besides several villages, the towns of Hilburghausen, Einfeld, Sonneberg, Schalkaw, Neustadt, Heldburg, Umerstadt, and Coburg; and Konigsberg, with several villages insulated in the bishopric of Wurzburg.

Coburg, the capital of the preceding principality, is seated on the banks of the Itsch, 95 m. S. S. W. of Leipzig, and has a college, a fort, and a castle. Here are manufactures of porcelain, and of petrified wood, with which the country abounds, and it carries on some trade in wool. The government offices and town house form part of the sides of a spacious square. Pop. about 7,000.

Coca, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, with a strong castle for state prisoners; seated among mountains, on the river Eresma, 22 m. N. W. of Segovia.

Cochabamba, a district of South America, lying between the 62nd and 68th degrees of W. long. and the 16th and 19th of S. lat. and forming a part of the Republic of Bolivia. It is watered by several streams, all running from south to north, uniting on the northern frontier, to form the river Mainore, running through the government of Moxos and Brazil, where after the union of the Guapare, it is called the Madeira, falling into the Amazon. Cochabamba is an exceedingly fertile district; and the inhabitants, about 70,000 in number, seem to perfer the pursuits of agriculture, rather than of mining. The chief town of the same name is situate on the western confines of the province, in the lat. of 18. S. and about 200 miles east of Arica.

Cochece, r. N. H. a branch of the Salmon Fall river.

Cochelm, a town of Germany, seated on the Moselle, 25 m. S. W. of Coblenz.

Cochecton, t. Sullivan Co. N. Y. Pop. 438.

Cocherel, a town of France, in the department of the Eure; noted for a victory gained by Guesclin over the king of Navarre, in 1564. It is 7 m. E. of Evreux.

Cochin, a province of Hindoostan, on the coast of Malabar, towards the southern extremity of the Peninsula; a chain of islands flanks the whole extent of the coast. It is a very fertile district, and yields abundance of rice, pepper, and cocoa nuts, and excellent timber for ship-building. It was the first part of India where the Portuguese, after passing the Cape of Good Hope, formed a settlement; but their intrigues and extortions soon caused them to be repulsed from the main land; but they were allowed, in 1503, to erect a fortification on one of the islands, in the lat. of 9. 57. N. The fort surrendered to the Dutch in 1663, who, by their toleration of all religious pretensions, occasioned it to increase greatly in population. The natives of the province successfully resisted the Mahometan arms up to the period of 1776, when Hyder Ali, rendered them tributary; and the exaction being enforced with increased vigour under Tippee Saib, in 1791, the rajah sought the protection of the English; to whom the Dutch fort surrendered in 1795 and thereby the whole territory became subservient to the English. The fort is 120 m. S. by E. of Calicut.

Cochin China, a maritime kingdom of Asia, extending from Cape Varela-falsa, in the lat. of 12. 55. N. to Sinboo Bay, in the lat. of 16. N.; it is bounded on the west by a high mountain ridge, running parallel with the coast its whole extent, at the distance of 60 to 70 miles; this mountain ridge divides Cochin China from a vast desert, lying between the mountains and the great river Cambodia. The aborigines of Cochin China are called Moys, and reside chiefly on the western declivities of the mountains. To these strong holds they were driven, about the beginning of the 15th century, by the present possessors of the country. The aborigines are a savage people, and in features resemble the Caffres. The present inhabitants bear evident marks of being derived from the same stock as the Chinese; their religion is also the same, and most of their manners and customs. They are a courteous, affable, inoffensive race, rather inclined to indolence. The women are by far the most active sex, and merchants often employ them as their factors and brokers. The cities and towns have gates at the end of each street, which are shut every night. The houses are mostly of bamboo, covered with rushes or the straw of rice, and stand in groves of oranges, limes, plantains, and cocoa trees. Here is plenty of sugar, pepper, rice, yams, sweet potatoes, pumpkins, and melons; also ivory, musk, honey, and silk, and the edible birds'-nests. The climate is healthy, the summer heat being tempered by regular breezes from the sea. In September, October, and November is the rainy season, when the low lands are suddenly overflowed by torrents of water from the mountains; the inundations happen generally once a fortnight, and continue three or four days. In the three following months there are frequent rains, brought by cold northerly winds, which distinguish this country with a winter different from any other in the east. The inundations render the land fruitful, many parts producing three crops of grain in the year. Gold is taken almost pure from the mines, and there are rich silver mines. The country is intersected by rivers, which are well calculated for promoting inland commerce, yet not large enough to admit vessels of great burden; but there are commodious harbours on the coast, particularly that of Turon, in the lat. of 16. 5. N. The vanity of the Chinese induces them to consider Cochin as a tributary province of their empire; but if any acknowledgment is made, it is merely nominal. The Cochin Chinese are the most brave and efficient of the eastern nations; they have hitherto held very little intercourse with Europeans, but carry on an extensive traffic with China and various parts of the eastern seas.

Cochranville, p.v. Chester Co. Pa.

Cocke, a county of E. Tennessee, bounded on the S. E. by a ridge of the Appalachian Mountains, called the Smoky Mountains, which divide it from North Carolina. It is intersected by the Big Pigeon and French Broad Rivers, which unite their streams towards the N. W. boundary of the county. Pop. 6,048. Newport is the chief town.

Cocker, a river which rises in the south of Cumberland, Eng. flows through the lakes of Buttermere, Cromack-water, and Lowes-water, and joins the Derwent, below Cockermouth.

Cockermouth, a borough in Cumberland, Eng. It stands on the Cocker, at its conflux with the Derwent, and between two hills, on one of which is a handsome church, and on the other the remains of a stately castle. It has manufactures of shalloons, coarse linen and woolen cloths, leather, and hats. It returns two members to parliament, and is 38 m. S. W. of Carlisle, and 305 N. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,770.

Cocconato, a town of Piedmont, the birth place of Columbus, as some affirm, 20 m. east of Turin.

Cod, Cape, is the northern extremity of a peninsula, more than 120 miles in extent, and 10 to 15 in mean breadth, forming part of the state of Massachusetts. Cape Cod and the main land form a very spacious bay, about 50 miles each way; and Cape Cod and Cape Ann are the south and west points which form the open bay called Massachusetts Bay, leading to the harbour of Boston: the outer side of the peninsula forming Cape Cod is flanked by shoals, which render the navigation thereabouts dangerous. A light-house, on the Cape Point, is in lat. 42. 3. N. and 70. 6. W. long.

Codogno, a town of Italy, in the Lodessan, duchy of Milan, near the confluence of the Adda with the Po, 12 m. S. S. E. of Lodi.

Codomudi, a town of Hindoostan, in Coimbatore, seated near the Caverry, a little above the influx of the Noyelar, 23 m. S. E. of Bhawanikudal.

Codorus, a township in York Co. Pa.

Coesfeld, a town of Westphalia, in the principality of Munster, near the source of the Burkel, 18 m. west of Munster.

Coevorden, a fortified town of Holland, on the confines of Drenthe, Westphalia, and Overijssel, and one of the strongest places in the whole country. It stands in a morass, on the river Aa, 33 m. S. by E. of Groningen. It is the capital of Drenthe.

Cocymans, a town in Albany County, New York, on the west bank of the Hudson River, 14 m. S of Albany. Pop. 2,723.

Coffeesville, p.v. Clark Co. Alab.

Coggeshall, a town in Essex, Eng. with a manufactory of baize; seated on the north bank of the river Blackwater, seven miles west of Colchester, and 44 E. N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 2,896; and a village of the same name, on the opposite side of the river, contains 362 inhabitants more.

Cognac, a town of France, in the department of Charente, with a castle, where Francis I. was born. It is celebrated for excellent brandy, and seated on the Charente, 17 m. west of Angoulême, and 40 east by south of Rochefort.

Cogne, a town of Piedmont, in a valley, and on a river of the same name. The mountains which surround it are rich in mines of iron and copper. It is six miles south of Aosta.

Cagni, or Konick, a city of Turkey, capital of Caramania, and the see of a Greek archbishop. The walls have 108 square towers at 40 paces distance from each other; and it has two large suburbs, into one of which the caravans and strangers retire. It has upwards of 100 mosques, and though much declined of late years, it is still a place of great trade, and seated on the east side of a ridge of lofty mountains, in a country abounding in corn, fruit, pulse, and cattle, 380 m. S. E. of Constantinople, and about the same distance due east of Smyrna.

Cohasset, a town on the south coast of Massachusetts Bay, just without the entrance to Boston harbour, 26 m. S. W. of Boston. Cohasset has a tolerably good harbour; but a ledge of rocks at its entrance renders its approach dangerous. Pop. 1,227.

Cokeos Falls, a village eight miles due north of Albany, in New York; it is seated on the banks of the Mohawk River, over which is a bridge, about a mile and a half above its entrance into the Hudson; about three-quarters of a mile higher up, the Mohawk, being about 350 yards wide, pours down its waters over a precipice in an unbroken sheet, a height of 70 feet perpendicular and next to Niagara, forms the grandest cascade in the state of New York.

Cotimbatoré, a province of the peninsula of Hindoostan, lying south of Mysore, to which it was lately subject, but ceded to the English on the final defeat of Tippoo in 1799. It is 110 miles long and 70 broad; and is divided by the river Noyelur into two districts, North and South, of which Bhawanikudal and Daraporam are the chief towns.

Cotimbatoré, a town of Hindoostan, the ancient capital of the province of the same name. It was taken by general Meadows in 1790, and retaken in 1791 by Tippoo, who soon after destroyed the fort. It contains 2,000 houses, an extensive mud palace, and a tolerable mosque, built by Tippoo, who sometimes resided here; but it has no large temple. The palace now serves as a barrack for a regiment of British cavalry. The chief manufactures are muslins, and cotton cloths; and these, with cotton wool and thread, tobacco, sugar, and betel leaf are the principal articles of trade. It is 100 m. S. by E. of Seringapatam. Long. 77. 6. E. lat. 11. 0. N.

Coimbra, a city of Portugal, capital of Beira, and a bishop's see, with a celebrated university, the only one in Portugal, transferred hither from Lisbon in 1306, where it was originally founded in 1290. The cathedral is magnificent, beside which there are nine churches, and eight convents. It stands on a mountain, on the river Mondego, over which is an elegant bridge about 25 miles above its entrance into the sea, 100 m. N. E. of Lisbon. It suffered considerably by the great earthquake in 1755. Pop. about 12,000.

Coire, or Chur, a town of Switzerland, capital of the canton of the Grisons, and a bishop's see

It is surrounded by ancient brick walls, with square and round towers, and divided into two parts, the least of which is of the catholic religion and the greatest of the protestant. The French surprised and defeated the Austrian army at this place in 1799. It is seated between two mountains, on the river Plessur, near the Rhine, 65 m. S. by W. of Constance, and contributes to render Coire a place of considerable traffic. It was the birthplace of Angelica Kauffman, the female painter.

Coitsville, a township in Trumbull Co. Ohio.

Coiking, a city of China, of the first rank, in the N. W. part of the province Yu-nan, 1,160 m. S. S. W. of Peking.

Colalico, t. Lancaster Co. Pa.

Colapoor, a small independent state of Hindoostan on the coast of the Concan, bounded on the south by the Portuguese territory of Goa. The rajah of this district pretends to be descended from the founder of the Mahratta empire. The natives were formerly celebrated for their piracies; Vingoria, the principal town, is in lat. 16. N.

Colar, or Coloras, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a large mud fort, and the remains of a hill-fort. It is the birth-place of Hyder Aly, who erected here a handsome mausoleum for his father; and near it is a mosque, and a college of of Musulman priests. The chief manufactures are cotton cloths and muslins. It is 40. m. E. N. E. of Bangalore, and 140 W. of Madras. Long. 78. 9. E. lat. 13. 9. N.

Colbese, a town of Tripoli, on the S. W. part of the Gulf of Sidra, 90 m. S. S. E. of Messurata.

Colberg, a fortified seaport of Further Pomerania. It has a collegiate church, good linen manufactures, and considerable saltworks. The Russians laid siege to this town in 1758 and 1769, without success; but it surrendered to them after a long siege in 1761, and was restored at the subsequent peace. It is seated at the mouth of the Persant on the Baltic, 60 m. N. E. of Stettin. Long. 15. 36. E. lat. 54. 9. N.

Colchagua, the ninth in order of the provinces of Chile extending from the Pacific Ocean to the Andes, in the lat. of 34. 30. S. It is intersected by two or three rivers, falling into the Pacific; but it has no port or harbour of note. Pop. about 15,000. San Fernando, about 50 miles from the sea, and 100 south of St. Jago, is the chief town.

Colchester, a borough and market town in the county of Essex, Eng. pleasantly situate on a gentle eminence, on the west bank of the river Colne, about eight miles above its entrance into the English Channel. It is a place of antiquity, supposed to have been a Roman station; and was formerly surrounded by a wall, some vestiges of which still remain, and contained a castle of great strength, supposed to have been built by a son of Alfred the Great, the remains of which now serve for a house of correction for petty offenders. Prior to the civil war, in the time of Oliver Cromwell, the wall, castle, and fortifications were entire, and held out with great obstinacy against the parliamentary forces, until after Charles I. was beheaded in 1648, in which year it surrendered. The town sustained great damage during the siege. It is now by far the largest and most important town in the county, and has undergone great improvement within the present century; a spacious quay has been constructed, and the river made navigable up to the town for vessels of 90 to 100 tons burthen. It is a port of entry for vessels from foreign parts, and has a custom house a little below the town; but its external commerce is very inconsiderable. Its chief traffic in export is in oysters and grain, which it sends to the London market in great quantities, and receives in return every description of shop goods for the supply of the town, and distribution over the surrounding country. It had formerly extensive manufactures of woolen stuffs, but the manufacture at Colchester is now trifling, no small share of its present importance is derived from the extensive intercourse of which it is a centre point between London, Harwich, Ipswich, Yarmouth and Norwich. It is divided into 16 parishes, and has as many churches; but four of them are not used, and only three are entitled to notice for their architecture. It has three bridges over the Colne, a spacious market place, town hall, corn exchange and a theatre. It has also an hospital, free grammar schools, water works, two public libraries, a botanical and philosophical institution, and several dissenting meeting houses. The town is governed by a mayor, recorder, town clerk, 12 aldermen, 18 assistants, and 18 common-councilmen; and returns two members to parliament, the right of election being vested in the corporation and free burgesses not receiving alms. Its markets are on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Pop. in 1821, 14,016. It is 51 m. E. N. E. from London, 21 W. by S. of Harwich, and the same distance S. S. W. of Ipswich.

Colchester, a town of Vermont, in Chittenden County, on a Bay of Lake Champlain, at the influx of the Onion, 6 m. N. by E. of Burlington. Pop. 1,489.

Colchester, a town of Connecticut, in New London County, 20 m. N. W. of New London. Pop. 2,083.

Colchester, a township in Delaware County, New York, 91 m. S. of Albany. Pop. 1,424.

Colchester, a town of Virginia, in Fairfax County, on Occoquan Creek, three miles from its conflux with the Potomac, and 16 S. W. of Alexandria.

Colding, or Kolding, a town of Denmark, in Jutland, formerly the residence of many Danish kings, who adorned it with several edifices. The harbour is choked up, and its commerce nearly annihilated. It is seated on the Thuetha, near its entrance into a bay of the Little Belt, 30 m. E. N. E. of Ripen.

Coldingham, a town of Scotland, in the county of Berwick, anciently noted for a nunnery, rebuilt by Edgar, king of Scotland, in 1098, Ebba, one of the abbesses, renowned in tradition for her charity, gave name to the neighbouring promontory called St. Abb's Head. It is 9 m. N. N. W. of Berwick. Pop. about 1,000.

Cold River, r. N. H. joins the Connecticut at Walpole.

Colditz, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, with manufactures of linen and stuffs, seated on the Mulda, 23 m. S. E. of Leipzig.

Coldstream, a town of Scotland, in the county of Berwick. Here general Monk first raised the Coldstream regiment of guards, with which he marched into England to restore Charles II. It is seated on the Tweed, over which is a handsome bridge, 13 m. S. W. of Berwick.

Colagars, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Coimbatore. It has two large temples, and is a considerable mart for the traders between Seringapatam and the country below the eastern Ghauts. It is 34 m. S. E. of Seringapatam.

Colebrook, p.t. Coos Co. N. H. on the Connecticut. Pop. 542.

Colebrook Dale, a village in Shropshire, Eng. on the banks of the Severn, 2 m. N. by E. of Broseley, which see.

Colebrookdale, a township of Berks Co. Pa.

Coleraine, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Londonderry, seated on the banks of the river Bann, about four miles above its entrance into the Atlantic Ocean. In 1821 the town and suburbs of Coleraine contained a population of 4,851, and the remainder of the parish 1,630 more. It participates largely in the linen manufactures, and its fabrics and bleach are in the highest esteem. The fall of the river Bann precludes it from affording much commercial advantage to Coleraine; but this defect is in some measure compensated for by its salmon fishery, which is the most valuable in Ireland. Coleraine sends one member to the parliament of the United Kingdom; and is 25. E. by N. of Londonderry, and 108. N. by W. of Dublin.

Coleraine, p.t. Franklin Co. Mass. Pop. 1,877.

Colerain, a town of the state of Georgia, in Camden County. A treaty was concluded here, in 1796, between the United States and the Creek Indians. It is seated on St. Mary River, 35 miles W. by N. of the port of St. Mary, and 14 S. by E. of Louisville.

Coleraine is also the name of a town in Hamilton County, Ohio, on the east bank of the Miami River, about 15 miles above its entrance into the Ohio, and 10 north of Cincinnati.

There are 6 other towns of this name in the United States; namely in Pa., N. C. and Ohio.

Coleshill, a town in Warwickshire, Eng. seated on a hill, by the river Cole, 10 m. E. of Birmingham, and 105 N. W. of London, on the mail line of road to Liverpool. The church is an elegant structure. Pop. in 1821, 1,760.

Colesville, p.t. Broome Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,387. Also towns in Maryland and Va.

Calford, a town of Gloucestershire, Eng. five miles E. S. E. of Monmouth, and 124 W. by N. of London. It has several iron forges in its vicinity.

Colin. See Kolin.

Colima, a town of Mexico, in the intendencia of Guadalupe, on the frontiers of Valladolid; it is seated at the foot of a volcanic mountain, about 300 miles due west of the city of Mexico, under the banks of a small river, about 30 miles above its entrance into the Pacific Ocean, in the lat. of 18. 40. N. The intervening country between the town and the sea is very fertile. Pop. of the town about 2,500.

Coll, an island of Scotland, one of the Hebrides, to the W. N. W. of Mull, 13 miles long and three broad. The greatest part is covered with heath, and abounds with rabbits; and many black cattle are fed here. The castle of Coll is a strong square-built structure, and still in tolerable repair. Total pop. in 1821, 1,264.

Collahuas, a district of Peru, lying between Lake Titicaca, and the Pacific Ocean. It is a very mountainous district; the Andes here diverging into several ridges, among which the Apurimac and other streams, forming the head waters of the noble river Amazon, have their source. Cailloma, in the lat. of 15. 40. S. is the capital.

Colle, a town of Tuscany, on a hill near the river Elza, 10 m. N. N. W. of Sienna. There are five other towns of the same name in different parts of Italy all inconsiderable.

Collado, a town of Upper Saxony, in Thuringia, on the Unstrut, 19 m. N. by W. of Weimar.

Colleton, a maritime district of South Carolina, south of Charleston; it is intersected by the Edisto River, and is fertile in rice and cotton. Pop. 27,256.

Collinsville, a town of France, in the department of Eastern Pyrenees, with a castle. It was taken by the Spaniards in 1793, but retaken the next year. It has a small port on the Mediterranean, 16 m. S. S. E. of Perpignan.

Collinsville, p.v. Huntingdon Co. Pa.

Collon, a well-built town of Ireland, in Louth County, with a stocking manufactory, and an extensive bleach field, 23 m. from Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 1,347.

Collumpton, a town in Devonshire, Eng. with a considerable trade in woolen cloth. It is seated on the river Culm, 12 m. N. N. E. of Exeter, and 160 W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,410.

Colmar, a town of France, capital of the department of Upper Rhine. It is surrounded by a wall, flanked with towers, near the river Ill; and has various manufactures, 42 m. S. by W. of Strasburg. Pop. about 15,000.

Colmar, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Holstein, 5 m. S. E. of Gluckstadt.

Colmars, a town of France, in the department of Lower Alps, 20 m. E. N. E. of Digne.

Colmitz, a town of Austria, 4 m. S. S. W. of Drossendorf.

Coln, a river of England which rises near Clare, in Suffolk, passes by Halstead and Colchester in Essex, and after a course of about 40 miles enters the German Ocean, at the east end of Mersey Island. In the inlets and pools at the mouth of this river are bred the famous Colchester oysters. There are several small rivers of the same name in England.

Colnbrook, a town in Buckinghamshire, Eng. seated on the river Coln, which falls into the Thames, 17 m. W. of London, on the road to Bath. Pop. in 1821, 2,817.

Colne, a town in Lancashire, Eng. It is a place of great antiquity, having been selected for a Roman station, by Agricola. It is situate near the border of Yorkshire, within about a mile of the Liverpool and Leeds Canal. It formerly participated in the woolen manufacture, which, within the present century has given way to the more profitable pursuit of the cotton manufacture, in which branch, in 1821, there were seven large establishments for spinning and weaving, and twelve others for weaving only. The vicinity abounds in coals and slate. The population, which in 1800 was only 3,636, in 1821 had increased to 7,274. It is 21 miles N. by E. of Manchester.

Colocythia, a town of Independent Greece, in the Morea, on the west side of a bay to which it gives name, 36 miles S. of Mistra. Long. 22. 24. E., lat. 36. 38. N.

Colocza, or Kalotsha, a town of Hungary, on the east bank of the Danube, and an arch-bishop's see, 57 m. S. of Buda.

Cologna, a town of Italy, in the Paduan, 26 m. W. by S. of Padua. Pop. about 6,000.

Cologne, a late archbishopric and electorate of Germany, in the circle of the Lower Rhine; bounded on the north by the duchy of Cleves and Gelderland; on the south by the archbishopric of Treves, and from the south, in a N. N. W. direction, for about 90 miles, by the Rhine, which divides it on the east from the duchy of Berg and on the west it is divided by a very irregular boundary from the duchy of Juliers. It is not more than about 15 miles in mean breadth, and contains a good deal of forest, some mines of coal and iron, and parts of it are fertile in corn, wine, and flax. Pop. about 220,000: it held a distinguished rank in the Germanic confederacy as early as the fourth century, and at the general partition in 1814, it was transferred to Prussia. Besides the city of Cologne, the other principal towns are Kemper, Lunne, Nuys, Brul, Meckenheim, Bonn, &c.

Cologne, the chief town of the preceding territory, and one of the most ancient and celebrated cities of Europe, is seated on the west bank of the Rhine, in the lat. of 50. 55. N. and 6. 55. of W. long. 295 miles W. S. W. of Berlin, and 105 E. of Brussels. Antecedent to the ascendancy of the Romans over western Europe, the site of Cologne is supposed to have been the capital of a tribe called the Ubii; and at a subsequent period, to have given birth to Agrippina, the mother of Nero; in reference to whom the Romans named it Colonia Agrippina. It joined the Hanseatic League at an early period of its formation; and in the 13th century ranked high as a commercial city. After that period its commercial activity yielded to the influence of priestcraft and in dolence—persecution followed; in 1485 the Jews, and in 1618 the Protestants, were expelled the city; so that in 1794, when the French took possession of it, the ecclesiastics amounted to about 2,000; and besides the university, founded in 1388, nine collegiate churches, two abbeys, and an archiepiscopal seminary, it contained no less than 126 other monastic and religious establishments. The walls of the city are about seven miles in circumference; but a considerable portion of the area is now converted into gardens and vineyards; and although the perspective of the city on all sides is very imposing, on inspection it proves to be low and ill built. The town-hall, cathedral, and some of the churches are, however, stately and fine edifices. Cologne is connected with Duytz, on the opposite bank of the river, by a bridge of boats; and contains within itself almost every branch of manufacture for domestic use; it still carries on some traffic up and down the Rhine, from the waters of which it is liable to inundation. The city was transferred with the territory of Cologne, to Prussia in 1814. Pop. about 40,000. It was the birth-place of Rubens.

Colombe, St., the name of about 20 towns in different parts of France, all inconsiderable.

Colombey aux Belles Femmes, a town of France, in the department of the Meurthe, and chief place of a canton in the district of Veselize, 15 m. S. W. of Nancy.

Colombia, Republic of, an extensive territory, forming the whole northern part of the southern division of the western hemisphere commonly called South America, and includes what, previous to 1811, constituted the vice-royalty of New Granada, and the captain-generalship of Caracas or Venezuela. In its extreme length from N. to S. Colombia extends from the shores of the Caribbean Sea, in the lat. of 12. 30. N. to the Tunguragua, the main western branch of the great river Amazon, in the lat. of 5. S. and longitudinally from 59. to 83. W. From the 59th to the 68th of W. long. however, it extends only to 3. of N. lat. and its mean long. on the western side, or side of the Pacific Ocean, will not exceed the line of 79. W.; these limits will give an aggregate extent of sur face of about 1,200,000 square miles, or an area 14 times the extent of Great Britain; but over this wide domain the human inhabitants are supposed not to exceed 3,000,000. In its north-western extremity, it includes the Isthmus of Panama, with several spacious and commodious harbours. On its eastern extremity it is bounded by the Essequibo River, which divides it from French Guyana and the English and Dutch settlements of Demerara, Berbice, and Surinam; from the 59th to the 65th deg. of W. long., it is bounded on the south by a mountain ridge, which divides it from Portuguese Guyana, the most northern part of Brazil; whilst the Tunguragua, or, as it is afterwards called, the Marañon River, divides it from Peru; the whole of its western boundaries being washed by the Pacific Ocean, and its northern by the Caribbean Sea, and the N. E. by the Atlantic Ocean. The earlier history of this territory will be found more particularly adverted to under the heads of New Granada and Venezuela. A futile attempt was made by General Miranda to revolutionize Venezuela in 1806; but it was not till 1811 that the people generally exerted themselves in favour of independence: from which period up to 1819, various sanguinary conflicts ensued between the European Spaniards and the natives, with alternate success. It was on the 17th of Dec. 1819, that the two territories of New Granada and Venezuela became united under the title of the Republic of Colombia, and a popular representative government divided into legislative, executive, and judicial. On the 6th of May, 1821, in conformity with the fundamental law, the installation of the general congress took place in the city of Rosario de Cucuta, but the seat of government has since been established at Bogotá. It was at Carabobo, on the 24th of June of the same year, that the last battle was fought which decided the downfall of Spanish domination, and independence of the Colombian Republic. The territory was at first divided into four parts; viz. Quito, Cundinamarca, Venezuela and Spanish Guyana; but it was afterwards divided into twelve provinces. The local circumstances of each province will be found under their respective heads.

The aggregate features of the Colombian territory are, in the highest degree, grand and imposing. The Andes, in a parallel ridge of about 200 miles in extent, between which is a valley twenty or thirty miles wide, at an elevation of about 9,000 feet above the level of the sea, enter at the S. W. extremity, in which direction the peaks of Chimborazo, Cotopaxi, and Antisana, rear their majestic heads, all south of the equator; and in the lat. of 2° N. the chain diverges into three ridges, the most easterly of which takes an E. N. E. direction towards the shore of the Caribbean Sea, with which it runs parallel through seven deg. of long. to near the Delta of the Orinoco, opposite to the island of Trinidad. It is on the eastern declivity of this ridge, which is called the Venezuelan chain, at an altitude of 1,000 feet above the level of the sea, in the lat. of 4° 45' N. that Bogotá is situate. Between this and the central ridge, which is called the Chain of Santa Martha, runs for a course of 650 m. the fine River Magdalena; and between the Chain of Santa Martha and the main ridge, runs the River Cauca, which unites with the Magdalena at the foot of the Santa Martha Chain, about 150 miles above the entrance of the Magdalena into the Caribbean Sea. From the lat. of 6° N. the main ridge of the Andes takes a N. by W. direction into the isthmus that unites the two grand divisions of the western hemisphere, whilst another collateral ridge runs nearly due north towards Carthagena. Between these two ridges runs the river Atrato N. into the Gulf of Darien, the head waters of which river are contiguous to those of the St. Juan, which runs S. into the Bay of Choco in the Pacific Ocean, which rivers seem to form the most favourable means for effecting a water communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. East of the Andes, the country is intersected by innumerable streams, those in the south part running into the Marañon, or Amazon, and those in the north part into the Orinoco. From the extreme north the country is indented by a spacious bay called the Gulf of Maracaibo, which leads by a narrow strait into a spacious lake of the same name. This lake, which is about 180 miles in length and 70 in width, is bounded on the E. by the Venezuelan chain of the Andes, and on the W. by a ridge which diverges from it in the lat. of 8° N.; and with the lake forms a very distinguishing feature of the country. Numerous islands flank the coast of the Caribbean Sea, from the long. of 61. to the Gulf of Maracaibo in the long. of 70.: the most easterly and important of these is Trinidad, in possession of the English, and near the entrance of the Gulf of Maracaibo is Curacao in possession of the Dutch. The rest may be considered as forming part of the Colombian territory, the most important being Margarita. The principal sea-ports on the side of the Atlantic and coast of the Caribbean Sea, are Cumana, Laguaira (the out-port of Leon de Caracas), Maracaibo, Carthagena, and Portobello; and on the side of the Pacific Ocean, Panama, Bay of Choco, and Guayaquil. The most important towns in the interior, besides Bogotá, are Lojan, Juan de Bracamoros, Cuenca, Riobamba, Quito, Popayan, Merida, and Angostura.

Colombia is not remarkable for any peculiar productions either animal or vegetable. Its capabilities for supplying all that can contribute to the comfort and enjoyment of man, are however of the first order; while the elevated plains on the western side of the territory, afford the most agreeable temperature of climate. The S. W. section of the territory is rich in minerals, including both gold and silver; but the most distinguishing feature of surplus production, hitherto, has been horses, mules, and horned cattle, which have been exported in large quantities to Jamaica, and all the other West India islands; these, with an inconsiderable supply of cotton, wool, cocoa, (the best in the world), coffee, tobacco, and indigo, and some dye-woods, with silver to the amount of about 2 to 3,000,000 of dollars, making an aggregate return of about 6,000,000 dollars, constituted the aggregate extent of its external commerce, at the period of 1826. It affords, however, under social institutions, an unbounded field for human exertion and enterprise; but although the integrity and independence of the Colombian Republic have been recognized by the United States of America, and provisionally by England and other European States, its continued integrity is at present too equivocal, many of its measures too speculative, and some of its institutions, too incompatible with social welfare, to justify any very sanguine expectations, as to its future prosperity.

Colombier, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Saône, and chief place of a canton in the district of Vesoul, 4 m. N. E. of Vesoul, and 10 west of Lure.

Columbo, the maritime capital of Ceylon. In 1805, its site was the residence of a powerful native chief, on whose territory the Portuguese first settled in 1517, and founded the present town in 1638; the Portuguese in 1658, were expelled by the Dutch, and they surrendered it to the English in 1796. The fort, upwards of a mile in circumference, stands on the extremity of a peninsula, and is strong both by nature and art. The town is built more in the European style than any other garrison in India, and nearly divided into four equal quarters by two principal streets, to which smaller ones run parallel, with connecting lanes between them. The natives, who are very numerous, live in the old town, without the walls of the new, as in most of the maritime cities of the east. Its inhabitants comprise some of all nations, and the aggregate population is very considerable. Here is a school for the propagation of the Christian religion, and a botanical garden. Columbo is the chief place for the staple trade of the island. The articles exported are cinnamon, pepper, arrack, and coya rope, or cordage; also cocoa-nuts and oil, wax, honey, cardamoms, coral, ivory, fruit, &c. Columbo is situate in a rich district on the west coast, towards the south part of the island. Long. 79. 49. E. lat. 7. 4. N.

Commendo, or Commami, a kingdom of Guinea, on the Gold coast, formerly a part of the kingdom of Fetu. The natives are of a warlike disposition, and so numerous, that the king is said to be able to raise an army of 20,000 men. The capital, where the king resides, is called Grand Commendo, or Guffo; four miles to the south of which, on the sea coast, is Little Commendo, where the English and Dutch have forts. It lies to the west of Cape Coast castle, in the lat. of 4. 54. N. and 3. 34. W. long.

Commercy, a town of France, in the department of the Meuse, with a castle seated on the Meuse, 16 m. E. of Bar le Duc. Pop. about 3,600.

Commetau, or Chomutau, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Saatz. Its alum pits, and the great quantities of fruit and vegetables raised here, are the principal part of its trade. It is 58 m. N. W. of Prague, on the road to Chemnitz.

Como, a town of Italy, in the Milanese, and a bishop's see. It is surrounded by a wall, backed by a conical eminence, on which are the ruins of a castle. The cathedral is a handsome edifice of white marble, hewn from the neighbouring quarries. The inhabitants have manufactures of cotton and silk, and carry on some trade with the Grisons. Pliny was born here; and, in his Letters, speaks of the delightful scenery of its environs. It stands at the S. W. end of the Lake of Como, 18 m. N. of Milan, and 80 N. E. of Turin. Pop. about 15,000.

Como, Lake of, a lake of Italy, in the Milanese, extending from the city of Como in a N. N. E. direction for about 35 miles: it varies in breadth from one to six miles, and receives from the north the river Maira, and from the east the Adda, both of which rivers fall into the lake at its N. E. end, and discharge their waters by an arm from near the centre, on the S. E. side; this arm extends for about twenty miles from one to two miles wide and is called Lake Lecco, when it again narrows, and resumes the name of the Adda, till it falls into the Po, after a further course of about 60 miles, a few miles above Cremona.

Comorin, Cape, the most southern point of Hindoostan, in the lat. of 8. 4. N. and 77. 45. of E. long.

Comorn, a strong town of Hungary, capital of a territory of the same name. It is seated on an island called Schut, formed by the confluence of the Wag with the Danube, 70 m. E. S. E. of Vienna. The castle is deemed one of the strongest in Europe; and has never surrendered to any besieging force. The town was taken by the sultan Solyman in 1543; and has since then been exposed to various conflicts and ravages; alike from war, fire, and earthquake. It contains about 9,000 inhabitants, who carry on a considerable traffic with the surrounding country.

Comoro Islands, five islands in the Indian Ocean, between the coast of Zanguebar, and the north end of the island of Madagascar. They are called Hinzeuan, Mahota, Mohilla, Angazeia, and Comora. See Hianzas. Grand Comoro rises to the height of nearly 8,000 feet above the level of the sea.

Compiègne, a town of France, in the department of Oise. Here is a palace, in which the kings of France often resided. The maid of Orleans was taken prisoner here by the English in 1430. It is seated near an extensive forest, on the east bank of the River Oise, over which is an elegant bridge, a little below the confluence of the Aisne, and 45 m. N. E. of Paris.

Compostella, or St. Jago de Compostella, a city of Spain, capital of Galicia, and an archbishop's see, with a university. The public squares and churches are magnificent; and it has a great number of convents for both sexes. It is pretended that the body of St. James, the patron of Spain was buried here; and pilgrims visit his wooden image, which stands on the great altar of the cathedral. From this city the military order of St. Jago had its origin. It is seated in a beautiful plain between the rivers Tambre and Ulla, 35 m. S. by W. of Corunna, and 300 N. N. W. of Madrid. Concan, a low tract of country, on the west coast of the Deccan of Hindoostan. From this tract rises abruptly that stupendous wall of mountains, called the Ghats. It lies between the Portuguese settlement of Goa and Bombay, in the lat. of 16. and 19. N., and was formerly designated the Pirate Coast, in consequence of the frequent piracies committed upon it during the 17th and 18th centuries. The pirates were extirpated by a united British and Mahratta force in 1756, and the territory guaranteed to the Peishwa of the Mahrattas, in whose sovereignty it still continues. It is about 40 miles wide, and intersected by several small rivers; and the coast is indented by numerous bays and harbours, the principal of which are as follows, beginning at the north, viz. Choul, Bancote, or Fort Victoria, Dabul, Zigar, Gheria, and Rajpoor: off Dabul, lies the small island of Severnroog, which was the main point of rendezvous for the pirates.

Concarneau, a town of France, in the department of Finisterre, with a castle seated on a small inlet of the sea, 16 m. S. E. of Quimper.

Concepcion, Bay and town of, in Chile. The Bay of Concepcion is one of the most commodious on the whole western coast of South America. It is about ten miles each way, open to the N. W., the entrance being divided into two channels by the small island of Quiriquina. Both channels have sufficient depth of water for the largest vessels; the eastern is about two miles wide, and the western about one mile and a half. The south side of the island of Quiriquina affords very good anchorage; but the S. W. extremity of the bay is more convenient. On the shore of this part of the bay is the town of Talcahuana, nearly on the site of which the town of Concepcion was originally founded by Valdivia in 1550; and it was, for a considerable time, the capital of all Chile; but having repeatedly suffered from the attacks of the Araucanians, the seat of government was transferred to St. Jago, and having also been injured by an earthquake in 1730, and totally destroyed in 1751, the town was rebuilt on the north bank of the Biebio River, at a distance of about six miles S. E. of the site of the former town. Next to St. Jago, it is the most populous town in Chile, and in 1826 contained about 13,000 inhabitants. It is situated in the province of Puchacay, in the lat. of 36. 48. N. and 73. 8. of W. long.

Congo, a country on the west coast of South Africa, between 4. and 15. deg. of S. lat. containing the kingdoms of Loango, Congo, Angola, Matamba, and Benguela. It was discovered by the Portuguese in 1481; and is bounded on the north by Guinea, east by parts unknown, south by Bamba, and west by the Atlantic. It is sometimes called Lower Guinea; and the Portuguese have many settlements on the coast, as well as in the inland country. There are many desert places within land, in which are elephants, leopards, monkeys, and monstrous serpents; but near the coast the soil is more fertile, and there are fruits of many kinds, beside palm-trees, from which wine and oil are made. The greatest part of the inhabitants go almost naked; they worship the sun, moon, and stars, and animals of different kinds; but the Portuguese have made many converts. They are skilful in weaving cotton cloth, and trade in slaves, ivory, cassia, and tamarinds. Congo, properly so called, is only 150 m. broad along the coast, but is 370 inland. From March to September is called the winter season, when it rains almost every day; and the summer is from October to March, when the weather is very hot. The principal rivers are the Zaire and Coanza. The capital is St. Salvador. See Zaire.

Connaught, one of the four provinces of Ireland, bounded on the south by Munster, east by the River Shannon, which divides it from Leinster, north by Donegal and Sligo Bays, and west by the Atlantic Ocean, which indents it with numerous bays, giving it from three to four hundred miles of sea-coast, flanked by numerous islands. It contains a good deal of mountainous territory, and several lakes. For extent of surface, divisions, population, &c. See Ireland.

Connecticut, one of the united states of America, bounded on the N. by Massachusetts, E. by Rhode Island, S. by Long Island Sound, and W. by New York. It lies between 41. and 42. 2. N. lat. and 71. 20. and 73. 15. W. long. It is 88 miles in length, and 53 in mean breadth, and contains 4,664 sq. miles. The surface of Connecticut is agreeably diversified by gently swelling hills and valleys, presenting to the eye of the traveller a constantly varying prospect; and in some parts he hills rise to a height to claiming the denomination of mountains. The Housatonic mountains enter the state in the N. W. part, and continue southerly along the Housatonic river to the coast; this is but a succession of eminences, spurs and branches, some of which are considerably elevated. The next, proceeding easterly, is the Greenwoods Range, which is not very high; the summits in the northern parts are covered with evergreens; the southern division is more rugged and less lofty than the northern.

The third is broken and precipitous on its western face, with gentle declivities on the eastern, this range divides into branches towards the S., which end in East Rock and West Rock, near New Haven. The fourth range extends from Hartford to New Haven, and is of the same geological character with the preceding, but is not continuous. It is of only a moderate height, but has a few bold elevations. This range is called the Middletown Mountains, though its separate parts have several distinct appellations. Passing W. of the Connecticut river, we come to the 5th, called the Lyme Range, being the height of land which separates the waters of the Connecticut from those of the Thames; this range has also two branches toward the S., but in the N. is a distinct and continuous ridge, highest in the northern part.

The chief rivers are the Connecticut, the Housatonic and the Thames. The first mentioned is the only one that affords extensive navigation. New London harbour is the best in the state, yet it is but little frequented. Hartford and New Haven are the chief trading places.

The climate of Connecticut is somewhat milder than in Massachusetts. The soil and agricultural pursuits are about the same. There are mines of iron in the state but they are little wrought. Copper and lead are also found here, and quarries of marble are wrought extensively.

Manufactures are in a flourishing state here. One of the largest manufacturing places is Middletown, where are made cotton and woolen cloths, paper, soap, combs, rifles, pistols, swords, also coffee-mills to the number of 200,000 annually, and band boxes 30,000. At Tariffville are manufactories of cotton and carpeting. At Norwich, are manufactories of flannel, cotton, leather, paper, iron, &c. At Manchester there are extensive cotton manufactories. Vast quantities of tin ware are made in various parts of the state, and sent to every town in the Union for sale. At Canton is a manufactory of axes, which have acquired a reputation above all others in the United States. Near New Haven, at the foot of East Rock, is a gun factory, for several years occupied in manufacturing muskets for the United States. It is remarkable for the excellence of its internal arrangements, and the perfection of its various mechanical processes. Wooden clocks also form a very thriving branch of manufacturing industry. In the single town of Bristol above 30,000 clocks are made annually, and whole ship loads are exported at a time. Some of the clocks are of metal, and the whole bring an average price of 8 dollars each.

There are also in different parts of the state, extensive manufactories of hats, block-tin ware, and other things; there are a multitude of small establishments in different places devoted to the making of articles of various kinds.

Most of the commerce of this state consists in the coasting trade, although New London has a considerable share in the whale fishery. The shipping enrolled and licensed in 1827, amounted to 56,703 tons. The domestic produce exported in 1823, amounted in value to 493,925 dollars. The imports for the year were estimated at 485,174 dollars. The internal trade is somewhat assisted by the Farmington Canal, which see.

The state is divided into 8 counties, New London, Middlesex, New Haven, Fairfield, Litchfield, Hartford, Tolland and Windham. The first four border on Long Island Sound. The number of towns and cities is 120. The pop. 297,711. Hartford, and New Haven are the capitals, and the legislature meet alternately at these places. The present constitution was adopted in 1818; before this time, the state was governed according to the colonial charter. The legislature is called the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The representatives are chosen in towns, according to numbers, and the senators by a general ticket. All elections are annual, and the qualifications for voting, amount to universal suffrage. The executive branch consists of a Governor, and Lt. Governor, chosen by the people. There is no religious test in office. The Congregationalists have 236 ministers; the Baptists 78; the Methodists 40; the Episcopalians 58. There are some Unitarians, Universalists, Catholics and Shakers.

There are colleges at New Haven and Hartford and many academies in different parts of the state. The Connecticut School fund, arising from the sale of western lands belonging to the state, amounts nearly to 2,000,000 dollars. The income of this fund is appropriated by the constitution of the state, to the support of primary schools, and is divided among the different counties, in proportion to the number of children. The population, next to that of Massachusetts, is more dense than in any other part of the United States, notwithstanding which great numbers are constantly emigrating to Ohio and other parts of the western territory.

This State was settled in 1636 by emigrants from Massachusetts. See Hartford. The people are remarkable for thrift, ingenuity and enterprise, and display with peculiar strength many prominent traits of the New England character. See New England.

Connecticut, the largest river in New England, rising at the northern extremity of New Hampshire, on the boundary between that state and Canada. It runs southerly, dividing the states of New Hampshire and Vermont, after which it passes through Massachusetts and Connecticut to the sea at Long Island Sound. Its whole course is above 400 miles. It is navigated by sloops to Hartford 50 miles, by steamboats to Springfield in Vermont and by the help of improvements in canals, it will soon have a steamboat navigation of 200 miles.

The valley of this river is from 5 to 45 miles in width, and its surface is composed of a succession of hills, vallies and plains. The interval lands begin about 12 or 14 miles from its mouth. These lands are formed by a long and continued alluvion of the river. The tributary streams of the Connecticut run everywhere through a soft and rich soil, considerable quantities of which, particularly the lighter and finer particles, are from time to time washed into their channels, by occasional currents, springing from rains, and melted snows. Wherever the stream moves with an uniform current, these particles are carried along with it; but where the current is materially checked, they are in greater or less quantities deposited. In this manner, the interval borders of the river are formed. The form of most of them is elegant; a river, passing through them becomes almost of course, winding; the earth of which they are composed is of a uniform texture, the impressions made by the stream upon the border are also nearly uniform; hence this border is almost universally a handsome arch, with a margin entirely neat, and very comm only ornamented with a fringe of shrubs and trees. Nor is the surface of these grounds less pleasing; their terraced form and undulations are eminently handsome, and their universal fertility makes a cheerful impression on every eye. A great part of them is formed into meadows, which are here more profitable, and everywhere more beautiful than lands devoted to any other culture; here they are extended from 5 to 500 acres, and are everywhere covered with a verdure, peculiarly rich and vivid. The finest and most abundant crops of hay are raised upon these intervals.

There are many falls and rapids upon the Connecticut, the largest of which is a violent rapid called Bellows Falls, at a village of that name in Vermont. A canal passes round this obstruction on the western side. Most of the other rapids are also avoided by locks and canals. The scenery along the banks of the Connecticut is exceedingly varied and picturesque, and though many other streams surpass it in grandeur of features, yet for the variety, elegance and cheerfulness of the landscape which its borders everywhere exhibit, it may be regarded as one of the most beautiful rivers in the world. Its waters afford vast numbers of the finest shad, and the taking of these fish furnishes occupation to many of the inhabitants along the river.

Connecticut, lake, N. H. the source of one of the branches of that river.

Concehuk, a south frontier county of the state of Alabama, bordering on West Florida. Pop. 7,444. A river of the same name intersects the county, running south through West Florida into the Bay of Pensacola. Sparta is the chief town.

Connor, a parish in the county of Antrim, Ireland, which, in 1821, contained a population of 7,123. There is a decayed town in the parish, formerly a bishop's see, now united to Down. It is 6 m. north of Antrim. Pop. in 1820, 239.

Conquet, a town of France, in the department of Finisterre, with a good harbour and road. It is 12 m. W. of Brest.

Conselve, a town of Italy, 12 m. S. of Padua. Pop. about 6,000.

Consigliene, a town of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, 19 m. S. of Palermo.

Constable, p.v. Franklin Co. N. Y. Pop. 693.

Constadt, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Oels, 23 m. E. of Brieg.

Constance, a fortified city of Suabia, seated on the south side of the Rhine, between the upper and lower lakes of Constance, or the lakes of Constance and Zell. Though once flourishing in commerce, and celebrated in history, it now scarcely contains 4,000 inhabitants. Constance is famous for a council in 1514, which caused John Huss and Jerome of Prague to be burnt; and likewise condemned the doctrine of Wickliffe, ordered his bones to be burnt forty years after he was dead. It was formerly the capital of a secularized bishopric, extending on both sides of the Rhine; that on the south is now included in the Swiss Canton of Thurgau; and that on the north, with the city itself, now forms part of the circle of the lake in the territory of the Grand Duke of Baden, 100 miles S. S. E. of Carlsruhe, 80 E. of Basle, and 42 N. N. E. of Zurich.

Constance, Lake of, the most considerable lake of Switzerland, which it separates from Suabia, that part excepted where the city of Constance is seated on its south side. It is divided into three parts. The upper and largest part is called Boden See; the middle part is named Bodmer See; and the lower part Unter See, Zeller See, or the lake of Zell. The upper lake, from Bregenz, at its eastern extremity to Constance, is 37 m. long, and 15 in its greatest breadth. Through this lake the Rhine flows, and enters the Zeller See, which is 16 m. long and 10 in its greatest breadth. It is in some places 350 fathoms deep, and 100 generally; and like all the lakes in Switzerland is deeper in summer than in winter; which is owing to the first melting of the snow from the adjacent mountains. It abounds with fish, and its trout are much esteemed; and besides the city of Constance, has many agreeable towns and villages on its banks.

Constantina, a town of Spain in Andalusia, with a castle on a mountain, 40 m. N. E. of Seville.

Constantina, the eastern province of the kingdom of Algiers, and the largest and richest of the four. The greatest part along the coast is mountainous. In the mountains dwell free Arabian and Moorish tribes, of whom the Cabyles are deemed the most turbulent and cruel. As these free mountaineers possessed a superfluity of oil, soap, dried figs, and timber, the government of Algiers, which stood in need of these articles were formerly obliged in many things to show indulgence to these tribes. See Zaab.

Constantina, a city of the kingdom Algiers, capital of the province of the same name. It is seated at the top of a steep rock, and there is no way to it but by steps cut out of the rock. The usual way of punishing criminals here is to throw them down the cliff. Here are many Roman antiquities, particularly a triumphal arch. Next to Algiers, this city is the most populous in the kingdom. It is 190 miles E. by S. of Algiers. Long. 6. 24. E., lat. 36. 24. N.

Constantinople, one of the largest cities in Europe, and the capital of the Turkish Empire. It is of a triangular form: and seated between the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora, on a neck of land that advances toward: Nætolia from which it is separated by a strait a mile in breadth. The Sea of Marmora washes its walls on the south, and a gulf of the strait of Constantinople does the same on the N. E. It was anciently called Byzantium, but the name was changed in the year 330 by Constantine the Great, who made it the seat of the Roman empire in the east. It was taken in 1453 by the Turks, who have kept possession of it ever since. The grand signior's palace, called the seraglio, is on the sea side, surrounded by walls flanked with towers, and separated from the city by canals. It stands on the site of ancient Byzantium, the east point of the present city, and is three miles in circumference, consisting of an assemblage of palaces and apartments placed by the side of one another, without symmetry and without order. The principal entrance of this palace is of marble, and is called Capi, that is the Porte (or gate), a name used frequently to express the court, or the empire. The castle of Seven Towers is a state prison, and stands near the Sea of Marmora, at the west point of the city from the seraglio; and at the north-west point, without the walls, is the imperial palace of Aijub, or Atmejdán, the (ancient Hippodrome) with a village of the same name. The number of houses in Constantinople is prodigious; but in general, they are mean, and all of them constructed of wood, and the roofs covered with hollow tiles. The public edifices alone are built by masonry in a very solid manner. The streets are narrow, badly paved, and dirty; and the people are infested with the plague almost every year. The inhabitants, who are variously said to amount to from 3 to 400,000, are half Turks, two thirds of the other half, Greeks or Armenians, and the rest Jews. Here are a great number of ancient monuments still remaining; particularly the superb temple of St. Sophia built in the sixth century, which is converted into a mosque, and will contain 100,000 persons conveniently. Between the two mosques of sultan Solymán and Bajazet is the old seraglio, in which are shut up the wives of the deceased sultans, and also such women as have displeased the grand seignior. The bazaars, or bezesteins, are large square buildings, covered with domes supported by arcades, and contain all sorts of goods, which are there exposed to sale. There is a market for slaves, the Jews are the principal merchants, who bring them here to be sold; great numbers of girls are brought from Hungary, Greece, Candia, Circassia, Mingrelia, and Georgia, for the service of the Turks, who generally buy them for their seraglios. The great square near the mosque of sultan Bajazet, is the place for public diversions. The gulf on the north-east of the city is the harbour, which runs up from the point of the seraglio to the village of Aijub, about four miles in length and half a mile wide where broadest. Aijub may be reckoned one of the suburbs, and has a mosque, in which is the tomb of sultan Othman, the founder of the empire. The suburbs of Galata and Pera, are on the other side of the harbour. The former extends along the entrance of the harbour, and is chiefly occupied by merchants; and adjoining it on the east, is a cannon foundry, called Tophana. Pera stands behind these on an eminence, and is the place where the foreign ambassadors reside. In this part there are several houses where European sailors, Greeks, and even Turks, go to drink and intoxicate themselves, notwithstanding the severity of the government in this respect. The circumference of this city is 14 miles, and 24 with the suburbs included; and as they are built on ground which rises gradually, there is a view of the whole town from the sea. The city is surrounded by walls of freestone, here and there mixed with bricks, and flanked with 250 towers. There are 22 gates; six on the land side, and the rest towards the harbour and sea. The palaces, mosques, bagnios, and caravanserais, are many of them magnificent. Constantinople is 780 miles in a meridional line S. E. of Vienna. Long. 28. 35. E., lat. 41. 1. N.

Constantinople, Strait of, anciently the Thracian

Bosphorus, and forming the communication between the Propontis, or sea of Marmora, and the Euxine or Black Sea. It is 20 miles long and little more than a mile wide; and forms the separation here between Europe and Asia. At its entrance on the west side is situate Constantinople, and on the other Scutari. Both its banks are lined with villages, where are seen some very handsome houses, almost entirely built of wood, and variously painted; those belonging to the Turks are in white or red; those of the Greeks, Armenians, and Jews, are of a blackish brown, for they are not allowed to employ the colours of the Mussulmen. At its termination in the Black Sea, are two forts opposite each other, to defend the passage.

Constantinaw, a town of Poland, in Podolia, on the river Bog, 8 m. S. W. of Chmielnik, and 72 N. E. of Kaminieck.

Constantinow, another town of Poland, in Volhina, on the River Sulucz, 30 m. W. by N. of the former.

Contessa, a seaport of European Turkey, in Macedonia, advantageously located at the head of a gulf of its name, at the influx of the Strimoon, 60 m. E. by N. of Salonichi, and 246 W. of Constantinople. Long. 24. 8. E., and lat. 40. 52. N.

Conza, a town of Naples, in Principato Ultraiore, and an archbishop's see. It suffered so much by an earthquake in 1694, that the place where the cathedral stood is hardly known. Its principal commerce is in marble. It is seated near the head waters of the Ofanti River, 52 m. E. of Naples.

Cook Beyhar, a district of Bengal on the frontier of Bootan, which exhibits a melancholy proof of two facts frequently united; the great facility of obtaining food, and the wretched indigence of the lower order of inhabitants. It became tributary to the English in 1772. Beyhar, the chief town, is 260 m. N. by E. of Calcutta.

Cook's Inlet, an extensive arm of the sea, on the N. W. coast of America, discovered in 1778, by Captain Cook, who traced it 70 leag. from its entrance, in long. 152. W. and supposed it to be the mouth of a large river, but it was further explored in 1794 by captain Vancouver, who found its termination to be in long. 148. 43. W., lat. 61. 29. N.

Cooper, a county of the state of Missouri, and on the western frontier of the United States territory. It lies south of the Missouri River, and is bounded on the east by a mountain ridge, which divides it from Wayne County, and is intersected from west to east by Orange River. Pop. 6,019. Booneville on the south bank of the Missouri, in the lat. of 39. S. is the chief town.

Cooper, a river of S. Carolina, falling into the harbour of Charleston.

Cooperstown, a town of New York, chief of Otsego County, situate at the S. W. end, and the outlet of lake Otsego, 12 m. N. W. of Cherry Valley, and 64 W. by N. of Albany.

Coos, an island in the Archipelago, 56 m. N. W. of Rhodes, subject to the Turks. Long. 27. 44. E., lat. 37. 1. N.

Coos, a county forming the whole of the north part of the state of New Hampshire. It is about 90 miles in length from north to south, and 28 in mean breadth; it is bounded on the east by the state of Maine, and west by the Connecticut River, which divides it from Vermont, and north by the ridge of mountains which divides the United States territory from Lower Canada. On the southern confines of the county are the White Mountains, through which is a pass in one place not more than 22 feet wide, and appears cloven down to its very base, in a perpendicular line on one side, and on the other in an angle of about 45 deg.; through this Notch or Gap, as it is termed, a turnpike road has been constructed from the banks of the Connecticut River to the Atlantic Ocean at Portland, a route much used for the conveyance of heavy produce on sledges in the winter season; and thus, whilst it forms one of the grandest natural features of the world, it is rendered subservient to the medium of an extensive and an advantageous intercourse. Coos County is at present but thinly inhabited. The population, however, which in 1810, was only 3,991, in 1830 had increased to 8,390. Lancaster, on the east bank of the Connecticut river, is the chief town.

Coosawatchie, a town of South Carolina, in Beaufort district. The courts formerly held at Beaufort are held here. It is seated on the Coosaw, over which is a bridge, 20 m. N. W. of Beaufort, and 60 W. S. W. of Charleston.

Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark, built on a morass, and surrounded with several small lakes. It was founded by some wandering fishermen, in the 11th century, and is now accounted the best built city of the north of Europe. It became the seat of the court and government of Denmark in 1443. The streets are well paved with a foot-way on each side. The greatest part of the buildings are of brick, and a few of free-stone; the houses of the nobility are in general splendid, and built in the Italian style. The harbour is capable of containing 500 ships; and the streets are intersected by broad canals, which bring the merchandize close to the warehouses on the quays. Copenhagen contains four royal palaces, 19 churches, a great number of public buildings, and a university; and, in 1826, about 90,000 inhabitants. The palace called Christiansburg, built by Christian VI., but burnt down in 1794, was an immense pile of building, of hewn stone, the wings and stables of brick, stuccoed. The hospital of Warlow is large and convenient, containing 330 beds, occupied by as many poor. The church is so placed, that service may be heard by those who are confined to their bed. The exchange is a large Gothic building; vessels are brought very near it by means of canals; and here the merchants assemble. The new royal market is the largest square in the city, and almost entirely composed of stately buildings; as the academy of painting and sculpture, the theatre, the great hotel, the artillery house, &c. and in the centre is a marble equestrian statue of Christian V. In the north suburbs is an obelisk of reddish stone, erected in 1793, by the city, to the honour of Christian VI. on his abolishing vassalage; and around its pedestal are four female figures of white marble. The citadel is a regular fortification, with five bastions, a double ditch full of water, and several advanced works. This city owes its present beauty to the fire of 1728, which destroyed five churches and 67 streets, having been rebuilt in a better style. It suffered greatly by fire in 1794; and again in the following year. The new part of the town, raised by Frederic V., is extremely beautiful. It consists of an octagon containing four uniform and elegant buildings of hewn stone, and of four broad streets leading to it, in opposite directions. In the middle of the area stands an equestrian statue of Fred. V. in bronze, as large as life, which is justly admired. The round tower built by Christian IV. and designed for an observatory, is a singular structure, not having a single step in it, though very lofty: its ascent is by a spiral road nearly fourteen feet wide, and one of their kings has driven in his carriage up and down it. On the interruption to the commerce of Holland, by the events of the French revolution in 1793-4, Copenhagen became the principal entrepot for the commerce of the north of Europe; and for this, no place can be more advantageously situated; but Denmark becoming involved in the contentions of that period, and joining in a confederacy with Russia and Sweden against the naval ascendancy of England, an English fleet, in March, 1801, was despatched to bombard Copenhagen, when, after considerable damage being done to the town, and 28 ships of war taken or destroyed, an armistice was entered upon, which led to a treaty of peace with all the northern powers, but not without operating as a severe check to the commercial enterprise of Copenhagen. In 1807, the British government, although at peace with Denmark, sent a fleet of 17 ships of the line, with frigates, which bombarded the city for three days, when 300 houses, the cathedral, and part of the university were destroyed, and as many more buildings greatly damaged. Eighteen Danish ships of the line, fifteen frigates, six brigs, and twenty-five gun-boats, with all the naval stores in the arsenal of Copenhagen, were carried off by the British. This infamous act of treachery was committed under the pretence that the French would otherwise become masters of the Danish fleet. The city is five miles in circumference, seated on the east shore of the isle of Zealand, at the entrance into the Baltic Sea, about 25 m. within the strait called the Sound, 340 m. S. W. of Stockholm, and 500 N. E. of London. Long. 12. 35. E., lat. 55. 41. N. See Amak.

Copiapó, the most northern province of Chile, bounded on the north by the great desert of Atacama, east by the Andes, and west by the Pacific Ocean, being about 260 m. from N. to S. from 24. 20. to 28. of S. lat., and about 90 in mean breadth, abounding in mines of gold, iron, copper, sulphur, tin, and lead. The chief town, of the same name, stands on the south side of a river, also of the same name, at its entrance into the Pacific Ocean, 490 m. N. by E. of Valparaiso. Long. 70. 50. W.

lat. 27. 20. S. On the Andes, in a parallel line with the town of Copiapo is a volcano, called the Volcano of Copiapo.

Coppenbruge, a town of Hanover, in the principality of Collenberg, 10 m. E. by N. of Hamelen.

Copper-Mine River, a river of North America, which runs from south to north into the Icy Sea, in the long. of 111. 5. W., and 69. 7. of N. lat.

Coppet, or Copet, a town of Switzerland, with a castle, on the west bank of the lake of Geneva, 10 m. N. of Geneva. The castle and barony became the property of M. Neckar, celebrated for his pretensions as a financier in the time of the French Revolution: both he and his daughter, Madam de Stael, lie interred here in a fine mausoleum in the castle-garden.

Coguet, a river of England, which rises on the borders of Scotland, crosses the centre of Northumberland, and enters the German Ocean, at Warkworth. Opposite its mouth is a small island of the same name.

Coguinbo, or Sorena, a seaport of Chile near the mouth of a river of the same name, and the capital of a province also of the same name, rich in corn, and mines of gold and silver. The streets are shaded with fig-trees, palms, oranges, olives, &c. always green. It is 260 m. N. by E. of Valparaiso. Long. 71. 19. W., lat. 29. 52. S.

Corachis, Koraches, or Crotchet, a seaport of Asia, at the mouth of a creek which communicates, in the rainy season, with the Indus, on the western side. It is supposed to be the Sangada of Arrian, or Port of Alexander, and is now the principal out-port of the Afghans. The inhabitants are of an enterprising disposition, and it appears to afford a favourable opening for commercial adventure. It is about 100 m. W. of Tatta, in the lat. of 24. 30. N. and 67. 15. of E. long.

Corah, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district of the same name, lying between the Jumna and the main branch of the Ganges, which came wholly into the possession of the English in 1801. It is a very fertile and productive district; the town is 98 m. N. W. of Allahabad.

Corbach, a town in the Electorate of Hesse, capital of the county of Waldeck. It is divided into the old and new town, and near it, on a mountain, is the castle of Eisenberg. The Hanoverians were defeated here by the French in 1760. It is seated on the Ifter, 22 m. W. of Cassel. Long. 9. 1. E., lat. 51. 16. N.

Corbeck, a town of the Netherlands, in Brabant, 3 m. S. of Louvain.

Corbeil, a town of France, in the department of Seine and Oise, seated on the Seine at the conflux of the Juine, 17 m. S. of Paris.

Corbie, a town of France, in the department of Somme, with a celebrated Benedictine abbey, seated on the Somme, 10 m. E. of Amiens.

Corbieres, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Friburg, 10 m. S. of Friburg.

Corby, a town of Lincolnshire, Eng. 13 m. N. of Stamford, and 102 N. by W. of London.

Cordilleras. See Andes.

Cordova, an interior province of Andalusia, in the south of Spain, comprising an area of about 5,500 square miles, and in 1810 contained a population of 252,028. It is divided into nearly two equal parts, by the Gandalquivir river, which intersects it from east to west: the N. W. part is mountainous, but the more southern part is exceedingly fertile in corn, fruit, wine, and olives. It was formed into an independent kingdom by Abderame, a Moorish General, about the year 696 besides the city of Cordova, the other principal towns are Bujalance and Montilla.

Cordova, City of, the capital of the preceding province, is seated on the north bank of the Guadalquivir, over which is a bridge of sixteen arches, built by the Moors. It was a considerable place in the time of the Romans, who surrendered it to the Goths, in 572. In 692 it was taken by Abderame, a Moorish general, who soon after renounced the authority of the Grand Caliph of Damascus, and made the city of Cordova, the capital of a kingdom. It is now a bishop's see, and one of the finest cities of Spain. The circumference is large, but there are many orchards and gardens within the walls. The palaces, church, and religious houses are superb, particularly the cathedral, which is 534 feet in length, and 387 wide, built by Abderame for a mosque, and it still retains the name of Mezquita. The square called the Plaza Magor, is surrounded by fine houses, under which are piazzas. The trade consists in wine, silk, and leather; but is not so considerable as formerly. In the neighbourhood are a vast number of orange and lemon trees; and here are the best horses in Spain. It was from hence that the leather called cordovan derived its name, the mode of manufacture being first introduced here by the Moors. Cordova is 130 m. N. E. of Cadiz, and 190 S. by W. of Madrid.

Cordova, a town of Mexico, in the intendency of Vera Cruz, and a bishop's see. Here are upwards of thirty sugar mills. It is seated on a river which flows into the Gulf of Mexico, 80 m. E. S. E. of Puebla de los Angeles, and 55 W. by S. of the port of Vera Cruz.

Cordova, one of the eight intendencies of the United Provinces of South America, extending through 9 deg. of lat. from 29. to 38. S. and 10 deg. of long. between 60. and 70. W. it comprises nearly the whole of the vast plain lying between the great river La Plata and the Andes. The principal towns are St. Louis and Mendoza, both on the route from Buenos Ayres to Santiago in Chile. There is also a town of the same name in the N. E. part of the province, in the vicinity of some salt lakes, and on the line of road from Buenos Ayres to Potosi. Some scattered tribes of Indians roam over parts of this extensive district, but the aggregate population is very limited.

Corea, a kingdom of Asia, bounded on the north by Chinese Tartary, on the east by the sea of Japan, on the south by a narrow sea, which separates it from the Japanese islands, and on the west by the Yellow Sea, which separates it from China. The west coast is flanked by innumerable islands. It is a peninsula, being surrounded on every side by the sea, except towards the north. It is governed by a king, tributary to the emperor of China, and is divided into eight provinces, Hien-king, Ping-ngan, Hoang-hai, Kiang-yuen, King-ki, Tchu-sin, King-chan, and Tchu-en-so, which contain 33 cities of the first, 53 of the second, and 70 of the third, rank. The towns are exceedingly populous, and the inhabitants follow nearly the same customs, and are of the same religion with the Chinese. The country abounds in corn and rice, of which last they have two kinds, one of which delights in water, and the other which is the better sort, is cultivated on dry ground, like corn. There are mines of gold and silver in the mountains, and good pearl fisheries on the coast. The Coreans are well made, ingenious, brave and tractable. They are fond of dancing and music, and show great aptness for acquiring the sciences, which they cultivate with ardour. They are less fastidious and less ceremonious than the Chinese, but equally jealous of admitting strangers into the country. Men of learning are distinguished from other people by two plumes of feathers, which they wear in their caps. Their women are less confined than those in China, and have the liberty of appearing in company with the other sex. In China, parents often marry children without their consent, but in Corea they choose for themselves. They never bury their dead till three years after their decease, but keep them in coffins for that time. Corea extends from north to south from the lat. of 34. 30. to 42. 30. N. and from east to west from 125. to 129. of E. long King-ki-tao, nearly in the centre of the kingdom, is the capital.

Corfe Castle, a borough in Dorsetshire, Eng. It is seated on a peninsula in the British Channel, called the Isle of Purbeck, on a river, between two hills. On one of these stands the castle, formerly a place of great importance, and where king Edward the Martyr was stabbed at the instigation of his mother-in-law. It has a large church which is a royal peculiar, not liable to any episcopal jurisdiction. Great quantities of fine clay and stone are shipped here for the Staffordshire potteries. The town is governed by a mayor; and every alderman that has served the office has the title of baron. It returns two members to parliament, is 21 m. E. of Dorchester, and 116 W. by S. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,465.

Corfu, an island in the Mediterranean, near the coast of Albania, at the entrance of the Adriatic. Here is made a great quantity of salt; and it abounds with vineyards, lemons, and olives. It was anciently known under the several names of Scheria, Phacia, and Corcyra. The Corcyrians were an independent people, coeval with the proudest epoch of the Greeks. In the 14th century the island became subjected to the Venetians, in whose possession it continued until 1797, when it was ceded to the French, by the treaty of Campo-Formio. It capitulated to the Turks and Russians in 1799, and with six other islands, was constituted independent, under the title of Ionian Republic (which see).

Corfu, (the ancient Corcyra), the chief town of the preceding island, is situate on the east side, on the shore of a spacious and secure harbour, for vessels of easy draught of water. The fortifications are very strong. It is the seat of government of the whole of the Seven Islands, or Ionian Republic, and contains about 15,000 inhabitants. Lat. 39. 36. N., long. 19. 50. E.

Coria, an episcopal town of Spain, in Estremadura, seated on the Alagon, 120 m. W. S. W. of Madrid.

Coringa, a town at the north extremity of the coast of Coromandel, having a commodious harbour a few miles north of the main channel of the Godavery River, in the lat. of 17. N.

Corinna, t. Somerset Co. Me. Pop. 1,077.

Corinth, Isthmus of, a neck of land which joins the Morea to Livadia, and reaches from the Gulf of Lepanto west, to that of Egina east. The narrowest part of it is six miles over; and on a mount here, called Oneius, were formerly celebrated the Isthmian games. There are still the ruins of a town upon it, and of the temples dedicated to the Sun, Pluto, Diana, Neptune, Ceres, and Bacchus. It is said Julius Cæsar, Caligula, and Nero, attempted to cut a channel through the isthmus; they therefore built a wall across it, called Hexamila, because it was six miles in length. This was demolished by Amurath II., rebuilt by the Venetians, and levelled a second time by Mahomet II.

Corinth, a town of the Morea, situate on the northern declivity of a mountain, sloping towards the Gulf of Lepanto and the preceding isthmus, to which it gives name. During the zenith of Grecian glory, Corinth justly ranked among the most important and magnificent cities of Greece: its temples, theatres, and fountains, were the admiration of every beholder. In the proportions and richness of their columns and porticos, architecture was perfected, leaving nothing for after ages to perform in that noble art, but to copy: and the Corinthian pillar or column now, more or less adorns every city of the civilized world. Corinth fell a prey to the fury of the Roman arms under Mummianus in the year 146 B. C.; and although Julius Cæsar endeavoured to restore it to its former grandeur, in whose time it was visited by St. Paul, it has progressively sunk into a place of insignificance. It fell into the hands of the Venetians during the ephemeral career of their ascendancy; the Turks became masters of it in 1715, and it now forms a part of Independent Greece. It had formerly a port on the Gulf of Egina, called Cenchrea, as well as on that of Lepanto; but the former is now little used. The ancient citadel, Acro-Corinthus, still remains entire, and to a well-disciplined garrison, may be considered impregnable. Corinth is the seat of a Greek metropolitan and bishop. Pop. about 1,500. It is 65 m. E. by S. of Patras, and 48 W. by S. of Athens.

Cork, a maritime county forming the southwest extremity of Ireland, having upwards of 100 miles of sea-coast, indented with several very spacious and safe bays and harbours, opening into the Atlantic Ocean. It is about 35 miles in mean breadth from south to north, and is intersected from east to west by two fine rivers, the Blackwater and the Lee, with five or six others of inferior note. The following are the principal bays and harbours, beginning at the west: viz. Bantry, Dunmanney, Baltimore, Glandore, Ross, Clonakilty, Kinsale, Cork, and Youghal. Besides the city of Cork, the principal towns in the interior are Charleville, Mallow, Danerale, Michelstown, Bandon, Cloyne, &c. Bandon, Mallow, and Youghal, each return one, and the city of Cork and the county each two members to the parliament of the United Kingdom. The agriculture of this county, both in tillage and pasture, has been much improved since the middle of the eighteenth century, and in conjunction with the adjoining interior county of Tipperary, supplies a great portion of the English marine with salt-beef and pork, more especially the former, and exports vast quantities of butter; and since 1800, it has also exported a considerable quantity of grain. Some woollen manufactures are carried on for internal consumption in the eastern part of the county, and during the present century, several efforts have been made to establish the cotton manufacture over the county generally. For territorial extent, divisions, population, &c. see Ireland.

Cork, City of, and capital of the preceding county, supposed to have been first founded by the Danes in the 6th century, is beautifully and advantageously situate on the banks of the River

Lee, about five miles above its entrance into Cork Harbour. Cork, in conjunction with Ross, is a bishop's see. The city is divided into twenty-two parishes, which in 1821, contained a population of 100,658, being an increase of upwards of 35,000 since 1813, exclusive of 8,998 in eight of the parishes which extend beyond the stations of the city. Next to Dublin, Cork is the largest and most important place in all Ireland. During the twenty-four years' war, from 1793 to 1815, Cork Harbour was one of the chief rendezvous of the British navy; and the extensive demand which that war created for salt provisions, enabled Cork to become the largest and most celebrated market in Europe for that article. The Cork beef continues to be the chief source of supply, not only of the national, but of the commercial navy of the United Kingdom, and for long voyages and tropical climates, is preferred by the ships of all nations. As the chief commercial town in the south-west of Ireland, Cork receives the surplus production, not only of the whole county, but of the greater part of those of Kerry and Tipperary, which it also supplies with such British and foreign productions as are received in exchange. Since the commencement of the war in 1793, the city has undergone great improvement, both in regard to public and private buildings. There are five bridges over the Lee; that of St. Patrick is a fine structure. The exchange, custom-house, and town-hall, are all fine edifices. It has two theatres, several hospitals, and other public buildings. The cathedral, erected between 1725 and 1735, is a stately edifice, and some of the parish churches are of the like character. The barracks on the north side of the city, situate on an eminence, present a very imposing aspect. Cork has a public brewery on a very extensive scale, and which makes also its own malt. The city is 125 miles southwest of Dublin, in the lat. of 51. 54. N., and 8. 23. of W. long.

Cork, Cose of, is that part of the harbour of Cork usually occupied as the anchorage ground. The harbour, which is entered by a deep and narrow channel, and defended by a strong fort on each side, is about nine miles from the mouth of the River Lee, and about the same extent in breadth. At the upper end is an island called Great Island, from four to five miles long from west to east, and from two to three miles wide. At the west end of this island is a town called Cose, which, in 1821, contained 6,508 inhabitants, and the rest of the island 2,897 more; and at the entrance of the channel between Great Island and the main land, are two small islands called Haulbowline and Rooky Islands, strongly fortified, and inhabited by 950 persons; and thus, whilst the natural positions of Cork Harbour are such as to afford accommodation for the whole British marine, secure from the effects of the elements, the fortifications render the shipping and the town equally secure from the irruptions of an enemy; and the surrounding shore being studded with neat and commodious residences render the whole as picturesque and agreeable as it is important in point of security and defence.

Corleone, a large and well-built town of Sicily, in the Val di Mazzara. It is 24 miles S. S. W. of Palermo. Pop. about 12,000.

Corlin, a town of Further Pomerania, with a castle. It has considerable woollen manufactures, and is seated on the Persant, 10 m. S. E. of Colberg.

Cormanlin, a town of Guinea, on the Gold Coast, large and populous. Here the Dutch have a fort, which was taken by the English in 1665. Long. 0. 15. W., lat. 5. 30. N.

Comery, a town of France, in the department of Indre and Loire, with a Benedictine Abbey; seated on the Indre, 8 m. S. E. of Tours.

Corna, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Irak Arabi, seated on the Tigris, near its conflux with the Euphrates, 35 miles W. N. W. of Bassora.

Cornato, a town of Italy, in the patrimony of Saint Peter, seated on the Marta, three miles east of the sea, and ten north of Civita Vecchia.

Cornhill, a town of the county of Durham, Eng. seated near the Tweed, over which it has a large bridge to Coldstream, in Scotland. It is 12 m. S. W. of Berwick, and 333 N. N. W. of London. Pop. 668.

Cornigliano, a town of Italy, in the Milanese, 15 m. E. of Milan.

Cornish, p.t. Sullivan Co. N. H. 108 m. from Boston. Pop. 1,687. Also a p.t. York Co. Me. Pop. 1,234.

Cornwall, a county forming the S. W. extremity of England, projecting into the Atlantic Ocean. It is bounded on the E. N. E. by the river Tamar, which divides it from Devonshire, being washed on all its other sides by the sea. The south coast for about 70 miles, borders on the entrance to the English, and the north, for about 90 miles, on the entrance to the Bristol Channel. At its eastern, or E. N. E. extremity it is about 43 miles wide, but gradually narrows towards the west to about 15 miles, when it diverges at a distance of about 60 miles into two points, the most southerly called the Lizard, in the lat. of 49. 58. N., and 5. 11. of W. long., and the other the Land's End, in the lat. of 50. 4. N., and 5. 42. of W. long.; the intermediate space being known by the name of Mount's Bay. The distinguishing characteristics of this county are its minerals, semi-metals, and clays, which are found here in greater variety than in almost any other part of the world. Gold, silver, cobalt, antimony, manganese, and lapis calaminaris, are all found to a certain extent, and some in abundance; but the predominating productions are copper and tin, with which are mixed mundic and arsenic; in the supply of which, upwards of 100 mines are in constant work. Some of the mines are worked to a vast depth; but the perfection of the means applied, as well in bringing the ores to the surface as in smelting, &c., renders the operations comparatively easy, and the proceeds a source of great wealth to the parties engaged in them, and of general advantage to the county. The mining business is entirely regulated by a code called the Stannary Laws, enacted by a court of stannators, or proprietors. These laws divide the tinmen into ten divisions, under the superintendence of one warden. A vice-warden is appointed every month; and there is a steward for each precinct, who holds his court every three weeks, where a jury of six persons decides disputes, with a progressive appeal however to the vice-warden, lord-warden, and lords of the duke of Cornwall's council. The mines are under no other jurisdiction excepting in such cases as affect land or life. In addition to its minerals, a vein of soapy earth and of potter's clay, estimable in the manufacture of porcelain, add considerably to the resources of the county. The shaping of granite for building, and moor-stone for grinding of corn, give employment to great numbers. And, in addition to these resources, the coast of Cornwall is annually visited by shoals of pilchards, which, in fish and oil, yield an average produce of £50,000 per annum. The occupations of mining and fishing, up to the middle of the 18th century, prevailed to such an extent in this county as to render agriculture almost entirely neglected, and to give it a rudeness and wildness of character distinct from that of every other part of the kingdom; but since that period agriculture has been progressively improving, and potatoes and grain are now included among its surplus productions, which in the aggregate may be considered as exceeding £500,000 per annum in amount. What are denominated the duchy lands are very extensive, and the income derived from them together with the duty on tin ore, form the only remaining parts of those immense hereditary revenues which were anciently appropriated as a provision for the heir apparent to the crown. Previously to the invasion of Britain by the Romans, Cornwall was inhabited by a tribe called the Dumnoni with whom the Phœnicians are supposed to have traded largely for tin. The descendants of that tribe, and the succeeding inhabitants, continued longer to retain the language, manners, and customs of antiquity, than in any other part of England, and which up to this time can hardly be said to be extinct. The coast is, in many parts, extremely rugged, and ridges of granite intersect the western part of the county, whilst the valleys are beautifully diversified with verdure, shrubs, and plants, among which the myrtle is common, with several peculiar to the district. The coast abounds with marine vegetables, which are much used for manure. The blocks of broken granite appear in remote ages, according to the supposition of some persons, to have been much used in the construction of rude temples for religious worship. Near the Land's End is a block, from 90 to 100 tons in weight, so nicely poised as to be moveable with the hand; there are several others of less magnitude similarly poised; these are termed loggia stones, and are ridiculously supposed by some to have been contrivances of art, and objects of religious adoration; whilst they are doubtless only the natural results of repeated submersions of our planet, during which the layers of earth or clay have been washed away. Similar evidences of the operations of nature are to be seen in the western hemisphere, a few miles east of Boston, in Massachusetts, on the road to Salem; and it is probable that the supposed cairns, cromlecks, rockbasins, &c., of the Druids, are nothing more than the simple results of the progressive operations of nature. The principal ports on the north coast, are Padstow and St. Ives; on Mount's Bay, Penzance and Helstone; on the south coast, Falmouth, Truro, Fowey, and Looe, Plymouth Sound bounding the south-east extremity of the county. The principal towns in the interior are Redruth, St. Anake, Penryn, Bodwin, Launceston, &c. The assizes, &c., for the county, are held alternately at Bodmin and Launceston. Streams of water intersect the county, in all directions, and add considerably to its diversity and picturesque beauty. Some woolen, and a few other manufactures, are carried on in different parts of the county, but they are inconsiderable.

Cornwall Cape, is about 5 m. N. by E. of the Land's End.

Cornwall, a township in Orange County, New York, situate along the west bank of the Hudson River, 105 m. S. of Albany. Pop. 3,486. Also the name of a township in Addison county, Vermont. Pop. 1,264; and of a town in Litchfield County, Connecticut. Pop. 1,712.

Cornwall, a town of Stormont County, Upper Canada, situate on the north bank of the St. Lawrence, about 50 m. above Montreal.

Cornwall, New, a county in the western part of N. America, extending from Gardner's channel, in lat. 53. 15., to Frederick's Sound, lat. 57. 6. N.

Cornwallis, a town of Nova Scotia, seated on the south shore of the basin of mines at the head of the Bay of Fundy, about 10 m. N. W. of Windsor and 45 N. W. of Halifax.

Cornwallis, a county of Lower Canada, extending for about 160 miles along the S. E. bank of the great River St. Lawrence, bounded on the N. E. by the district of Gaspé. It is at present but thinly inhabited.

Coro, a town of Colombia, in the province of Venezuela. It is advantageously situate at the entrance of an isthmus, at about an equal distance from the Caribbean Sea, and the Gulf of Maracaibo. It contains about 10,000 inhabitants, who carry on a considerable trade in mules, cattle, &c. with Curacao and other islands, in the Caribbean Sea. See Venezuela.

Coromandel, Coast of, the eastern coast of the peninsula of Hindoostan, extending from Point Calymere in the lat. of 10. 18. N. to the Kistnah River, in the lat. of 16. N. There is not a port for large ships on the whole coast, which is an even, low, sandy country. Madras is the principal town, and the other places of note are Negapatam, Pondicherry, Pullicate, &c.

Coron, a seaport of Independent Creecce, in the Morea, seated on the W. side of a bay to which it gives name, 15 m. E. of Modon. Long. 21. 46. E., lat. 36. 55. N.

Coronation, Cape, a cape of the island of New Caledonia, in the Pacific Ocean. Long. 167. 8. E., lat. 22. 5. S.

Correggio, a town of Italy, in the Modonese, with a castle, 9 m. N. N. E. of Reggio.

Correze, an interior department of France, containing the late province of Limousin. It takes its name from a river which runs into the Vezere, after having watered Tulle and Brives. Tulle is the capital.

Corrientes, Cape, on the E. coast of South Africa, opposite the S. end of the island of Madagascar.—Also the name of another cape on the W. coast of Mexico, in the Pacific Ocean, in the lat. of 20. N.

Corrientes, a town of Paraguay, with a fort, seated on the E. side of the Paraná, at the influx of the river Paraguay, 490 m. N. of Buenos Ayres. Long. 59. 0. W. lat. 27. 30. S.

Corryreckan, a dangerous whirlpool on the W. coast of Scotland, between the Isle of Scarba and the N. point of that of Jura. It is so named from a young Danish prince, who perished in this place. Its vortex extends above a mile in circuit.

Corsham, a town in Wiltshire, Eng. and a considerable woollen manufacture. It is nine miles E. N. E. of Bath, and 97 W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 2,727.

Corsica, or Corse, an island in the Mediterranean, separated from that of Sardinia, on the south, by the Strait of Bonifacio. It is 150 miles from north to south, and from 40 to 50 in breadth. It was known to the ancient Greeks, by the names of Callista and Cynrus, and to the Romans by its present appellation. On the coast are many excellent harbours. It is mountainous, but fruitful valleys are interspersed; and it has some fine lakes and rivers. In the earliest time it has been famous for its swarms of bees, and produces vast quantities of honey, which, however, is reckoned bitter, on account of the box and yew with which the country abounds. The mountains are rich in lead, iron, copper, and silver; and there are also mines of alum and saltpetre. The granite of Corsica is nearly equal to the oriental; porphyries, jasper, talc, amianthus, emeralds, and other precious stones, are found scattered in the mountains, and the south coast abounds with beautiful coral. This island was, for some centuries, under the dominion of the Genoese, whose tyranny was such, that the Corsicans were almost in a perpetual state of insurrection. In 1736 a German adventurer, Theodore Baron Newhoff, brought some assistance to them; and, on his assurance of more powerful aid, they elected him king; but as he could not substantiate his promises he was obliged to leave the island. He went into England, was thrown into the Fleet prison, released by an act of insolvency, (after having registered his kingdom of Corsica for the benefit of his creditors,) and suffered to die in extreme indigence. The Genoese, tired of the contest, sold the sovereignty to France, in 1767; and Paoli, who had been elected to the chief command, in 1755, was obliged to abandon the island in 1769. After the French revolution in 1789 Corsica was admitted as an eighty-third department of France at the particular request of a deputation, of which Paoli was at the head. In consequence of some events which followed the revolution of 1792, Paoli revolted; the French, by the assistance of the English, were expelled from the island; and Corsica, in 1794, was declared annexed to the crown of Great Britain. In 1796, however, the English found it expedient to evacuate the island, of which the French immediately took possession, and again united it to France, of which country it now forms the eighty-sixth department. It is divided into four prefectures, viz. Bastia, Calvi, Corte, and Sartenne Ajaccio, on the west coast, is the principal seaport. Pop. about 180,000.

Corsoer, a town of Denmark, in the isle of Zealand, on a peninsula, in the Great Belt, with a good harbour for light vessels. It is defended by a citadel, which serves also as a magazine for corn; and is 54 miles W. S. W. of Copenhagen. Long 11. 12. E. lat. 55. 12. N.

Corte, a town of Corsica, situate in the centre of the island, on the side and foot of a rock, at the confluence of the Tayignano and Restonica. On the point of a rock, rising above the rest, is the castle, to which there is but one winding passage, that will admit only two persons abreast. While the island was in the possession of the English, Corte was made the seat of the viceroy; and it has been enlarged and fortified by the French. It is 27 miles N. E. of Ajaccio, and 40 S. W. of Bastia. Pop. in 1826, 2,735.

Cortemiglia, a town of Piedmont, in Montferrat, situate on the Bormida, 16 miles E. of Cherasco.

Cortona, a fortified town of Tuscany, and a bishop's see, with a famous academy. It stands on a mountain, on the frontiers of the Ecclesiastical States, 32 m. E. of Sienna.

Corunna, a seaport at the N. W. of Spain, in Galicia, with a large and safe harbour, called the Groyne, defended by two castles. The town is of a circular form: but the poverty of the surrounding country affords few resources for trade. A British army of 13,000 were, on the 16th Jan. 1809, near being driven into the sea, by a French force of 30,000 men. It is 20 miles S. W. of Ferrol, and 35 N. by E. of Compostella. Long. 8. 19. W. and lat. 43. 33. N.

Corvey, a town and small principality of Westphalia, with a celebrated abbey; situated on the Weser, 27 m. E. by N. of Paderborn. Long. 9. 35. E. lat. 51. 46. N.

Corvo, the smallest and most northerly island of the Azores, so called from the abundance of crows found upon it. The inhabitants cultivate wheat and feed hogs. Long. 31. 6. W., lat. 39. 42. N.

Corydon, a flourishing town of Harrison county, Indiana, situate on the base line of a bend of the Ohio River, from which it is distant about 15 m. both E., W. and S.

Cosenza, a city of Naples, capital of Calabria Citeriore, and an archbishop's see, with a strong castle. The environs produce abundance of corn, fruit, oil, wine, and silk. It is situate on several small hills, at the foot of the Apennines on the east side, and by the River Crati, 155 m. S. E. of Naples. Pop. about 16,000.

Coshocton, an interior county of the state of Ohio. Several streams of considerable magnitude unite within this county to form the Muskingum River, which river it is in contemplation to unite with the Cuyahoga, and thereby open a direct water communication between the Ohio and Lake Erie. The chief town of the same name is situate on the east bank of the Muskingum, 65 m. N. N. E. of Columbia, the capital of the state. Pop. 11,162.

Costlin, or Koselin, a town of Further Pomerania, which has good woollen manufactures, excellent fisheries, and fine cattle. It is seated on the Neulbach, 18 m. E. of Colberg.

Cosne, a town of France in the north-west part of the department of Nievre. Anchors for ships are forged here; and its cutlery and gloves, are much esteemed. It is seated on the east bank of the Loire, at the influx of the Noain, 34 m. N. by W. of Nevers, and 110 S. by E. of Paris. It is the seat of a prefect. Pop. in 1826, 5,823.

Cospur, a town of the kingdom of Assam, 276 miles east of Patna. Long. 92. 57. E. lat. 24. 56. N.

Cossacs, a people inhabiting the confines of Poland, Russia, Tartary, and Turkey. They are divided into the Kosakki-sa-Parovi, the Kosakki-

Donski, and the Uralian Cossacs. The men are large and well made, have blue eyes, brown hair, and aquiline noses; the women are handsome, well shaped, and complaisant to strangers. The Uralian Cossacs dwell in villages along the banks of the Ural and their chief town is Uralak. The country which the Kosakki-sa-Parovi inhabit is called the Ukraine, and their towns are built of wood after the manner of the Russians. The Kosakki-Donski dwell on both sides of the Don, are under the protection of Russia, and profess the same religion. See Ukraine, and Uralian Cossacs.

Cossair, a town of Egypt on the Red Sea, and the chief place of trade across that sea, between Egypt and Arabia. It is 290 m. S. by E. of Suez. Long. 33. 50. E. lat. 26. 8. N.

Cossimbazar, a river of Hindoostan, in Bengal, the most western arm of the Ganges, from which it separates 35 miles below Rajemal. It passes by Moorsheadabad, Cossimbazar, &c. to Nuddes, where it is joined by the Jellingy, another arm of the Ganges, and their united streams form the Hoogly.

Cossimbazar, a town of Hindoostan, in Bengal. It has been at all times the residence of the different European factors, this being the centre of their trade. It is seated on the river of the same name, by which it is surrounded, 7 miles south of Moorsheadabad, and 105 north of Calcutta.

Cossimcotta, a town of Hindoostan, in the circle of Circacole, on a river that flows into the Bay of Bengal, 74 m. S. W. of Circacole. Long. 83. 7. E. lat. 17. 43. N.

Costa Rica, a province of the chain of territory that unites the two grand divisions of the western hemisphere, bounded on the north by Lake Nicaragua, and on the south-east by Veragua. It has rich mines of gold and silver but in other respects is mountainous and barren. Cartago is the capital.

Costainitza, a town of Croatia, on the river Udda, and borders of Bosnia, 57 m. E. S. of Carlstadt. Long. 17. 8. E., lat. 45. 20. N.

Coswick, a town of Upper Saxony, in the principality of Anhalt, with a castle, situate on the Elbe, 10 m. W. by N. of Whittenburg.

Cotabamba, a town in the province of Cuzco, Peru, seated on the west bank of the Apurimac River, 75 miles south of the city of Cuzco.

Cotbus, a town and district of Lower Lusatia. The castle stands on an eminence on the east side of the town. Here are a great number of French protestants, who have introduced their manufactures; and it is noted for excellent beer, pitec, and flax. It is seated on the river Spree, 60 m. E. by S. of Wittenburg. Long. 14. 24. E., lat. 51. 46. N.

Cote d'Or, an interior department in the east part of France, which has its name from a mountain, situate at the south of Dijon. It contains part of the late province of Burgundy. Dijon is the capital. Population estimated at 400,000.

Cotes du Nord, a department of France, so named from its northern maritime position. It contains part of the late province of Bretagne. St. Brieux is the capital.

Coteswold Hills, a long tract of high ground in the east part of Gloucestershire, Eng. It affords in many places a fine short grass for the feed of sheep; and others are devoted to the growth of corn. The sides of this long range are beautiful as they sink into the vale, from the hills of Stinchcomb and Nibley in the south, to that of Bredon in the north, which has been celebrated in ancient rhyme.

Cothen, a town of Upper Saxony, capital of the principality of Anhalt-Cothen, with a castle. It is 12 m. S. W. of Dessau. Long. 12. 9. E., lat. 51. 48. N.

Cotignac, a town of France, in the department of Var, on the River Argens, 33 m. N. N. E. of Toulon.

Cotignola, a fortified town of Italy in the Ferrarese, 25 m. S. S. E. of Ferrara.

Cotopaxi, one of the highest peaks of the Andes, remarkable for the frequency and violence of its volcanic eruptions. It is about 25 m. S. E. of the city of Quito.

This mountain is the most elevated of those volcanoes of the Andes, from which, at recent periods, there have been eruptions. Its absolute height is 12,392 English feet: it would consequently exceed by more than 2,550 feet the height of mount Vesuvius, even supposing that it were piled on the summit of the Peak of Teneriffe. Cotopaxi is likewise the most formidable of all the volcanoes of the kingdom of Quito; and it is also from it that explosions have been the most frequent and the most destructive. The cinders and fragments of rocks that have been ejected by this volcano, cover the neighbouring valleys to an extent of several square leagues. In 1758, the flames of Cotopaxi shot up to a height of 2,700 feet above the edge of the crater. In 1744, the roaring of this volcano was heard as far as Honda, a town situated on the banks of the river Magdalena, a distance of two hundred leagues. On the 4th April, 1768, the quantity of cinders vomited up from the mouth of Cotopaxi was so great that the sky continued as dark as night until the third hour after mid-day. The explosion which took place in the month of January, 1803, was preceded by a frightful phenomenon—the sudden melting of the snows that covered the mountain. For more than twenty years, neither smoke nor any distinguishable vapour had issued from the crater, and yet, in one single night, the subterranean fire had become so active that at sun-rise, the external walls of the cone, strongly heated, had become naked, and had acquired the black colour which is peculiar to vitrified scoria. At the port of Guayaquil, fifty-two leagues in a straight line from the edge of the crater, M. de Humboldt heard day and night the roaring of this volcano, like repeated discharges of artillery.

Were it an established fact that the proximity of the ocean contributes to feed volcanic fire, we should be astonished to see that the most active volcanoes of the kingdom of Quito, Cotopaxi, Tungurahua, and Sungay, appertain to the eastern chain of the Andes, and, consequently, to that which is farthest removed from the coast. Cotopaxi is more than fifty leagues from the nearest shore.

Coulas, a seaport of Hindoostan, in Travancore with a good harbour, and a navigable river. It stands on a peninsula 60 m. N. W. of Travancore. Long. 76. 24. E., lat. 8. 51. N.

Coupees Point. See Point Coupees.

Courland, a duchy of Europe, bounded on the west and north by the Baltic, east by Livonia, and south by Poland. It is divided into Courland Proper and Semigallia, and is 250 miles long and 40 broad. The country swells into gentle hills, and is fertile in corn, hemp, and flax. It is mostly open, but in some parts there are forests of pine and fir, and groves of oak. It was formerly a feudatory province of Poland, but was annexed to the dominions of Russia in 1795 by an act of the states. Mittau is the capital. Population about 500,000.

Courtray, a town of the Netherlands, in Flanders, celebrated for its trade and manufactures of table linen and woollen cloths. It is seated on both sides the River Lis, 12 m. east of Ypres.

Coutances, a seaport of France, capital of the department of Manche, and a bishop's see, with a fine cathedral. It is 37 m. S. W. of Bayeux, and 185 W. of Paris. It is the seat of a prefect. Pop. in 1826, 9,015.

Contras, a town of France, in the department of Gironde, at the conflux of the Ille and Dronne, 25 m. N. E. of Bourdeaux.

Coss. See Cork, Coss of.

Coventry, City and County of, is insulated within the County of Warwick. The city, in 1821, contained a population of 21,242, and the remainder of the county, which comprises nine adjoining parishes and hamlets, 8,138. It is a place of considerable antiquity, and was formerly surrounded with strong walls which were 3 miles in circumference; having 26 towers and 12 gates, but few vestiges of which now remain; having been demolished by order of King Charles II. in 1662, in revenge for the resistance made to the troops of his predecessor. A parliament was held here in the reign of Henry IV. called Parliamentum Indoctum, or the unlearned parliament, because the lawyers were excluded. Leofric, Earl of Mercia, who was lord of the place about 1040, is said to have loaded the inhabitants with heavy taxes, on account of some provocation he had received from them; and being importuned by his lady, Godiva, to remit them, he consented upon condition that she would ride naked through the town, which condition she accepted and performed; for, being possessed of a long flowing head of hair, she contrived to dispose of her tresses so as preserve her decency; and at the same time enjoined the citizens on pain of death, not to look out as she passed. The curiosity of a poor tailor, however, prevailed over his fears, and he ventured to take a single peep, but was struck blind, and was ever after called Peeping Tom. This improbable story is annually commemorated by the citizens of Coventry with great splendour, and a female, closely habited in fine linen of flesh colour, rides through the town, attended by a very numerous and elegant procession. The window through which the tailor is said to have gratified his curiosity is still shown, with his effigy always newly dressed for the procession which is on the Friday preceding Trinity Sunday.

It had formerly extensive manufactures of woollens and worsted stuffs, now quite discontinued in this part of the country, they having been supplanted by the manufacture of ribbons, of which it is the focus for the produce of from 17 to 18,000 looms. It has also, two tolerably extensive establishments for the manufacture of watches, and four or five others of inferior importance. It has a canal communicating with the grand line of canal navigation between London, Liverpool, and Manchester. It is situate on the verge of the great coal strata, running through all the northern part of the country. The vein is worked in abundance within five miles of the city of Coventry. The city is divided into two parishes, and the churches, contiguous to each other, are both fine structures, more particularly so that dedicated to St. Michael, which was twenty-two years in building, and finished in 1394. The spire is 303 feet high, and deservedly ranks among the most beautiful specimens of architecture in the kingdom. There is a third spire, the church to which, has long since been demolished; but there is a third church with a stately tower, which serves as a chapel of ease to St. Michael. The three spires form beautiful and interesting objects in the perspective from the surrounding country for many miles, on all sides. The corporation consists of a mayor and nine other aldermen. St. Mary's Hall, in which the archives of the city are kept, and its business transacted, is an ancient and venerable edifice: the county hall is a neat Doric structure. It has a free-school and two hospitals, and had formerly a very extensive establishment of Carmelites, or Whitefriars, whose house, after lying in ruins many years, was converted into a workhouse in 1806, at which period the two parishes were united for parochial purposes. Coventry is united with Litchfield, as a bishop's see, but Coventry does not exhibit any ecclesiastical parade. It returns two members to parliament. Its market on Friday is well supplied, and it has three fairs annually; one on the Friday preceding Trinity Sunday, on the occasion of the procession of Lady Godiva, is numerous attended, and continues till the Friday following. Since 1820 the city has undergone considerable improvements in the widening, cleaning, and lighting the streets, and several new buildings have been erected. It is 10 m. N. by E. of Warwick, 18 E. S. E. of Birmingham, and 91 N. W. of London, on the mail-coach road to Liverpool.

Cowbridge, a corporate town of Wales, in Glamorganshire. It is called by the Welsh, Port-saen, from the stone bridge over the river, which soon after enters the Bristol Channel. Near it are the remains of Llanbithian Castle, of which a massive gateway is now converted into a barn; and about a mile distant, on a lofty hill, are the ruins of Penline Castle. Cowbridge is 12 m. W. of Cardiff, and 173 of London. Pop. in 1820, 1,107.

Cowes, a seaport on the west side of the Isle of Wight at the mouth of the Medina, or Cowes. On the opposite side is the village of East Cowes, and at each place is a fort built by Henry VIII for the security of the island and road. Cowes has an excellent harbour, which is much frequented by ships to repair damages sustained at sea, and to water; and also a good trade in provisions &c. for the use of shipping. During the summer it is much frequented for the purpose of sea-bathing; and here are a number of genteel lodging-houses, and an assembly room. It is 12 m. S. by E. of Southampton, 12 m. W. S. W. of Portsmouth, and 86 S. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,579.

Cowdurga, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore with a strong hill fort. It is surrounded by hills and forests, and stands 12 m. S. of Niagara.

Cowpens, in Union District S. C. at the northern extremity of the state, is a spot remarkable in the revolutionary history for one of the most decisive pitched battles in the whole contest. The Americans under Gen. Morgan here totally defeated the British under Col. Tareyton, Jan. 11. 1781.

Cozumel, an island on the east coast of Yucatan, where Cortes landed and refreshed his troops, before he attempted the conquest of Mexico. It abounds with fruit, pulse, cattle and fowls, and is inhabited principally by native Indians. Long 87. 19. W., lat. 19. 40. N.

Cracatoa, the southernmost of a cluster of islands in the entrance of the strait of Sunda. It consists of elevated land, gradually rising on all sides from the sea, and is covered with trees except a few spots, which have been cleared by the natives for the purpose of forming rice fields, and its coral reefs afford small turtle in abundance. The inhabitants are not considerable and their chief, like those of the other islands in the strait, is subject to the king of Bantam.

Cracow, a city of Poland, capital of a palatinate of the same name, and a bishop's see, with an university. It was formerly the capital of Poland, where the kings were elected and crowned, but since the partition of Poland, it has become a republic under the protection of Austria, Russia and Prussia. On a rock near the Vistula is the ancient royal palace, surrounded by brick walls and old towers, which form a kind of citadel. Adjoining is the cathedral, within the walls of the citadel, in which most of the sovereigns of Poland are interred. Though the city and suburbs occupy a vast tract of ground, they scarcely contain 24,000 inhabitants. The great square is spacious and well built, and many of the streets are broad and handsome; but almost every building bears the mark of ruined grandeur. This devastation was begun by the Swedes in 1702, when it was taken by Charles XII.; but it has since experienced greater calamities, having been taken and retaken by the Russians and the confederates. When the general insurrection broke out in 1794, against the Prussian and Russian usurpers of the Polish territory, Kosciusko, the chief of the patriotic insurgents, expelled the Russian garrison from this city, on the 24th of March, 1794; but having marched in the sequel to the protection of Warsaw, Cracow surrendered to the Prussians, on the 15th of June. It is seated on the Vistula, 130 m. S. S. W. of Warsaw. Long. 9. 50. E., lat. 40. 50. N.

Crediton, a town in Devonshire, Eng. with a considerable manufacture of serges. The church is a noble structure, and was formerly a cathedral. The town was almost destroyed by fire in 1769. It is seated between two hills, 8 m. N. W. of Exeter, and 180 W. by N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 5,515.

Cree, a river of Scotland, which rises in the northern parts of the counties of Wigton and Kirkcudbright, forms the boundary between them and enters the head of Wigton Bay.

Creek, or Muskogees Indians, one of the most numerous tribes of Indians of any within the limits of the United States of North America. They inhabit an extensive tract of country in the eastern part of Alabama, and till within a few years possessed territories in Georgia, but this portion of their lands they have relinquished by treaty. They are about 20,000 in number, and are accounted among the most warlike of the Aborigines. They have several pretty large towns containing from one to two hundred houses, and pay considerable attention to the cultivation of their lands. They raise cattle and live stock of various kinds as well as corn, rice, and tobacco.

Creetown or Ferrytown, a small port of Scotland, in Kirkcudbrightshire. Here several sloops are constantly employed in the coasting trade. It stands on Wigton Bay, near the influx of the Cree, 12 m. W. by N. of Kirkcudbright.

Creglingen, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Anspach, on the Tauber, 22 m. S. of Wurtsburg, and 30 N. W. of Anspach, now included in the Bavarian circle of the Lower Mayne.

Creil, a town of France, in the department of Oise, on the River Oise, five miles east of Senlis.

Creilsheim, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Anspach, on the River Jaxt, 22 m. S. W. of Anspach, now included in the Bavarian circle of the Rezat.

Crema, a fortified town of Italy, capital of Cremasco, and a bishop's see. It is well built and populous, and seated on the Serio, 30 m. S. of Bergamo.

Cremasco, a small territory of Italy, in the south part of the province of Bergamasco. It is nearly surrounded by the Duchy of Milan, and fertile in corn, wine, flax, and hemp. Crema is the capital.

Cremieu, a town of France, in the department of Isere, at the foot of a mountain near the Rhone, 20 m. N. E. of Vienne.

Cremnitz, a town in the north part of Lower Hungary, noted for its gold mines, 17 m. N. of Scheinnitz. Pop. about 10,000.

Cremond, a city of Italy, capital of the Cremonese, and a bishop's see, with a castle and a university. The streets are broad and strait, adorned with some small squares, a few palaces, 40 parish churches, and 43 convents of both sexes. It stands in a delightful plain, watered by the Oglio, about a quarter of a mile from the Po, over which is a bridge of boats, defended by a fort. A canal passes through the town, and forms a communication between the two rivers. Cremona has been several times taken. It has considerable manufactures of silk, and is peculiarly celebrated for the manufactures of violins. A tower, 372 feet in height, forms a prominent object over all the surrounding country. The Romans established themselves here in 291. B. C. It is 48 m. S. of Milan, and about the same distance S. by W. of Mantua. Pop. about 30,000.

Cremonese Territory, extends from the south in a W. N. W. direction, for about 45 miles, between the River Po on the south, which divides it from the Duchy of Parma, and the Oglio on the north, which divides it from Bresciano; the east end borders on the Duchy of Mantua, and the west on the small district of Cremasco. It is a very fertile country.

Crémier, a town of Moravia, with a fine castle and a convent, seated on the west bank of the River March, 18 m. S. S. E. of Olmutz.

Crespy, a town of France in the department of Oise, 17 m. S. of Compiègne.

Crescentino, a fortified town of Piedmont, on the north bank of the River Po, 20 m. N. E. of Turin.

Cressy or Orecy, a village of France, in the department of Somme, celebrated for the victory over the French, gained by Edward III. in 1346. It is 32 m. N. W. of Amiens.

Crest, a town of France in the department of Drome, on the River Drome, 16 m. S. S. E. of Valence.

Creseldt, a town of Germany, at the north extremity of the territory of Cologne. Near this place the French were defeated by the Hanoverians in 1758. It has considerable manufactures of linen. It is 32 m. N. N. W. of Cologne, and 7 from Dusseldorf. Pop. about 700.

Creuse, an interior department nearly in the centre of France, so named from a river, which crossed from south to north, and flows into the Vienne. It contains the late province of Marche. Gueret is the capital.

Cressen, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Bayreuth, seven miles east of Bayreuth.

Creutzburg, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Brieg, with a castle. It has a great trade in honey, wax, leather, and flax; and is seated on the Brinnitz, 35 m. E. by N. of Brieg.

Creutznach, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Rhine. It has a trade in wine, salt, corn, wool, and tobacco. On Dec. 2, 1795, this town was taken three times; first, by the French, then by the Austrians, and again by the former. It is seated on the Nahe, 25 m. S. W. of Ments.

Creskerne, a town in Somersetshire, Eng. In 1826 it had six considerable establishments for the manufacture of sail-cloth. It is seated near a branch of the Parret, 25 m. S. of Wells, and 132 W. S. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,021.

Creswille, p.t. Goochland Co. Va.

Cricketh, a town of Wales, in Caernarvonshire, 18 m. S. S. E. of Caernarvon, and 244 N. W. of London.

Crickhowell, a town of Wales, in Brecknockshire. Near it are the ruins of an ancient castle. It is seated on the Usk, 10 m. S. E. of Brecknock, and 153 W. by N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,009.

Cricklade, a borough in Wiltshire, Eng. seated near the Thames, and the Stroud Canal, 25 m. W. by S. of Oxford, and 84 W. by N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,506.

Crief, a town of Scotland, in Perthshire, with manufactures of paper and thin linen, seated on the Erne, 18 m. W. of Perth.

Crim, a town of the Crimea, supposed to be on the site of an ancient city that once gave its name of Crim Tartary, or Crimea, to the whole peninsula of the Taurida; after having, under the name of Crimmerium, been the capital of a famous people, who gave laws to the greatest part of Europe. The modern town called Eski Krim (Old Crim) by the Tartars, is seated at the foot of an insulated mountain, 10 m. W. of Caffa.

Crimea, or Taurida, the ancient Taurica Chersonesus, a peninsula of Europe, bounded on the south and west by the Black Sea, north by the province of Catharinenslaf, with which it communicates by the isthmus of Prekop, and east by the Sea of Asoph and the Strait of Caffa. Towards the end of the 11th century the Genoese settled in this country, but they were expelled by the Crim Tartars in 1474. See Caffa. These Tartars had been settled in the Crimea above two centuries before the expulsion of the Genoese. They were subjects of Batu Khan, grandson of Zingis; and their conquest was annexed to the kingdom of Kasan, till the death of Tamerlane in 1400, when Edegal Khan, an officer of that prince, took possession of it, and was succeeded by Duelet Cherai, in whose family the sovereignty continued till the 18th century. The Khans however, were vassals, or tributary to the Turks, till the year 1774, when their independence was stipulated in the treaty of Cainargi. In 1783 the Russians took possession of the country with an army; the following year it was ceded to them by the Turks; and the peaceable possession of the whole was secured to them in 1791 by the cession of the fortress of Oczakow. The Crimea is divided into two parts by the river Salgir, which runs from west to east. The north division is flat, poor, and fit for pasturage only. It has neither tree nor hillock; salt lakes and flocks of sheep are its greatest riches. This district is bleak and cold in winter, and sultry and scorching in summer. The south part is mountainous; but the valleys are astonishingly productive, and the climate extremely mild, from the exclusion of those violent winds by which the north division is frequently incommoded. The lower hills, extending from Caffa to the east extremity of the country, are principally used in gardening, and produce excellent fruit. Besides the port of Kertch, the road of Caffa, and the harbour of Balaclava, there is, near Sebastopol, one of the finest harbours in the world. The principal articles of export are corn, salt, honey, wax, butter, horses, female slaves, hides, and furs, especially the Tauric lamb-skins, which are in high esteem. The Crimea now forms one of the two provinces of the government of Catharinenslaf, under the name of Taurida. Sympheredol is the capital. See Russia.

Croatia, a province of the Austrian Empire, bounded on the N. by the river Drave, which separates it from Lower Hungary, extending south for about 160 miles to the Adriatic: the Save intersects it from the west in an E. S. E. direction, parallel with the Drave, at a distance of about forty-five miles; the part north of the Save is bounded on the east by Slavonia, and on the west by Lower Stiria; and the part south of the Save is bounded on the east by the Turkish province of Bosnia, and on the west by Lower Carinthia: this part was ceded to France at the peace of Vienna in 1809, but restored to Austria at the general peace of 1815. The mean breadth of Croatia is about sixty miles, and its superficial area 9,420 square miles, containing a population of about 800,000. It was called by the Romans Liburnia, and subsequently formed part of Illyria and Slavonia, and at a somewhat later period became an independent kingdom under the protection of the eastern emperors. In 1087 it was conquered by Ladislaus, king of Hungary, and passed into the hands of Austria by its being made an integral part of Hungary in 1102. It is now divided into six counties, and the south-east part into six districts. It is in general a mountainous country; containing some mines of iron and copper, and the best timber in Europe. The valleys are tolerably fertile, and the mulberry, prune, vine, and olive are interspersed over most parts of the country, and in parts flourish luxuriantly. Honey is collected in great quantities on the banks of the Drave. The Port of Fiume, at the south-west extremity of the province, supplies the interior with such foreign productions as the inhabitants can command, in exchange for their surplus produce, which is limited both in value and extent. The capital of the country is Carstadt, and the other principal towns are Warasden, Agram, Petrinia, Ogusia, Zettin, &c. &c. See Morlachia.

Cruz, St. a town on the north side of the Island of Cuba, 50 m. E. of Havana.

Cruz, St. an island in the Pacific Ocean. See Croce, St.

Cuba, an island of the West Indies lying between the lat. of 19. 42. and 23. 20. N., and extending from 74. to 85. of W. long. The east end is bounded by a strait called the Windward Passage, about 65 m. wide, which divides it from the north-west end of Hispaniola; and the west end projects into the Gulf of Mexico, being about 100 miles from the promontory of Yucatan on the south, and the same distance from the promontory of East Florida on the north. Its mean breadth, however, does not exceed 75 miles, comprising an area of about 52,000 square miles or a superficies, nearly equal to that of England and Wales. The island was first made known to Europeans by Columbus in 1492; and from the great extent of its coast from east to west, was at first supposed to form part of the western continent. It was, however, ascertained to be an island in 1508, by Nicholas Ovando, who sailed round it in that year, and in about three years after it was taken possession of by a Spanish force from Hispaniola, under the command of Don Diego de Velasquez, who extirpated the natives; after which the island remained, with but little interruption, in possession of the Spaniards, until 1741, when an unsuccessful attempt was made upon it by the English, to whom however it surrendered on the 13th of August, 1762, after a desperate resistance of the Spaniards, for about two months. It was restored to Spain in the following year, and has remained in their quiet possession up to 1896, having been but little affected by the events which attended the entire subversion of Spanish domination over every part of their continental possessions in the western hemisphere. Since the period of 1791, when the mania of the French revolution extended to the neighbouring island of Hispaniola, numerous planters of that island fled to Cuba, which has ever since continued to improve in cultivation and increase in population, and its produce in sugar, coffee, and tobacco, since the commencement of the present century, has been very great and progressively increasing. The tobacco is unequalled in quality, and is chiefly made into cigars.

Mountain ridges pervade the whole island, rendering the face of the country exceedingly picturesque. It is tolerably well watered; and, by social arrangements and well-directed exertion, it is capable of maintaining twenty millions of people in the highest degree of earthly enjoyment. In the woods are some valuable trees, particularly cedars of a large size; and birds abound here, both in variety and number, more than in any of the other islands. The soil is fertile, and cattle, sheep, and hogs are numerous. There are copper mines in the mountains, and the forests are full of game. The principal ports are Havana, and Matanzas, on the north coast, near the west end; and St. Jago de Cuba and St. Salvador, on the south coast, near the east end. In addition to its staple productions, of sugar, coffee, and tobacco; ginger, long pepper, cassia, tamarinds wild cinnamon, mastic, aloes, honey, &c. &c. are abundant.

The lime grows plentifully in this island. It is produced by a small tree or rather shrub.

Its fruit is a great favourite in the West Indies and its acid is sharper as well as more cooling than that of the lemon.

Cuba, a town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, 36 m. S. by E. of Evora.

Cubagua, a small island off the north coast of Colombia, between that of Margareta and Cumana. Here the Spaniards, in 1509, established a fishery of pearl; but the banks disappeared in 1524. The island is barren and nitrous. Long. 74. 10. W lat. 10. 56. N.

Cumana, a sea-port of Colombia, and capital of the province of Orinoco. It is seated on an arid sandy plain at the entrance of a spacious inlet of the Carribean sea, in the lat. of 16. 12. N. and 64. 24. W. long. Cumana has suffered much both by inundations and by earthquakes. On the 14th of Dec. 1797 about four-fifths of the town was destroyed. It is otherwise advantageously situate for external commerce, which it carries on to some extent in cotton, cacao, mules, cattle, &c. in exchange for the manufactures of Europe generally. Pop. in 1826, about 20,000.

Cumber, or Comber, a parish and town in the county of Down, Ireland. The town is pleasantly seated at the head of a small bay of Strangford Lough. Population of the town in 1821, 1,283, and of the parish 6,918 more.

Cumberland, a maritime and mountainous county of the north of England, bounded on the north by the river Liddel, which separates it from Scotland, and on the east by the counties of Northumberland and Durham; south by those of Westmoreland and part of Lancashire, and east by the Irish sea. This county contains a good deal of dreary moor, but some of the valleys intersected by streams of water and interspersed with lakes are exceedingly picturesque, and very fertile. The two principal rivers are the Eden and Derwent, which abound with salmon and char. The mountains and moors are rich in minerals, especially coals and lead. It has also a very valuable bed of plumbago, or blacklead. Sea Fell, the highest peak of the mountains, rises to a height of 3,166 feet above the level of the sea. Skeddau and Helvellyn also each rise to heights exceeding 3,000 feet, and five or six others approximate to 3,000 feet. Carlisle is the capital, where some considerable manufactures of cotton are carried on. The county also yields a surplus of cattle and about 200,000 chaldron of coals annually. The sea-ports are Whitehaven, Workington and Maryport; and the principal towns in the interior, Aldston, Cockermouth, Penrith, and Wigton.

Cumberland, is also the name of six counties in different parts of the United States of North America: viz.

1st. In the state of Maine, of which Portland is the chief town, and formerly was the seat of government of the state. It is a maritime county, its area not exceeding 700 square miles, comprising a considerable surface of lakes. The north-east corner of the county is bounded by the Kenebec River. Pop. 60,113.

Cumberland, p.t. Providence Co. R. I. Pop. 3,675. Also towns in Pa. and Va.

Cumberland River, which gives name to three of the above counties, rises on the west side of the Cumberland Ridge of mountains, which divide the south-east end of the state of Kentucky from that of Virginia, in the lat. of 37. N., runs west for about 120 miles, when it leaves the state of Kentucky in a southerly direction, at the south-west corner of Cumberland County, into the state of Tennessee, through which it runs a course of about 150 m., when it re-enters the state of Kentucky in a north-west direction, and after a further course of about 60 miles, falls into the Ohio about 50 miles above the entrance of that river into the Mississippi. From the source of the Cumberland River to its conflux with the Ohio, the distance in a direct line is 300 miles, being 6 deg. of long. between 82. 15. and 88. 15. in the lat. of 37. N. but the distance by the course and windings of the stream is near 600 miles, 500 of which it is navigable for batteaux of 14 or 15 tons burthen.

Cumberland Ridge, is the most westerly of the Appalachian chain of mountains, and extends from the frontier of Georgia in the lat. of 35. N. in a E. N. E. direction, through the state of Tennessee, flanking the south-east end of the state of Kentucky, into Tazewell County, in the state of Virginia, in the lat. of 37. 20. N. where it terminates in several knolls, which give rise to the streams that form the Big Sandy River.

Cumberland, an island on the coast of Georgia; the most southern territory of the United States on the Atlantic Ocean, previous to their possession of the Floridas in July 1821. It is 15 miles long and two broad. Opposite its south extremity is the island of Amilla, and between them is the entrance to St. Mary's River, n the lat. of 30. 39. N.

Cumberland, a town and fort of British America, in a county of the same name, forming the isthmus which unites Nova Scotia to New Brunswick. The fort is situate at the head of the bay of Fundy, on the east side of its northern branch, called Chignecto Bay. The isthmus is here about 15 miles across, easily admitting a canal to unite the Bay of Fundy with the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Long. 64. 10. W., lat. 45. 45. N.

Cupar, a borough of Scotland, capital of Fifeshire. Here are manufactures of coarse linens, and a considerable tannery. It is seated in a rich valley, on the north side of the Eden, eight miles west by south of St. Andrew, and 30 N. N. E. of Edinburg. Pop. of the parish in 1821, 5,892.

Cupar, in Angus, a town of Scotland, partly in Forfar, but chiefly in Perthshire, with a considerable linen manufactory and tannery. It is seated on the Isla, 12 miles north-west of Dundee, and 13 N. N. E. of Perth. Pop. 1821, 2,622.

Curacao, an island in the Caribbean Sea, lying off the coast of Colombia, near the entrance to the Gulf and Lake Maracaibo, 35 miles long and 12 broad, subject to the Dutch. It produces sugar, tobacco, and salt; has numerous warehouses, which used formerly to supply the adjacent coast with the productions of Europe and Asia, and which still continue to do so to some extent. In 1800 some French having settled on part of the island, and becoming at variance with the Dutch, the latter surrendered the island to a single British frigate. It was restored to the Dutch, by the peace of 1802, and taken from them by a British squadron in 1807, and again restored by the peace of 1814. The principal town is St. Peter, at the north-east extremity of the island. Long. 69. 15. W., lat. 12. 52. N.

Curico, the tenth in order to the provinces of Chile, the chief town of the same name is about 100 m. from the sea, in the lat. of 35. S., on the road from Concepcion to Santiago.

Curia Muria, an island on the coast of Arabia Felix, opposite the mouth of the river Prim. Long. 55. 25. E., lat. 17. 0. N.

Curisch Haff, a lake or bay of Prussia, separated from the Baltic Sea by a tongue of land, 70 miles in extent, in a N. N. E. direction but not more than from two to three miles wide; the Haff is about 30 miles wide at the south end, progressively narrowing to about a mile only at its outlet into its sea at Mennel.

Currah, a town of Hindoostan, in Allahabad, on the south bank of the Ganges, 36 m. north west of Allahabad.

Current, a township in Lawrence Co. Arkansas.

Curvinsville, p.v. Clearfield Co. Pa.

Currituck, a maritime country at the north-east extremity of North Carolina, the north end bordering on the Great Dismal Swamp of Virginia, and the south end on Albemarle Sound. This was formerly a very dreary district, but some of the land within the present century has been rendered very productive in rice. Pop. 7,654. The county gives name to one of the inlets into Albemarle Sound.

Curupa, a town of Brazil, in the government of Para, seated on the south bank of the main channel of the Amazon, 250 miles west of Para. Long. 53. 10. W., lat. 1. 50. S.

Curzola, an island in the Gulf of Venice, on the coast of Dalmatia, about 26 miles long. It abounds in wood proper for building ships, and produces good wine. At the east end is a fortified town of the same name, with a good harbour, Long. 17. 10. E., lat. 43. 6. N.

Cusco, or Cuzco, a city of Peru, and a bishop's see, formerly the capital of the Incas, supposed to have been first founded by Manco Capac, in 1043. The Spaniards, under Pizarro, took possession of it in 1534. On a mountain contiguous to the north part of the city are the ruins of a fort and palace of the Incas, the stones of which are of an enormous magnitude. Cusco is built in a square form, in the middle of which is the best market in all America: four large streets, which are perfectly straight, terminate in the square. It contains nine churches besides the cathedral, which is a noble structure. The number of inhabitants is about 30,000, of which one-half are original Americans. Streams of water run through the town, which are a great convenience in a country where it seldom rains. It is seated near the source of a river falling into the Pilcomayo, on the east side of the first collateral ridge of the Andes, 350 miles east by south of Lima. Long. 71. 47. W., lat. 13. 20. S.

Cushing, t. Lincoln Co. Me. Pop. 681.

Cusset, a town of France, in the department of Allier, 37 miles south by east of Moulins. Pop. about 4,000.

Custee, a town of Bengal, on the south bank of the main branch of the Ganges, 100 miles north by east of Calcutta. It has considerable manufactures of silk.

Custrin, a fortified town of Brandenburg, capital of the New Mark, with a castle. In 1760 it was bombarded and almost destroyed by the Russians, and in 1806 it was taken by the French. It is seated amid morasses, at the conflux of the Warta with the Oder, 46 m. east by north of Berlin.

Cutais, the chief town of Imeritia. The remains of the cathedral seem to prove that it was once a considerable place. It is seated on the Riona, 120 miles west by north of Teflis. Long. 43. 0. E., lat. 42. 25. N.

Cutch, a country of Hindoostan, governed by a rajah, and situate on the south-east of Sind; the east branch of the Indus separated the two countries. It extends along the north coast of the Gulf of Cutch, and is separated from Guzerat by the river Ban. It abounds with hills, woods, and sandy wilds. The capital is Booge-booge, in the lat. of 23. 16. N., and 69. 2. of E. long.

Cuttack, a maritime district of Hindoostan, extending from Lake Chilca in the lat. of 19. 30. N. to the Subunreeka River which separates it from Bengal in the lat. of 21. 30. N., being bounded on the west by the province of Orissa. The rivers Coyle, Nuddy and Mahanuddy intersect it from west to east. It is a very fertile district, and has numerous and extensive manufactures of cotton; but is more particularly celebrated as the chief district of Hindoo devotees, and containing the temple of Jagarnaut. The chief town of the same name, sometimes called Cuttack Benares is seated on an island formed by the Mahanuddy River, about fifty miles from the sea, in the lat of 20. 30. N. and 86. 10. of E. long. Besides Jagarnaut the other places of note are Balasore, Masulipatam and Jagepoor. This district was familiar to the Mahomedans as early as the commencement of the thirteenth century, but continued in possession of the Hindoos till 1569, when it surrendered to Solyman Kerang, who annexed it to Bengal. In 1757 it was ceded to the Nagpore Maharrattas, and fell into the possession of the English in 1803. Population about 1,200,000.

Cutterah, a town of Hindoostan in the province of Oude, 25 miles south by east of Bereilly, celebrated for a decisive battle fought in its vicinity on the 18th of April, 1774, between the Rohillas and the British.

Cuxhaven, a sea-port of Lower Saxony, in the Duchy of Bremen, situate near the point of the promontory formed by the mouths of the rivers Weser and Elbe. It is an insignificant place, but rendered of some importance as the station of the post office packets between England and the north of Europe. It is 60 miles N. N. W. of Hamburg. Lat. 53. 50. N., and 8. 40. of E. long.

Cuyahoga, a stream of Ohio falling into Lake Erie at Cleaveland. The great Ohio Canal, passes along this river and joins the Lake at its mouth. See Ohio Canal.

Cuyahoga, a county of Ohio bordering upon Lake Erie at the outlet of the above stream. Pop. 10,360. Cleaveland is the capital.

Cyclades, the ancient name of ten islands at the entrance of the Grecian Archipelago, between 36. and 38. of N. lat.

Cynthiana, p.t. Harrison Co. Ken. Also a township in Posey Co. Ind.

Cyprus, an island at the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean Sea, lying off the coast of Syria, from which the eastern extremity of the island is distant 70 miles. It is 165 miles in extreme length, and 50 wide in its broadest part, but its mean breadth does not exceed 30 miles, giving an area of about 5,000 square miles, intersected by mountains and streams of water. The mountains are of considerable elevation, and the tops of some of them are covered with snow a great part of the year. The principal river runs from west to east, and is called the Pedia. During the national career of Egypt, Persia, Greece, and Rome, Cyprus was the resort of the learned, gay, refined, and vicious, of those nations. Its preeminence declined with the fall of the Roman Empire, and from its being the abode of all that was refined in art, and voluptuous in every species of indulgence, yielding to a numerous population abundance of every thing necessary to subsistence and a variety of the most delicious fruits; it rapidly became a wilderness in comparison with its previous fertility, overrun by tribes of Arabs, who were driven from the island during the crusades, at the close of the twelfth century by Richard I. of England, who assumed the title of king of Cyprus. In 1480 it fell into the hands of the Venetians, at which period it is made the place and scene of a drama by the English dramatic poet, Shakspeare. The Venetians surrendered it to the Turks in 1570, in whose possession up to 1826 it still continued. Its present population is supposed not to exceed 60,000, about one-third of whom are Turks, and the remainder Greeks, who have three bishops and one archbishop. The principal towns are Pafos, or Baffa, at the west end; Massarea, and Mancorta, or Famagousta, at the mouth of the Pedia towards the east end; and Cerina, on the north coast of the island, and Lessocossia, or Viconia, the capital in the interior. Cyprus is still rich by nature, in mineral, animal and vegetable productions: the vine and olive, with a variety of other plants and flowers, esculent, ambrosial and medicinal, luxuriate in a perfection equal to any part of the world, and superior to most parts. The wines possess a strong aperient quality, and require forty years to duly qualify them for the palate. The inhabitants carry on various manufactures in silk, cotton, and wool, and their carpets are deservedly esteemed for the variety, richness, and beauty of their colour.

Cyr, St. a village of France, two miles from Versailles, celebrated for an abbey founded by Madame de Maintenon, who was the abbess till her death in 1719.

* * There are a number of towns and villages of this name in different parts of France, but all inconsiderable.

Cz. For places sometimes written with Cz, see Cs and Tsch.

Czaslau, or Tokaslau, a circle of Bohemia, bordering on Moravia, the N. end jetting upon the Elbe; containing about 800 square miles of territory. It is intersected from east to west by the Yasawa, which river falls into the Moldau, and from north to south by another river which falls into the Elbe. Pop. about 180,000, chiefly agricultural. The chief town of the same name is seated in the north part of the circle, 8 miles S. of the Elbe, and 45 E. N. E. of Prague. The church has the highest tower of Bohemia. Near this place the king of Prussia gained a victory over the Austrians in 1742.

Czemstochow, or Czestochow, a town of Prussian Poland, near the frontier of Silicia and the source of the Warta; near which there is a celebrated convent, fortified and garrisoned. It sustained a siege against the Swedes in 1657, and near it a battle was fought in 1665, between the royal army of Poland and Lubomirski, to the disadvantage of the former. It was garrisoned by the French in 1812. It is 50 m. N. N. W. of Cracow.

Czercossi, or St. Czychossy, a town of Russia, in the Ukraine, with a castle, seated near the Dneiper, 85 m. S. E. of Kiow. Long. 32. 5. E., lat. 49. 20. N.

Czernetz, a town of European Turkey, in Walachia, near the Danube, 140 m. W. by N. of Bucharest.

Czernatz, or Kaschau, a town of Carniola, remarkable for its lake, which produces grass and corn every year. The lake is surrounded by mountains, and in dry seasons is from 20 to 25 miles in circumference; but when full it is 40 miles round, and contains several islands, on the largest of which is a village. When the water subsides, buck-wheat is sown on the dry parts, and becomes ready for the sickle in six weeks, and the pasture is not hurt by the water if it does not stay too long. The town is situate at the north part of the lake, 20 m. S. by W. of Laybach.

Czernigov, or Tchernigov, a government of European Russia, bounded on the west by the Dniester. The chief town of the same name is seated on the north bank of the Desna, which falls into the Dniester, 450 m. S. S. W. of Moscow, and 75 N. by E. of Kiev. Pop. about 5,000.

Czersko, a town of Prussian Poland, in the palatinate of Masovia, seated on the west bank of the Vistula, 30 m. S. S. E. of Warsaw.

Czerweniza, a town of Upper Hungary; famous for mines of opal, a noble gem not yet discovered in any other region of the globe. It is 15 m. N. of Cassovia.

Czongrad, or Alt-Czongrad, a town of Hungary, at the influx of the Theiss and Korosh, 13 m. N. of Zegedin.

Cz begins the names of several other towns in Poland, Russia and Austria.

D

DABER, a town of Hither Pomerania, in a circle of its name, 16 m. N. N. E. of Stargard.

Dabul, a town of Hindoostan, on the coast of Concan, with a trade in pepper and salt, seated at the mouth of a river, 75 m. S. by E. of Bombay. Long. 72. 54. E., lat. 17. 50. N.

Dacca, a district of Bengal, lying between the main branch of the Ganges and the Burrampooter rivers. The chief town of the same name is seated on the banks of a small river, which communicates with the Burrampooter. It was once the capital of Bengal, and defended by a strong fortress, the remains of which appear. It has a vast trade in muslins and other cotton manufactures of the most delicate texture, manufactured from the cotton produced in the province. The country round Dacca lies low, and is always covered with verdure during the dry months. It is 150 miles north-east of Calcutta. Long. 90. 32. E., lat. 23. 42. N.

Dachau, a town of Bavaria, where the king has a palace seated on a hill near the river Ammer, 10 m. N. N. W. of Munich.

Daguet's Island, an island about nine miles in circumference, in the Japanese Sea, at about an equal distance from the Isle of Nippon and the Coast of the Corea, in the lat. of 37. 25. N. It was visited by La Perouse. It abounds with timber, which the Coreans are supposed to use in building of boats.

Dagenham, a village of Essex, England, on the north bank of the Thames, from the tide-water of which it is secured by an embankment. In 1703 the embankment gave way, and inundated 5,000 acres of ground, which were reclaimed in 1715.

Daghestan, a province of Georgia, lying between the west shore of the Caspian Sea and the Caucasian mountains. It is intersected by several small rivers falling into the Caspian. The inhabitants are a brave and hardy race, and successfully resisted the arms of Nadir Shah in 1743. Its sovereignty is claimed by Russia, but the resoluteness of the inhabitants renders it nominal rather than real. It has two considerable towns, Tasker and Derbent, on the shores of the Caspian. It is a fertile district, and under social institutions might be made an agreeable country. It is intersected by the line of 42. of N. lat.

Dago, or Dagao, an island in the Baltic, on the coast of Livonia, seven miles north of the Isle of Oesel, near the entrance to the Gulf of Finland. It is 20 miles in circumference, and has two castles, called Dagerwort and Paden. Long. 22. 56. E., lat. 58. 44. N.

Dagon. See Ragoon.

Dagsborough, p.t. Sussex Co. Del.

Dahl, the finest river of Sweden, which flows through Dalecarlia, or Dalarne, and on the south confines of Gastricia, and enters the Gulf of Bothnia south of Gefle. Near Escarleby, not far from its mouth, it forms a celebrated cataract, little inferior to that of the Rhine at Lauffen.

Dahlak, an island in the Red Sea, near the north end of the coast of Abyssina, 40 miles long and six broad. It is fertile, populous, and remarkable for a pearl fishery. The inhabitants are blacks, and great enemies to the Mahometans. Long. 40. 10. E., lat. 15. 44. N.

Dahme, a town of Prussia, at the south extremity of the middle mark, 45 m. S. of Berlin. Pop. about 3,000.

Dahomey, a kingdom of Guinea, supposed to reach 180 miles inland. The country is fertile, yielding a plentiful supply of farinaceous vegetables and tropical fruits; also indigo, cotton, sugar-cane, tobacco, palm-oil and a variety of spices. The religion of Dahomey consists of a jumble of superstitious ceremonies, of which it is impossible to convey any satisfactory idea. The king of Dahomey is under a partial subjection to the king of the Eyoos. The government is perhaps the most perfect despotism in the world; for the policy admits of no intermediate degree of subordination between king and slave, at least in the royal presence, where the prime minister prostrates himself with as much abject submission as the meanest subject. The king maintains a considerable standing army, commanded by an agaow, or general, and their subordinate officers, who must hold themselves in readiness to take the field at the command of the sovereign. On extraordinary occasions, all the males able to bear arms are obliged to repair to the general's standard; every caboccer marching at the head of his own people. Sometimes the king takes the field at the head of his troops; and on very great emergencies at the head of his women. In the different royal palaces, in Dahomey, are immured not less than 3,000 women; several hundreds of whom are trained to arms, under a female general and other officers. The general character of the Dahomans is marked by a mixture of ferocity and politeness; the former appears in the treatment of their enemies; the latter they possess far above the African nations with whom Europeans have hitherto had any intercourse. The leopard and hyæna are common in this part of Africa, and commit great ravages, as sometimes do also a species of white ant. Grewhe, or Griwhee, in the lat. of 6. 17. N., and 3. 6. of E. long. is the principal sea port. Pop. about 6,500. Abomey, about 90 m. inland is the capital.

Dalbeattie, a village of Scotland, 12 miles east by north of Kirkcudbright. It stands near the mouth of the Urr, in Solway Frith, and has a convenient harbour for small vessels.

Dalebs, a town of Sweden, capital of Dalia, situate on the south-west side of Lake Wener, 60 m. north by east of Gotheburg.

Dalecarlia, or Dalarne, an interior province of Sweden, in the division of Sweden Proper, between Nordland and the mountains of Norway. It is 270 m. long, and from 40 to 120 broad. The principal productions are wood, corn, and hemp; and it contains many mountains, in which are mines of silver, copper, and iron. The capital is Fahlun. The manners of the people are distinct from those of other parts of Sweden.

Daletonum, p.v. Wilcox Co. Alab.

Dalheim, a town of the Netherlands, in the duchy of Limberg, capital of a territory of the same name, seated near the Meuse, 15 m. N. W. of Limburg.

Dalen, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers, situate on the Bervine, which falls into the Meuse, 15 m. N. N. W. of Juliers. Pop. about 3,700.

Dalia, Daland, or Dalsland, a province of Sweden, in Gothland, to the west of Wermeland and Lake Wener. It is eighty-five miles long and forty broad. The north part is full of mountains, forests, and lakes; but to the south it produces corn sufficient for the inhabitants. Cattle, fish, butter, and cheese are the chief articles. The capital is Daleburg, or Amal, on the shore of the lake.

Dalkeith, a town of Scotland, in Edinburghshire, with a great market, for corn and oatmeal. Here is Dalkeith house, the magnificent seat of the duke of Buccleugh. It is seated on a strip of land between the north and south Esk, six miles south-east of Edinburgh. Pop. in 1821, 5,169.

Dalla, or Della, a district of low land at the Delta of the Irrawaddy River; a town of the same name on the east bank of the main branch of the river, about 40 miles W. S. W. of Rangoon, manufactures a great quantity of salt. The soil is capable of being rendered very productive. It is at present much infested with wild animals.

Dallas, a county of Alabama. Pop. 14,017. Cahawba is the chief town. Also a township in Luzerne Co. Pa.

Dalmatia, a country of Europe stretching in a north-west direction, from the lat. of 42. to 44. N., along the east shore of the Adriatic Sea. It is a country of great antiquity, and formerly extended inland to the lat. of 45. 39. N. and included parts of Croatia, Bosnia, and Albania: the whole was incorporated with Hungary in the twelfth century. The Venetians afterwards made inroads upon the sea-coast, and in the 15th century the whole country, now commonly called Dalmatia, became subject to that republic. It was ceded to Austria by the treaty of Campo Formio in 1797; Austria ceded it to France in 1805. It fell again into the possession of Austria at the general partitioning of 1814. This portion of Dalmatia, which is all now understood by that name, has about 200 miles of sea coast, within the latitude above mentioned, being about 40 miles in mean breadth, which gives an area of about 9,000 square miles, and is supposed to contain 350,000 inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the Bocana River, which separates it from Albania, and on the north by Bosnia and Croatia; west by Morlachia. It has several islands lying off the coast, the principal of which are Brazza, Lessena, Carzola, Sabonelio and Meleda. It has some mountainous territory, containing marble, gypsum, iron and other minerals; but parts are very fertile, and the mulberry, vine, and olive, flourish in considerable luxuriance. The principal river is the Narenta, which rises in Bosnia, and either this or the Bocana might easily be united with collateral branches of the Save, near its union with the Danube, and thereby open a water communication by means of the latter, with the Black Sea on one side, and the interior of Germany on the other, but military despotism and catholic subjugation are incompatible with social improvements. The principal towns on the coast are Cattaro, Ragusa, and Spalatro, and in the interior Krin and Mostar.

Dalry, a village of Scotland, in Ayrshire, 7 m. N. N. W. of Irvine. It has a cotton manufacture, and near it are valuable coal mines, and a strong sulphureous spring. Pop. in 1821, 3,313.

Dalsland. See Dalia.

Dalton, a town in Lancashire, Eng. Here are the remains of an ancient castle, and near it are the magnificent ruins of Furness abbey. It is seated in a champaign country, not far from the sea, six miles S. W. of Ulverston, and 265 N. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 714.

Dalton, p.t. Coos Co. N. H. on the Connecticut, at the 15 mile falls. Pop. 532.

Dalton, p.t. Berkshire Co. Mass. Pop. 791.

Damanhar, a town of Egypt, near the canal of Alexandria, 32 m. E. S. E. of Alexandria.

Demar, a town of Arabia Felix, in Yemen, with a university, 60 m. S. by E. of Sana.

Damariscotta, a river of Maine flowing into the sea between Penobscot and Casco Bays.

Damascus, or (as it is called by the Arabs) Sham, a city of Syria, capital of a Turkish pachalic, and the see of a Greek archbishop. The form is an exact square, each side being a mile and a half long, and is supposed to contain from 180,000 to 200,000 inhabitants, among whom are great numbers of Christians and Jews. It has three walls, now almost entirely ruined; and of the several suburbs which it formerly had, there remains only one, which extends three miles in length. Several streams flow across the fertile plains of Damascus, which water all the gardens, supply the public fountains, and are carried into every house. The houses are built of wood, with their fronts inward, where there is a court; in the streets there are only walls to be seen, but the insides are richly adorned. The most remarkable buildings are the caravanserais, which consist of long galleries supported by marble pillars, and surrounding a large square court. The castle is like a little town, having its own streets and houses: and the famous Damascus steel was kept here in a magazine. The mosques, of which there are about 200, are extremely handsome edifices, the most stately of which was a christian church. One street runs across the city and suburbs in a direct line, on each side of which are shops, where all sorts of rich merchandise are sold. Several manufactures are carried on here, among which that of sabres and knives has been the most famous. Damascus is one of the most ancient places existing; it is mentioned by Abraham 1917 years before the christian era, as the place near which he encountered the forces of Chedorlaomer king of Elam, (Persia), and rescued his nephew Lot with considerable treasure, which the Elamites had taken from the cities of the plain. It afterwards became the capital of an independent kingdom, and at a later period became subject to the Jews. It was conquered by the Romans; and after the fall of the Roman empire, Damascus became the seat of the grand caliph of the Saracens, who surrendered it to the Turkish emperor Selim, the third of the Ottoman dynasty about 1515. It has continued subject to the Turks since that time. The pachalic which extends from the desert of Arabia through five degrees of latitude to Aleppo, is considered the most valuable and important of all the Turkish possessions. The pacha makes an annual journey to Mecca, as the representative of the grand seignior. (See Syria.) Damascus is seated sixty miles from the sea, at Berut, in the lat. of 33. 30. N., 130 miles N. N. E. of Jerusalem, and 170 S. by W. of Aleppo.

Damascus, towns in Wayne Co. Pa., Frederick Co. Md., and Logan Co. Ohio.

Damaun, a sea-port of Hindoostan, in the country of Baglana, at the entrance of the Gulf of Cambay. Aurungzebe besieged it about the middle of the seventeenth century, with an army of 40,000 men; but the garrison sallying out on a part of his camp, guarded by 200 elephants, so terrified those animals by their fire-arms, that they turned on their masters, and trampled to death half his army. The Persees (see Bachu) have a celebrated temple here. It is subject to the Portuguese, and is sixty miles south of Surat. Long. 72. 47. E., lat. 20. 18. N.

Damagan, or Damagan, a town of Persia, seated near the south shore of the Caspian Sea, in the district of Mazenderan. It is supposed once to have been the seat of government of the Parthian empire. It is 90 mi. east by south of Ferrabad, and 300 north by east of Ispahan.

Damgartin, or Damgard, a town of Hither Pomerania, with a castle seated at the mouth of the Recknitz, 18 m. W. of Stralsund.

Damiatta, a town of Egypt, and a Greek archbishop's see, with a good harbour, at one of the eastern mouths of the Nile. It has several squares, various grand mosques, and public baths faced with marble. The rice meselaoui, the finest in Egypt, is cultivated in the neighbouring plains. Here are likewise Indian stuffs, silk, sal ammoniac, wheat, &c. The Christians of Aleppo and Damascus carry on the principal trade, the Turks being indolent, and contenting themselves with occasional extortions. During the crusades, Damiatta was frequently an object of contention. It surrendered to the French in 1798, since which period it has been on the decline. It is about ninety miles east of Alexandria, the same distance north by east of Cairo, in the lat. of 31. 26. N., and 31. 50. of E. long. Pop. about 30,000.

Damm, a town of Further Pomerania, which has a considerable trade in steel manufactures. It is seated at the south end of a lake of the same name, near the mouth of the Oder, 8 m. E. S. E. of Stettin. Pop. about 2,000.

Damme, a town of the Netherlands, in Flanders, seated on the canal between Sluys and Bruges, 5 m. N. by E. of Bruges.

Damme, or Appingedam, a town of Holland, in Groningen, seated on the Damster, near the mouth of the Ems, 14 miles N. E. of Groningen.

Dampier's Land, in the lat. of 19. S., on the west coast of New Holland, so called from a navigator of that name, who visited it in 1688, and who reported having discovered a large river or deep inlet of the sea in that part, but the assertion yet remains to be confirmed.

Dan, a river of North Carolina, rising in Virginia and falling into the Roanoke near Mecklenburg.

Dana, t. Worcester Co. Mass. Pop. 623.

Danbury, a village in Essex, England, 5 m. E. of Chelmsford, and 16 W. of the sea. It stands on the highest ground in the county, and the spire of the church serves as a sea-mark: Pop. in 1821, 1,005.

Danbury, t. Grafton Co. N. H. 93 m. from Boston. Pop. 786.

Danbury, a town of Connecticut, in Fairfield County. This town, with a large quantity of military stores, was burnt by the British in 1777. It is 20 miles N. N. W. of Fairfield, and 65 N. N. E. of New York. Pop. 4,325.

Danby, p.t. Rutland Co. Vt. Pop. 1,362.

Dancali, a country in the east part of Abyssinia, at the entrance to the Red Sea. The soil is unproductive; and its chief riches consist in fossil salt and honey. It is governed by a prince nominally tributary to the negus, or emperor of Abyssinia. Bailar is the principal town.

Danger, Iles of, three islands in the Pacific Ocean, seen by Byron in 1765, but so surrounded by rocks and breakers, that it was unsafe to land. The commodore supposed them to be the islands seen by Quiros, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, and named Solomon's Islands. Long. 169. 28. W., lat. 10. 15. S.

Dannemora, or Dammora, the most celebrated iron mine in Sweden. It produces from four to five thousand tons of iron of the very best quality annually. It is about thirty miles N. of Upsal.

Dannenburg, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Luneburg, capital of a district of the same name; seated on the Jetze, near the Elbe, 30 m. E. by S. of Luneburg.

Dansville, p.t. Steuben Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,726.

Danzic, a city of Europe, very advantageously located on the west bank of the Vistula, about five miles above its entrance into the Baltic Sea, in the lat. of 54. 21. N., and 18. 38. of E. long. It is supposed to have been first founded by the Danes in the twelfth century, and for some time continued a free and independent city. In 1468 it became subject to Poland, retaining, however, all its municipal institutions, and long continued to rank as the chief commercial city of the north of Europe, included in the Hansatic league. At the commencement of the eighteenth century it contained upwards of 100,000 inhabitants, more than 20,000 of whom were carried off by a pest in 1709. In 1734 it offered protection to Stanislaus, king of Poland, when it was besieged by the Russians and Saxons, to whom it was forced to surrender. In 1793 it was taken possession of by a Prussian force, who held it till 1807, when, after a long siege, it surrendered to the French, who, in their turn, were forced to surrender it to a united Russian and Prussian force, after the disastrous campaign of 1812-13, and in the following year (1814) it was confirmed in full sovereignty to Prussia. The easy navigation of the Vistula, and three or four considerable collateral rivers which intersect an extensive and fertile country, affords to Dantzig great commercial advantages. The chief product of the interior country is grain, of which article Dantzig has occasionally exported 500,000 quarters per annum, and the vicinity of the city contains some extensive granaries. It is also capable of affording very large supplies of timber, pearl-ash, flax, and hemp. It has several yards for ship building, but its commercial activity has of late years very much declined. It has upwards of twenty churches, chiefly Lutheran, and several other public buildings. It is nearly surrounded by water, and two streams intersect the city, dividing it into three parts. The fortifications are very strong by nature, and rendered formidable by art. It is 50 m. W. S. W. of Konigsburg, 250 N. E. of Berlin, and 190 N. by W. of Warsaw. Pop. in 1825, 52,820.

Danube, or Donau, (the lower part called Ister by Strabo,) the noblest river of Europe; has its source in the territory of the grand duke of Baden on the eastern confines of the Black Forest, in the lat. of 48. N., and 8. 15. of E. long. It pursues a winding course in a N. N. E. direction to Ulm, where it receives the Iller from the south, and becomes navigable. From Ulm it bears north into Bavaria, to the lat. of 49. at Ratisbon, previously receiving the united waters of the Wartach and Lech from the south, and before passing Ratisbon it receives the waters of the Altmucht and of the Nab from the north. From Ratisbon it bears to the south, past Ilistadt into Austria, previously receiving the Iser, Inn, and Salza, all from the south.

Its course through the archduchy of Austria, past Vienna to Presburg, is rather circuitous; from Presburg it runs E. by N. for about 100 m. receiving several streams from the Carpathian mountain, when it takes a course due south through the heart of Lower Hungary, past Buda, for 160 miles to the lat. of 45. 25. Here it receives the waters of the Drave from the west, and again bears to the east, receiving the Theiss, which divides Upper and Lower Hungary from the north, and the Save from the west at Belgrade. From Belgrade it forms the boundary between Hungary and Servia, then bears S. separating Bulgaria from Walachia, receiving numerous streams, both from the north and south. It again bears north to Galatz, near which it receives the waters of the numerous rivers of Moldavia and Bessarabia, falling into the Black Sea on the east, by several channels between the lat. of 44. 40. and 45. 30. N. in 29. 20. of E. long. The meridional distance from the source to the mouth of this river is 21 degrees of long., between the lat. of 45. and 49., equal to about 1,000 English miles, but the course of the stream, by its continued windings, may be estimated at from 1,500 to 1,600 miles. It is navigable to Ulm, within 150 miles of its source, but political permutations preclude the countries through which this noble river flows, from deriving much external advantage from its navigation. In the archduchy of Austria it forms several islands. Under the head of Dalmatia it is shown that it might easily be made to communicate with the Adriatic. It contains a great variety of fish, and is celebrated for its sturgeon, which ascend the river several hundred miles.

Danube, Upper, Circle of, forms the south-west part of the kingdom of Bavaria, lying between 48 and 49. of N. lat. and 10. and 11. of E. long. it comprises the S. part of the circle of Suabia, the county of Pappenheim, and the principality of Neuberb. It is watered by the Iller, Mindel, Wertach, and the Lech, all running from south to north into the Danube, which gives name to the circle. The Iller might readily be united with the lake of Constance, and thereby open a water communication between the Danube and the Rhine. It is a district of capability, and of resource, under a well-directed exertion of agricultural pursuit. The principal towns are Gunsburg, Dillengen, Hochstadt, Donauwert, Pappenheim, Neuberb, Eichstadt, Nordlingen, &c.

Danube, Lower, Circle of, another circle of the kingdom of Bavaria, comprises the east part of Lower Bavaria, and the bishopric of Passau. It lies on both sides of the Danube, between the lat. of 12. 30. and 13. 40. E. in the same parallel of lat. as the Upper Circle. The Iser and the Inn intersects the south part, which is considered the most fertile district of all Bavaria. Passau is the capital; and the other principal towns are Straubing, Landau, Deckendorf, Osterhofen, &c. Pop. about 400,000.

Danube, Circle of. The source of the Danube also gives name to a circle in the territory of the grand duke of Baden, comprising part of the Black Forest. Willengen, 20 m. E. by N. of Friburg, is the capital. Pop. about 75,000.

Danube, District of, one of the four great divisions of the kingdom of Wurtemberg, according to the distribution of 1818.

Danvers, p.t. Essex Co. Mass. adjoining Salem. Pop. 4,288. It has many flourishing manufactures of cotton.

Darby, the name of 4 townships, viz. in Delaware Co. Pa., Union, Madison, and Pickaway Cos Ohio.

Danville, p.t. Cumberland Co. Me. Pop. 1,128. Also a p.t. in Caledonia Co. Vt. Pop. 3,631. Also a p.t. in Columbia Co. Pa. Also villages in Pittsylvania Co. Va., Mercer Co. Ken., Knox Co. Ohio and Hendricks Co. Indiana.

Darabgherd, a town of Persia, in Farsistan, said to have been founded by Darius. It is large but not populous; and surrounded by luxuriant groves of orange and lemon trees. Near it salt is found of various colours, white, black, red and green. A considerable manufacture of glass is carried on here. It stands 140 m. E. S. E. of Shiraz, on the road to Ormus. Long. 54. 56. E., lat. 28. 56. N.

Darak, or Drass, a country of Barbary, bounded on the north by Sus, east by Tafilet, south by Zahara, and west by the Atlantic. A river of the same name flows through it, which enters the Atlantic on the south side of Cape Non. The principal produce is indigo and dates. The inhabitants are Arabs and Mahometans; and some of the districts are dependant on Morocco.

Daraporem, a town of Hindoostan, capital of the south part of Coimbatore. It has a large mud fort, and straight and wide streets. Much cotton and tobacco are cultivated in the vicinity, and the garden and rice grounds are considerable. It is seated at about an equal distance from the Malabar and Coromandel Coasts; 42 miles E. S. E. of Coimbatore, and 106 W. of Tanjore. Long. 77. 40. E., lat. 10. 47. N.

Danville, p.t. Steuben Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,728.

Darda, a town and fort of Lower Hungary built by the Turks in 1686, and taken by the Austrians the next year. It is seated near the Drave, at the end of the bridge of Esseck, 8 m. S. of Barrany.

Dardanelles, two castles of Turkey, the one called Sestos, seated in Rumelia, the other called Abydos, in Natolia. They command the south-west entrance of the strait of Gallipoli, leading from the Grecian Archipelago, into the sea of Marmora, which separates Europe from Asia.

Dardenne, p.t. Charles Co. Missouri.

Darfoor, a kingdom of North Africa, on the borders of Nubia and Negroland, governed by a chief who calls himself sultan, and assumes the most extravagant titles. The wild animals are the lion, leopard, hyæna, wolf and buffalo. The domestic animals are camels, goats, sheep and horned cattle. Considerable quantities of grain of different sorts are raised, and after the tropical rains the fertility is sudden and great. The people are very barbarous; consisting of native tribes, of a deep black complexion, and woolly hair, though with features different from those of the Negroes, and of Arabs of various tribes. Polygamy is not only established, but the intercourse of the sexes is totally destitute of decency. The most severe labours of the field are left to the women; and the houses, which are of clay covered with thin boards, are chiefly built by them. Salt is the general medium of commerce here, as gold dust is in other parts of Africa. Caravans travel between this country and Egypt. Cobbe is the capital, in the lat. of 13. 40. N., and 28. 30. of E. long.

Darien, Gulf of, at the north-west extremity of the territory of Colombia, opening into the Carribean Sea. It runs inland about 80 miles, and is from 20 to 30 miles wide; under the domination of Spain, in South America, this gulf gave name to a province on the east side in the vice-royalty of New Granada, now comprised in the Colombian province of the Ysthmo, or Isthmus. On the west shore of the gulf, at the mouth of the river Atrato, are the remains of a town founded by a company of Scotch adventurers in 1699, and although the most favourable spot in all South America, on the Atlantic side, for opening a water communication with the Pacific (see Choco) the project for forming a permanent establishment completely failed. It has been usual to confound the narrowest part of the chain of territory which unites the two grand divisions of the western hemisphere under the name of the Isthmus of Darien, but this is 200 m. west of the Gulf of Darien; and the isthmus more properly comes under the head of Panama (which see) and between the province of Darien and Panama lies the province of Terra-Firma, which, as well as South America, see also.

Darien, p.t. Fairfield Co. Conn. Pop. 1,201.

Darien, a town of the state of Georgia, in Liberty County, seated on the Alatomaha, not far from its mouth, and 47 m. S. S. W. of Savannah. Long. 81. 14. W., lat. 31. 23. N.

Darke, a frontier county of the state of Ohio, bordering on Indiana. It is about 33 miles from north to south, and 22 wide. Chief town, Greenville. Pop. 6,203.

Darlaston, a parish of Staffordshire, England, contiguous to the great coal district of Wednesbury (which see). Pop. in 1821, 5,585.

Darlington, a town in the county of Durham, Eng. Here are manufactures of huckabacks, camlets, small wares of the Manchester kind, and leather; also a curious water machine for grinding optical glasses, the invention of a native, and another for spinning linen yarn. It is seated on the Skerne, 19 miles south of Durham, and 241 N. by W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 6,551.

Darlington, a district of S. Carolina; the seat of justice has the same name, and stands a little to the west of the Great Pedee River.

Darmstadt, the capital and seat of government of the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, in the circle of the Upper Rhine. It is seated on the banks of the river Darm, contains several public buildings, and a population of about 13,000. It is about 18 miles south of Frankfurt on the Maine, and the same distance S. E. of Mentz.

Darnestown, p.v. Montgomery Co. Maryland.

Darney, a town of France in the department of Vosges, 21 m. W. S. W. of Epinal.

Daroça, a town of Spain in Arragon, with seven parish churches one of which is collegiate. It stands between two hills, on the Xiloca, 57 m. S. S. W. of Saragossa.

Darroway, a town of Hindoostan, in the county of Tatta, at the mouth of a river of the same name, a branch of the Indus, 75 m. W. S. W. of Tatta. Long. 67. 31. E. lat. 24. 32. N.

Dart, a river in Devonshire, Eng. which rises at the foot of Dartmoor hills, crosses Dartmoor to Ashburton and Totness, where it is navigable for small vessels, and enters the English Channel at Dartmouth.

Dartford, a town of Kent, Eng. seated on the river Darent. Here was a celebrated nunnery, which Henry the Eighth converted into a royal palace, and is now become a gentleman's seat. The first paper mill in England was erected here by Sir John Spilman, to whom king Charles I. granted a patent with 200l. a year, to encourage the manufacture. On this river was also the first mill for slitting iron bars to make wire. Dartford is distinguished in English history as the place where, in 1391, the insolence of a taxgatherer to the daughter of Wat Tyler provoked the father's resentment to such a degree, as led to his exciting 100,000 men to arms, who threatened the subversion of the government of Richard II. Tyler was killed by the treachery of the lord-mayor of London. It is 15 m. E. S. E. of London, on the great road to Dover. Pop. in 1821, 3,595, being 1,190 more than in 1801.

Dartmouth, a borough and sea-port in Devonshire, Eng. It stands on the side of a craggy hill, by the river Dart, near its entrance into the sea, and has a spacious bay, defended by a castle and strong battery. The dock yards and quay project into the river, and the rocks on each side are composed of a purple coloured slate. The town contains three churches, and has a considerable trade to the south of Europe and to Newfoundland, as well as a share in the coasting traffic. It was burnt in the reigns of Richard I. and Henry IV. by the French; but they were repulsed in a third attempt afterwards, chiefly by the valour of the women, who fought so bravely, that after a great slaughter, they took M. Castel, the French general, three lords, and twenty-three knights, prisoners. It is 31 miles south of Exeter, 204 W. S. W. of London, and returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1831, 4,485.

Dartmouth College. See Hanover, N. H.

Dartmouth, a sea-port in Massachusetts, in Bristol county, adjoining New Bedford. Pop. 3,867, 62 m. S. of Boston. Long. 70. 52. W., lat 41. 37. N.

Dartson, p.v. Butler Co. Ohio.

Dartear, a fortress of Hindoostan, in the country of Sanore, taken from Tippon by the British in 1791, and afterward restored to the Mahrattas. It is 45 m. W. N. W. of Sanore, and 90 E. of Goa.

Darwen, Upper and Lower, two townships in the parish of, and contiguous to, Blackburn, Lancashire. Pop. in 1821, 8,949. See Blackburn.

Dartmoor, an extensive forest in Devonshire, Eng. bounded on the north by bleak hills comprising about 80,000 acres, and is watered by the river Dart. Many sheep are bred here, but of a small kind, and black cattle, which thrive well on the coarse herbage.

Dassel, a town in Germany, in the principality of South Calenburg, 48 m. S. by W. of Hanover.

Dauphin, a county in the E. District of Pennsylvania, bounded on the west for about 40 miles by the Susquehanna River, being about 20 miles in mean breadth. The Blue Mountain Ridge intersects this county from W. to N. by E. Pop. 25,303. Harrisburg is the chief town, and seat of government of the state.

Dauphiny, a late province of France, extending 40 leagues from north to south, and 36 from east to west; bounded on the west by the Rhone, north by the Rhone and Savoy, south by Provence, and east by the Alps. The heir apparent of the kings of France derive the title of dauphin from this province. Two-thirds of Dauphiny are intersected by mountains, which afford good pasturage; plenty of timber, fir-trees in particular, for the building of ships: and very scarce simples. In these mountains, which are branches of the Alps, are bears, chamois, marmots, eagles, hawks, &c. and mines of iron, copper, and lead. The valleys afford wheat, and the hills in the vicinity of the Rhone, excellent wines, olives and silks. The principal rivers are the Rhone, Durance, Isere, and Drome. It now forms the departments of Drome, Isere, and Upper Alps (each of which see.)

Davenport, p.t. Delaware Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,780.

Deventry, a town in Northamptonshire, Eng. with a manufacture of whips. It stands on the Roman highway called Watling-street, on the side of a hill, 16 miles west of Northampton, and 72 N. W. of London, on the mail-coach road to Birmingham and Liverpool. It is distinguished for its cheese fairs, in April and October. Pop. in 1821, 3,326.

David, St. a town of South Wales, in Pembrokeshire. It was formerly an archbishop's see, and in king Arthur's days the metropolitan of the British church, and continued so till king Henry I. at which time Bernard, who was the forty-seventh archbishop of St. David's, became suffragan to the see of Canterbury. The situation of the town being very unhealthy, and the soil of the adjacent country very barren, it has nothing now to boast of but its cathedral, which is 300 feet long, and about 127 high, and supposed to be the highest in Britain; though the east end is in ruins, the western part and choir are in good repair. St. David's is at present a bishop's see, yet only a single street of miserable cottages. It is seated on the Ilcen, near the coast, 24 miles N. W. of Pembroke, and 255 west by north of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,816.

David, St. a village of Scotland, in the parish of Dalgety, Fifeshire, with a harbour in Inverkeithing bay. It has a considerable manufacture of salt, and exports an immense quantity of coal.

David, Fort St. an English fort on the coast of Coromandel, which was taken and destroyed by the French in 1758, and has not yet been rebuilt. It is 80 miles south of Fort St. George.

Davidson, a county of West Tennessee, about 20 miles square. It is intersected from east to west by Cumberland River. Pop. 22,523. Nashville, on the south bank of the river, is the chief town.

Davidsonville, p.t. Lawrence Co. Arkansas, on Current River.

Davidstown, village, Huntindon Co. N. J.

Davies, an interior county of the state of Indiana, 25 m. from south to north, and 15 wide, intersected by White River, which falls into the Wabash. Pop. 4,512. Washington is the chief town.

Davies, another county in the western part of Kentucky, bounded on the south and west by Green River, and on the north by the Ohio, which separates this county from the state of Indiana. Owenboro', on the south bank of the Ohio, is the chief town. Another town called Vienna, is seated on the north bank of Green River. The extent of this county is about 25 miles each way. Pop. 5,218.

Davis's Straits, an arm of the sea between Greenland and North America, discovered by captain Davis in 1585, when he attempted to find a north-west passage. This sea comprises a space between the lat. of 58. and 68. N., and from 50. to 70. of W. long., to which from fifty to sixty sail of ships are annually fitted out from England to fish for whales.

Davisburg, v. Christian Co. Ken.

Dayton, p.v. Montgomery Co. Ohio, on the Great Miami river.

Davos, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Grisons, capital of a district in which are mines of copper, lead, and silver. It is 14 miles east of Coire.

Dawley, Great and Little, two villages contiguous to Shiffnal in Shropshire, Eng. abounding in coal and iron; the working of which gives employment to from 2,000 to 3,000 persons. Total population in 1821, 5,147.

Dawlish, a village pleasantly situated near Teignmouth, on the shore of the English Channel, in Devonshire. It is a good deal frequented in the summer season for sea bathing. Pop. in 1821, 2,709.

Dax, or Dacs, a town in France in the department of Landes, and lately a bishop's see. Here are some famous hot baths, the spring of which discharges thirty-six cubic feet of water in a minute. It is surrounded by walls, flanked with towers, and seated on the Adour, 24 m. N. E. of Bayonne. It is the seat of a prefect, and in 1826 contained 4,849 inhabitants.

Dead, r. Coos Co. N. H. falls into the Margalloway.

Dead Sea, a lake or inland sea of Palestine into which the river Jordan runs. It is sixty miles long and fifteen broad, enclosed on the east and west by high mountains. There is no verdure on its banks, or fish in its waters owing to the extrema saltiness and other qualities of its water. Mines of fossil salt are found in the sides of the mountains, which supply the neighbouring Arabs, and the city of Jerusalem; also fragments of sulphur and bitumen, which the Arabs convert into trifling articles of commerce. This lake, called also Lake Asphaltites, and by the Turks and Arabs Almotana, has no outlet; and it has been demonstrated, that evaporation is more than sufficient to carry off the water brought in by the rivers. It was on the site of this lake that Sodom and Gomorrah, and three other cities were situated, which were destroyed by a miraculous conflagration about 1,900 years antecedent to the Christian era.

Deadman's Head, a cape on the south coast of England, in Cornwall, between St. Mawes and Fowey.

Deal, a town in Kent, Eng. It is seated between the North and South Foreland, and is a member of the cinque port of Sandwich, governed by a mayor. It has no harbour, but the sea between the shore and the Godwin Sands, called the Downs, is generally a secure road for ships, where they usually ride at their leaving or entering the river Thames. The port is defended by two castles, Deal or Walmer Castle to the south, and Sandown Castle to the north; and also by several batteries. The mariners of Deal are considered most intrepid seamen, but there being no port regulations, strangers embarking or disembarking in the Downs, are exposed to the most wanton and unjustifiable impositions, whilst the inducements to smuggling, which the unparalleled rates of taxation in England excite among the inhabitants of this part of the coast, on account of its proximity to the continent, makes the seamen as desperate and vicious as they are crafty and imposing. The town of Deal is 9 m. N. of Dover, and 74 E. by S. of London. Pop. in 1821, 6,811.

Dean, a celebrated forest in Gloucestershire, Eng. which originally included all that part of the county which lies between the Severn and the shires of Monmouth and Hereford, and contained four market towns and twenty-three parishes. It is fertile in pasture and tillage, bears very fine oaks, and has rich mines of iron and coal. It was once reckoned the chief support of the English navy; but having been much thinned by frequency of felling, and narrowed by increase of cultivation, it was near losing all features of its former character, until within the present century, when a still extensive tract, containing a population exceeding 5,500, has been replanted and replenished with deer, and divided into six walks, extra parochial, over which proper rangers have been appointed. There is a village without the boundary of the present forest, one mile north of Newnham, called Little Dean, containing, in 1821, 807 inhabitants; and contiguous is Mitchel Dean, at which a market was formerly held on Mondays. Pop. in 1821, 556.

There are ten other villages in different parts of England named Dean, all inconsiderable.

Dearborn, a frontier county at the south-east extremity of the state of Indiana. Lawrenceburg, the principal town, is seated on a point of land formed by the junction of the Miami with the Ohio River. The county is about 30 m. from south to north, and 15 in mean breadth. The N. E. part borders on the state of Ohio, and the S. E. on that of Kentucky. Pop. 14,578. Lawrenceburg is the chief town.

Dearborn, p.t. Kennebec Co. Me. Pop. 816.

Debalpoor, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a district in the country of Moultan. It is situated on the great road from Delhi to Moultan, near the river Setlege, 80 miles south of Lahore, and 170 east by north of Moultan. Long. 73. 32. E., lat. 30. 5. N.

Deben, a river in Suffolk, Eng. which rises near Debenham, and flows to Woodbridge, where it expands into a long narrow arm of the German Ocean, a little to the north of Harwich.

Debenham, a town in Suffolk, Eng. seated on the side of a hill, near the source of the Deben 24 m. east of Bury St. Edmunds, and 83 N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,535.

Debretzin, a town of Upper Hungary, capital of a district of the same name, and one of the most populous and important trading towns in all Hungary. It was taken by the Turks in 1684, and the Austrians retook it the same year. It is 107 m. E. of Buda. Long. 21. 38. E., lat. 47. 34. N.

Decatur, p.t. Otsego Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,110. Also towns in Mifflin Co. Pa., Morgan Co. Alab., Adams and Brown Cos. Ohio.

Deccan, an extensive tract in Hindoostan, which from the signification of its name, the South, has been supposed to include the whole region south of Hindoostan Proper. But, in its more accepted sense, it contains only the countries situated between Hindoostan Proper, and what is termed the Peninsula; namely, the provinces of Candéish, Dowlatabad, Visiapour, the north part of Golconda, Berar, Orissa, and the Circars. It is bounded on the north by the river Nerbudda, by Bengal, and by Bahar; and the river Kistna forms its separation on the south from what is called the peninsula of Hindoostan. All this vast country was once the southern province of the Moguls, who did not pass the Kistna till a recent period. Candéish, Visiapour, and a part of Dowlatabad, Berar, and Orissa are subject to the Mahrattas. The English have part of Orissa and of the Circars. The dominions of the Nizam of the Deccan comprising Golconda, the principal part of Dowlatabad, and the western part of Berar. His territories are bounded on the north-west by the Peonah Mahrattas, north by the Berar Mahrattas, east by the Circars, and south by the Carnatic and Mysore. By a family succession in 1780 the Nizam became possessed of the districts of Adoni and Tachore, and of the Gunto or Circar; and by the peace of 1792 and partition of 1799 he had a share of the countries belonging to Tippoo Sultan, including Kopaul, Cuddapa, Gangechoa, Gooty, and Gurrunconda. His dominions (without including the cessions) are supposed to be 430 miles from N. W. to S. E. by 300 wide. The capital is Hydrabad.

Decize, a town of France, in the department of Nievre, seated on an island, at the conflux of the Airon with the Loire, 16 miles S. E. of Nevers.

Deckendorf, a town of Lower Bavaria, seated on the Danube, 27 miles N. W. of Passau.

Deckerstown, p.v. Sussex Co. N. J.

Deddington, a town in Oxfordshire, Eng. 16 m. north of Oxford, and 69 W. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,847.

Dedham, a town in Essex, Eng. with a manufacture of baize. It has an ancient large church, with a curious steeple, and a free grammar-school endowed by queen Elizabeth. It is seated on the Stour, 8 m. N. E. of Colchester, and 58 N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,651.

Dedham, a town of Massachusetts chief of Norfolk county, seated on Charles river, 11 m. S. W. of Boston. Pop. 3,117.

Dee, a river of Wales, held in great veneration by the ancient Britons, and the theme of many a poet since. It issues from the lake of Bala, in Merionethshire, whence it flows through a fine vale across the south part of Denbighshire to the north-west part of Shropshire, visits the west border of Cheshire, passes on to Chester, and flows thence to the Irish sea, making a broad estuary, which separates Cheshire from Flintshire. The Dee is navigable from near Ellesmere, in Shropshire, to Chester, where the continuity of the navigable is broken by a ledge of rocks, running across the river; but by embankments made here, much land has been gained from the tide; and a narrow channel, fitter for navigation, has been formed from Chester half way to the sea. See Chester.

Dee, a river of Scotland, which rises on the west border of Aberdeenshire, amid the mountains of Mar Forest, and flows east through a wild country till it reaches the fertile vale of Braemar, whence it proceeds to Aberdeen, below which it enters the German ocean.

Dee, a river of Scotland, which rises in the west part of Kirkcudbrightshire, receives the Ken below New Galloway, and runs into the Irish sea, five miles below Kirkcudbright.

Deeping, or Market Deeping, a town in Lincolnshire, Eng. seated on the banks of the river Welland, in a fenny country, six miles east of Stamford, and 90 N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,016.

Deeping, St. James's, contiguous, contains about the same number of inhabitants.

Deer, a village of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, on a river of its name, 10 miles west of Peterhead. It has a trade in fine yarn, and near it are the remains of the abbey of Deer.

Deer Creek, a township of Madison Co. Ohio.

Deerfield, p.t. Rockingham Co. N. H. 55 m. N. W. Portsmouth. Pop. 2,086.

Deerfield, a town of Massachusetts, in Hampshire county, seated on the Connecticut, near the influx of the river Deerfield, 15 m. N. of Northampton, and 80 W. by N. of Boston. Pop. 2,003.

Deerfield, p.t. Oneida Co. N. Y. on the Mohawk, opposite Utica. Pop. 4,182. Also a p.t. in Cumberland Co. N. Y., 4 townships in Ohio, and a village in Augusta Co. Va.

Deerhurst, a village in Gloucestershire, Eng. three miles south of Tewkesbury, subject to frequent inundations from the Severn. Here was a celebrated monastery, which was afterwards made a cell to Tewkesbury abbey.

Deer Island, in Penobscot Bay, state of Maine, containing 2,217 inhabitants.

Delhi, commonly mis-spelt Delhi, a province of Hindoostan, bounded on the N. W. by Lahore, N. E. by Serinagur, east by the Rohilla country, south by Agra, and west by Moultan. Having been the seat of continual wars above sixty years, previous to 1806, when it fell under the influence of the English, it had become almost depopulated; and a tract of country that possessed every advantage that could be derived from nature, contained the most miserable of inhabitants. It is now all that remains to the Great Mogul of his once extensive empire, but since his alliance with the English, the country has been progressively improving.

Delhi, the capital of the province of the same name. It is the nominal capital of all Hindootan, and was actually so during the greatest part of the time since the Mahometan conquest in 1193. In 1738, when Nadir Shah invaded Hindoostan, he entered Delhi, and dreadful were the massacres and famine that followed: 100,000 of the inhabitants perished by the sword; and plunder to the amount of 62,000,000*l.* sterling was said to be collected. The same calamities were endured in 1761, on the invasion of Abdalla, king of Candahar. In 1803 the Mahrattas, aided by the French, got possession of this place; but they were afterwards defeated here by Gen. Lake, and the aged Shah Aulum, emperor of Hindoostan, was restored to his throne. Delhi may be said to be now in ruins; but there are many splendid remains of palaces with baths of marble. The grand mosque is a magnificent edifice of marble and red freestone, with high minarets, and domes richly gilt. At Cuttab Minor, 15 m. S. W. of the city, is a noble monument, 242 feet high, built by the Khan Cuttabaddeen in 1194, to commemorate his conquest of Delhi, which is seated on the west bank of the Jumna, 350 miles N. W. of Allahabad, and 1,500 N. W. of Calcutta Long. 77. 40. E., lat. 28. 27. N.

Deizabad, a town of Persia, in Irac Agemi, 90 m. N. of Ispahan.

Delagoa, a bay on the east coast of South Africa, at the north end of the country of Natal. The adjacent country abounds in cattle and poultry, which may be purchased for a trifle; and it is frequently visited by vessels employed in the whale fishery. Long. 32. 0. E., lat. 26. 0. S.

Delaware, a town of Virginia, in King William County, seated on the broad peninsula formed by the confluence of the Pamunky and Mataponi, whose united streams hence assume the name of York River. It is 20 m. N. by W. of Williamsburg, and 45 W. of Richmond.

Delaware, a river of the United States, formed of two streams in the state of New York, in the lat. of 42. 30. N. In its course south, it separates, for about fifty miles, the north-east part of Pennsylvania from New York, and afterwards for about 100 miles in a direction nearly due south, it separates Pennsylvania from New Jersey, and a few miles below Philadelphia, the state of Delaware from New Jersey, till it enters the head of Delaware bay, at Bombay bar, in the lat. of 39. 15. N. where it is about five miles wide. At Philadelphia, it has sufficient depth of water for a 74 gun ship; is navigable thence for sloops up to the falls of Trenton, a distance of about thirty miles, and for boats that carry eight or ten tons, forty miles higher.

Delaware Bay, into which the preceding river falls, is formed by Cape Henlopen on the south, and on which is a light-house, in the lat. of 38. 45., and Cape May on the north, in the lat. of 39. N.; the two capes being about 18 m. distant, narrowing to about 10 m. at Bombay bar which is considered as forming the entrance to the river. The bay, and its entrance is interspersed with numerous shoals, the ship channel being on the side of Cape Henlopen, and about midway between Bombay Hook and Philadelphia is a small island called Pea Patch, on which are two strong forts. Just within Cape Henlopen, at the mouth of the bay, there is now constructing a breakwater of solid rock, and a dike farther inward, which form an artificial harbour with 5 or 6 fathoms of water.

Delaware, one of the United States, bounded N. by Pennsylvania; E. by Delaware Bay and river; S. and W. by Maryland, extending from 38. 29. to 39. 47. N. lat. and from 74. 56. to 75. 40. W. long. 93 miles in length; and 23 in its greatest breadth; containing 2,120 sq. miles. Pop. 76,739, of whom 3,305 are slaves.

This state is almost wholly an alluvial level; the northern extremity is hilly. In the south the soil is sandy and unproductive, but toward the north it is excellent and produces the finest wheat in the United States. This article is the staple commodity of the state, and the flour mills of Brandywine, near Wilmington, are among the largest in the country. The soil also produces maize, flax, buck-wheat, potatoes, &c. and there are some excellent grazing lands. At the southern extremity of the state, is the Cypress Swamp, from which great quantities of timber are obtained for exportation. In the same quarter is found abundance of bog iron ore.

There is no large river in the state, nor any good harbour upon the bay, although this latter defect will in some measure be remedied by the breakwater above mentioned. The Chesapeake and Delaware canal (which see) crosses the northern part of the state and will materially assist the trade of the country. The chief pursuits are agricultural. The commerce consists in the export of flour. The shipping in 1823, amounted to 13,213 tons. The manufactures of the state are considerable. They are chiefly at Wilmington, and consist of cotton, woolen, paper, gunpowder, snuff, &c.

Delaware is divided into 3 counties, Newcastle in the north, Kent in the middle, and Sussex in the south. The legislature is called the General Assembly, and consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. The Governor is chosen for 3 years. All elections are popular and suffrage is universal. Dover is the capital. The other chief towns are Wilmington and Newcastle.

The Methodists have 15 ministers; the Presbyterians 10; the Baptists 9, and the Episcopalians 6. There is no college in Delaware, but common schools are established by law; and the School Fund of the state yields an annual income of 9,226 dollars. Also the proceeds of 25,000 dollars invested in the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal are devoted to purposes connected with education.

This state was first settled by the Swedes, and afterwards formed a part of the colony of Pennsylvania. The present constitution was framed in 1792.

Delaware is also the name of four counties in the different states of North America, as follows:—

1. In the state of New York, bordering on Pennsylvania, in which is the Susquehanna, as well as the Delaware rivers, both have their source. It is a somewhat mountainous district, but its fertility and local advantages may be inferred from its increase of population, which in 1800 was 10,223, and in 1830, 32,933. Delhi is the chief town.

2. In E. Pennsylvania, bounded on the south by the state and east by the river Delaware, and north by the county of the city of Philadelphia. It is the smallest county in the state. Pop. 17,361. Chester, 15 m. S. W. of Philadelphia, is the chief town.

3. In the centre of the state of Ohio, intersected by the Scioto river, and Walnut, Alum, and Whetstone creeks. It is a square of about 28 miles each way. The pop. which in 1810, was only 2,000, in 1830 had increased to 11,523. The chief town of the same name is seated between the main branch of the Scioto and Whetstone creek, twenty-five miles north of Columbus.

4. In the eastern part of Indiana. Pop. 2,372. Muncytown is the capital.

Delaware, city, Newcastle Co. Del. This place has just been laid out, and is situated on the Delaware at the entrance of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Delaware, is also the name of 4 townships and villages in Pa., Va. and Ohio.

Delft, a town of South Holland, well built, with canals in the streets, planted on each side with trees. Here are two churches, in one of which is the tomb of William I. prince of Orange, who was assassinated. It has a fine arsenal, and a considerable manufacture of earthenware. Delft is the birth-place of the renowned Grotius. It is seated about midway between Rotterdam and the Hague.

Delfshaven, a fortified town of South Holland on the north side of the Maese, with a canal to Delft. It is between Rotterdam and Schiedam about three miles from each.

Delfzijl, a town and fortress of Holland, in Groningen, with a good harbour. It is seated on the Demster, at its entrance into the mouth of the Ems, 12 miles west by south of Emden. Long. 6. 58. E., lat 58. 18.

Delhi, the chief town of Delaware County, in the state of New York, seated on the north bank of the Mohawk branch of the Delaware River, 40 m W. S. W. of Albany. Pop. 2,114. See also Delhi.

Delitz, a town and castle of Upper Saxony, in Misnia. Great quantities of worsted stockings are made here. It is 15 miles north by east of Leipzig.

Dellamcottie, a fortress of the country of Bootan, which commands the principal pass over the mountains. It was taken by storm in 1773, by a detachment under the command of captain John Jones. It is 55 m. S. S. W. of Tassadon, and 200 N. of Moorsheadabad. Long. 88. 46. E. lat. 27. 2. N.

Delmenhorst, a town of Westphalia, capital of a district in the duchy of Oldenburg; seated on the Delm, near the Weser, 8 m. S. W. of Bremen.

Delos, or Delj, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, formerly celebrated for the temples of Diana and Apollo, whose birth-place it is said to be. It is 6 miles in circumference, but now little more than a desert rock, covered with ruins, and uninhabited. Long. 25. 12. E. lat. 37. 38. N.

Delphi, or Delphos, a town of Independent

Greece, in Livadia, once famous for the oracle of Apollo, which people came from all parts to consult. It is seated in a valley near Mount Parnassus, 18 m. W. S. W. of Livadia and now called Castria.

Delphi, p.v. Onondaga Co. N. Y., also a p.t. in Marian Co. Ten.

Del Rey, a tract of country on the coast of Brazil, about 100 miles wide, and 800 from north to south, between the mountains of Paraguay and the Atlantic ocean. At its south extremity are two lakes, called de los Petos and Mini, each about 160 miles long, and from 10 to 50 broad, with a fort at each end. The principal place on this extensive coast is the island of St. Catherine, in the lat. of 27. 30. S. This coast is now principally included in the province of Rio Grande.

Delisbury, a town of Switzerland in the late bishopric of Basil, on the river Birs, 10 m. N. W. of Soleure.

Delta, a part of Lower Egypt, inclosed between the mouth of the Nile and the Mediterranean; so called, it is supposed by some, from its triangular form resembling the Greek letter of that name, and by others, as implying a maritime and swampy district; hence, the term Delta is now generally applied to the mouths of all great rivers having diverging branches, such as the Indus, Ganges, Mississippi, &c.

Delvino, a town of Lower Albania, seated about 15 miles from the coast of the Adriatic, opposite Corfu. It is the residence of a pacha, and is populous.

Dembea, an interior province of Abyssinia, of which Emfras is the capital, in the lat. of 12. N. and 37. 30. E. long. In the centre of the province is a lake, supposed to be 450 m. in circumference, and contains many islands, one of which is a place of confinement for state prisoners. Its waters appear to form one of the principal sources of the Nile; but this part of Africa is at present very little known.

Demerara, a river and plantation of South America. The entrance to the river is in the lat. of 6. 48. N. and 58. 2. of W. long. It is navigable for about 100 m. inland, and at its entrance forms a very commodious harbour, impeded however by a bar, not admitting vessels drawing more than 18 feet of water. The plantations lie on both banks of the river. They were originally formed by the Dutch, but fell into the hands of the English in 1796; restored at the peace of Amiens in 1802; retaken on the renewal of the war in the following year, and confirmed to England at the general peace in 1814; since which the cultivation has been greatly extended, and next to Jamaica, is now the most populous and productive of all the British colonies in the West Indies and South America.

Demianskoi, a town of Siberia, in the government of Tobolsk, seated on the Irtysh, at the influx of the Demianha, 100 m. N. N. E. of Tobolsk.

Demmin, a fortified town of Anterior Pomerania, seated on the banks of the Ribnitz, 27 m. S. of Stralsund. Pop. about 3,000.

Demona, a town and fort of Piedmont, on the river Stura, 10 m. S. W. of Coni.

Demona Val. See Dimona.

Demotica, or Domotica, a town of European Turkey, in Romania, where a Greek archbishop resides. It was the residence of Charles XII. for some years; and is situate near the Marisca, 12 m. S. of Adrianople.

Denain, a village of France, in the department of Nord, where a victory was gained over prince Eugene, by Marshal Villars in 1712. It is seated on the Scheldt, 6 m. S. W. of Valenciennes.

Denbigh, a borough of North Wales, capital of Denbighshire. Its ruined castle, with its vast inclosure crowning the top of the hill, forms a striking object. Denbigh has a considerable manufacture of gloves and shoes. It is situate on the side of a rocky hill, above the vale of Clywd, on a branch of the river of that name, 27 miles west of Chester, 5 S. of St. Asaph, and 218 N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 3,195. It returns one member to parliament.

Denbighshire, a county of North Wales bounded on the north by the Irish sea, north-east by Flintshire, east by Cheshire, south by Salop, Merioneth and Montgomeryshires, and west by the river Conway, which separates it from Caernarvonshire. It is 48 miles long from south to west, and 20 in its broadest part, but its mean breadth does not exceed 14 miles. This county contains some picturesque and beautiful scenery, besides the the Conway, the Clywd and Elwy also fall into the Irish sea, whilst the Dee, running in a meandering course from east to west, intersects all the south part of the county; and the vale of Clywd, for 20 miles in extent, is deservedly celebrated for its fertility as well as for its picturesque beauty. Its surplus product consists principally of cattle and butter, a partial supply of grain, some wool, &c. &c. by which the rent-tax, state and local exactions are discharged. It contains veins of both coal and lead, but the mines are very partially worked. Besides the borough of Denbigh, the other principal towns are Wrexham, Ruthin, Abergely, and Llangollen.

Dender, a river of the Netherlands, which rises in Hainault, flows by Leuze, Ath, Lessines, Grammont, Ninove, and Alost, and joins the Scheldt at Dendermond.

Dendera, a town of Egypt, the residence of an Arabian prince who takes the title of Emir. It was anciently called Tentyra, and from the ruins that are seen appears to have been a large city. This place supplies most part of Egypt with charcoal. It is seated near the west bank of the Nile, 260 miles S. by E. of Cairo. Long. 31. 58. E., lat. 26. 15. N.

Dendermond, a fortified town of the Netherlands, in Flanders, with a strong citadel. It was taken by the allies in 1706, and the Dutch put a garrison into it as one of the barrier towns. The French took it in 1745, and again in 1794. It is surrounded by marshes and fine meadows which can be covered with water, and seated at the conflux of the Dender with the Scheldt, 16 miles E. of Ghent. Pop. about 6,000. Its name is rendered immortal by Sterne in his tale of Lefevre.

Denia, a seaport of Spain, in Valencia. The entrance into the harbour is difficult, and the chief trade is in almonds and raisins. It stands at the foot of a mountain, 47 miles N. E. of Alicante. Long. 0. 2. E., lat. 38. 50. N.

Denis, St., or St. Denys, a town of France, in the department of Paris. The abbey of the Benedictines, to which the town owes its rise, has the appearance of a palace. Here is an ancient and magnificent church, in which were the tombs of many of the French kings, and in the treasury, among other curiosities, the sword of St. Louis and the Maid of Orleans, and the sceptre of Charlemagne. In 1793, after the abolition of royalty, the royal tombs in the church were all de stroyed; and the name of the town was changed to that of Francade; but, at the re-establishment of the monarchy and Catholic mummery, St Denis resumed its former celebrity. It is the seat of a prefect, and seated on the river Crould, near the Seine, five miles N. of Paris. Pop. in 1825, 5,569.

Denmark, a kingdom of the north of Europe, lying between the lat. of 53. 34. and 57. 43. N., partly continental and partly insular. The continental part comprises North and South Jutland and Holstein Lauenburg; and the insular part, the islands of Zealand, Funen, Laaland, Falster, Bornholm, Femern, &c., all lying between the east coast of Jutland and Sweden; and in the Atlantic Ocean, in the lat. of 62., are the Ferro Isles; and in the lat. of from 64. to 66. Iceland, and several other islands lying off the west coast of Jutland, all forming a part of the European dominions of the kingdom of Denmark, comprising together an area of about 22,000 square miles of surface. In addition to these the islands of St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. John, in the West Indies, are also subject to Denmark. See each part and island under its respective head. The aspect of the continental part of Denmark is flat and undiversified, containing neither mountains nor rivers of any magnitude. It is largely indented by the sea, and possesses numerous creeks and bays, as well as internal lakes. The only canal of importance is that of Kiel, which will admit vessels of 120 tons burden, and extends from the Baltic to the Eyder at Rendsburg, where the river becomes navigable, thus opening a communication between the two seas, through 106 miles of territory. It is 22 English miles in length, and ten feet deep; its breadth at the top is 100 feet, at bottom 54 feet. It was begun in 1777, and completed in 1785, at an expense of £800,000 sterling. During the last war, between 3,000 and 4,000 vessels annually passed through it, but in the time of peace the number is much smaller. The lands are in general in an excellent state of cultivation, and the pasturage is rich: the climate bears a great resemblance to that of Great Britain.

The Danish community, although its early history is involved in considerable obscurity, appears to have been of Scandinavian origin, and its monarchy ranks among the most ancient, perhaps the most so of any, in Europe, having been contemporary with the proudest epoch of the Roman empire. The advancement of the Danes in discipline and arms in the tenth century may be inferred from their irruption into England at that period, and their complete conquest of the country in the early part of the following century. It was not, however, till towards the close of the fourteenth century that Denmark appears to have obtained a respectable and commanding position in the great European compact, when Norway by inheritance, and Sweden by conquest and cession in 1397, became united with Denmark under queen Margaret, whose heroism obtained for her the appellation of the Semiramis of the North. When, in 1448, the royal race of Skjoldung became extinct, Christian of Oldenburg succeeded to the crown, by whom Holstein and Sleswick, the southern province of Jutland, also became annexed to the dominions of Denmark. Sweden however, reestablished her independence in 1523, which she has ever since maintained. The doctrines of Luther were early promulgated in Denmark. In 1522 the inhabitants embraced the confession of Augsburg, and in 1536 the bishops were deprived of their temporal power, and placed on a footing similar to those of England, with the exception of the Danish bishops having no legislative voice. Previously to 1660 Denmark was a limited and elective monarchy; in that year it was made absolute and hereditary, by a revolution almost unparalleled in history. The avarice and contentions of a rival aristocracy led to such oppressions of the people as induced them voluntarily to resign their liberties into the hands of their sovereign. The turbulent and martial spirit of Charles XII. of Sweden involved Denmark in a state of continual warfare during the first twenty years of the eighteenth century, which contention terminated in 1720. In this year a treaty of peace was concluded, that continued with but little interruption for about eighty years, during which period the inhabitants of Denmark directed much of their attention to external commerce. This they pursued with considerable success, purchasing from a company of French adventurers the island of St. Croix in the West Indies. They formed settlements in the East, at Tranquebar on the Coromandel coast, and at the Nicobar Isles; and a factory at Canton, in China; and at the close of the century the commercial navy of Denmark exceeded 250,000 tons, with a proportionate national marine for its protection.

The interruption of the external commerce of Holland and France, by the events of the war with England, commencing in 1793, promised for a time to make Denmark the emporium for all the external commerce of the north of Europe, which her local and advantageous maritime position at the entrance to the Baltic Sea, tended much to favour. But, unhappily for the Danes, Denmark became involved in the general contention of the time, and in 1801 a British armament frustrated their commercial career by the almost total destruction of their national marine. (See Copenhagen). The peace of Amiens, and the almost immediate renewal of war, tended to revive the hopes of Denmark for regaining her commercial importance, and great exertions were made to replenish and strengthen her national marine; but the spirit and circumstances of the times were such as to admit of no neutrality, and in 1807 another armament from England annihilated her commercial career and her power for resuming it. Her possessions both in the East and West all fell into the hands of the English in that year, and Norway was offered to Sweden as a boon to induce that power to join the confederacy against France, with which Denmark had coalesced. This proposal being assented to by Sweden, involved Denmark in the political necessity of endeavouring to resist the transfer; but, although the efforts made were not inconsiderable, they proved ineffectual. After the battle of Leipzig, however, in Oct. 1813, which changed the relations of all the states of Europe, it was endeavoured to reconcile Denmark to the transfer of Norway to Sweden, by proposing to cede to Denmark the Island of Rugen and Swedish Pomerania; but in the general partitioning which took place after the peace of Paris, in 1814, Norway was confirmed to Sweden; the island of Rugen and Pomerania to Prussia; whilst Denmark was confirmed in the possession of Holstein Lauenburg, and reinstated in her former possessions in the West Indies.

As sovereign of Holstein-Lauenburg, Denmark is a member of the Germanic confederation, her quota of troops being 3,600, occupying the 10th place in the diet, and having three votes.

Since the general peace, in 1815, Denmark has excited little or no interest in the considerations of the relations of Europe. Like most of the other states she has been occupied in attempting to repair her finances, so extensively deranged by the events of so protracted a state of warfare, and the speculative experiments to which it gave rise. In 1826 the national marine of Denmark consisted of three ships of the line, four frigates, and three brigs: her commercial navy has increased since the termination of the war, but not equal to its extent in 1800, when she possessed above 2,000 merchantmen, 20,000 seamen, and 250,000 tons of shipping. The nature and extent of her commerce and capabilities will be found more particularly elucidated under the heads of Holstein, Jutland, and Zealand. The manufactures of Denmark are very limited. The ancient literature of Denmark is rich in the elucidation of Scandinavian antiquities; and their traditions, whilst they vie with the Heathen Mythology in preposterousness, are exceedingly amusing for their quaintness. For the higher order of mental cultivation, at the present time, there is a university at Copenhagen on an extensive scale and under liberal regulations; another at Kiel in Holstein, and a college at Ovesee in the island of Funen. The manners and customs of the superior classes differ but little, whilst the manners of the people are more social and orderly than in most other parts of Europe. For some time after the adoption of the tenets of Luther, the penal statutes against dissenters were very severe, but the most complete toleration in reference to religious pretensions now prevails.

The Danes have regular and well-formed features; frequently fair or brownish hair, blue eyes, and a body capable of sustaining fatigue. The women are of a more delicate frame. Their complexion is dazzlingly white; but upon the whole their countenances are destitute of animation; and soon after twenty-five they begin to lose all their charms. The Dane is gallant and brave; a spirited sailor or soldier, but averse to enterprise. The dress of the Danes is generally copied from the French, and the French language is very general in Denmark. The population of the Danish dominions is about 2,000,000. This includes Iceland, the Ferro Islands, Greenland, and the settlements in Africa and the West Indies, which amount to 167,000.

Dentila, a country of Western Africa, situated to the W. of Konkodoo. It is famous for its iron, in preparing which the natives employ as a flux the ashes of the bark of the kino tree.

Denton, a town of Maryland, capital of Carolina county; seated on the E. side of Choptank River, 37 m. S. S. E. of Chester.

Dentrecasteaux's Channel, a strait on the S. E. coast of Van Diemen's Land, about 30 or 40 m. long.

Dentrecasteaux's Port, or Port North, a harbour near the S. extremity of Van Diemen's Land.

Deogarh, the Mansion of the Gods, a town in the province of Bahar, Hindoostan, 170 m. N. N. W. of Calcutta; the name is applied to several hill forts in different parts of India.

Deomalla, a town of the Mysore, supposed to have been the birth place of Hyder Ali, it surrendered to the English under Lord Cornwallis in 1791. It is 20 m. N. by E. of Bangalore.

Deptford, an appendage to London, situate in the county of Kent, on the S. bank of the Thames, the market place is 4 1-2 miles E. of London bridge. The town is intersected by a stream called the Ravensbourne, on the banks of which are some extensive flour-mills; a handsome bridge over the river near its entrance into the Thames, connects Deptford with Greenwich on the E. It contains the principal store house for victualling the national marine, and also several slips for building and repairing the largest ships of war. It has also two floating docks, a basin, and two ponds for masts, and extensive workshops for the manufacture of cables, anchors, and blocks. In the reign of Hen. VIII., a society was incorporated here under the title of the Master, Warden, and Assistants of the guild of the most glorious and undivided Trinity, which society was invested with the power of examining the masters of the king's ships, the appointment of all pilots, ballasting of all ships in the Port of London, and the erecting and maintaining light-houses, buoys, beacons, &c. in the river Thames, and within certain limits on the E. coast of England. The business of this society was transferred to an elegant edifice in the vicinity of the Tower in London, in 1788; but in 1665 a hospital with 56 apartments, and another in 1788, with 25 apartments, was endowed here for decayed Masters of Vessels and Pilots, and their widows, with very comfortable allowance. Deptford is divided into two parishes, St. Nicholas and St. Paul; the church of the latter, erected in 1730, is an elegant and spacious structure. With the exception of the importance which Deptford derives from its extensive government establishments, it is an uninviting part of the metropolis; and as such its population has not materially increased since 1801, when it amounted to 17,548, and to 19,862 in 1821.

Derbent, a district or khanship in the province of Daghestan, Persia, extending for about 20 m. along the W. shore of the Caspian sea, and 15 m. inland: the chief town of the same name, which implies a door locked, or an impassable place, is supposed to have been built by order of Alexander of Macedon, as the portal of Persia from the North. The town extends from the shore of the Caspian to the foot of a lofty mountain, and is surrounded by a strong wall, flanked with numerous towers, and with a well organized garrison might defy any assault. It surrendered to the Russians in 1722, when it was defended by 230 pieces of ordnance; the Russians held it till 1735, since when it has several times changed masters, and since 1806, has again been occupied by the Russians; the inhabitants of the district, however, acknowledge no sovereignty but their own will, and the town is now deemed but of little importance. It is inhabited by about 900 families, Persians, Tartars, and Armenians; the harbour is nearly choked up. It is in the lat. of 42. S. N. and 48. 10. of E. long.

Derbyford, p.t. Gloucester Co. N. J.

Derby, an interior county of England, extending about 56 miles from N. to S. and 20 in mean breadth, the greater part of its W. side is bounded by the river Dove, which divides it from Staffordshire; the N. W. corner is bounded by the county of Chester, and the N. by the county of York; and the counties of Nottingham and Leicester bound it on the E. and S. The noble river Trent and the Trent and Mersey canal intersect the S. end, whilst the Derwent falling into the Trent, intersects the heart of the county from N. to S. The N. W. part of the county is mountainous, several of the peaks rising to the height of upwards of 1,700 feet, and Holme Moss, the highest point, to 1,859 feet above the level of the sea; near the centre of the county is a rich vein of lead ore; it also contains several veins of iron; in the mountainous district of the N. W. corner of the county, are several extensive caverns, which attract numerous visitors, and produce a beautiful variety of spar and petrifications, which are extensively wrought into vases and other ornaments (see Peak.) It abounds also in numerous mineral springs, (see Buxton and Matlock) and parts of the county are esteemed as the most beautifully picturesque of any in the kingdom; the south part of the county is rich in pasture and yields a considerable surplus of cheese and cattle, and other agricultural produce. The county also contains several tan-yards, participates partially in the cotton, silk, and hosiery manufactures, and extensively in the manufacture of nails. Besides the Trent and Mersey canal, already mentioned, another canal extends from the S. extremity of the county into Warwickshire. Two others, the Derby and Erewash, intersect the S. E. part of the county; another extends from Chesterfield in the N. E. into Yorkshire, and another intersects the mountainous district of the N. W. running through Cheshire into Lancashire. The principal towns in Derbyshire, besides those previously mentioned, are Derby, the county town, Alfreton, Ashborne, Bakewell, Chapel-in-le-frith, Dronfield, Duffield, and Tideswell.

Derby, the chief town of the preceding county is situate on the W. bank of the river Derwent, about ten miles above its entrance into the Trent, 28 miles N. of Leicester, 15 W. of Nottingham, about 30 E. of Stafford, and 126 N. N. W. of London, on the mailcoach road to Manchester, from which it is distant 60 miles. Derby is a place of considerable antiquity, and was created a royal borough by Edward I. in 1305. It consists of five parishes. The church of All Saints is a stately and elegant structure, having a beautiful gothic tower 178 feet in height. About the year 1735 an extensive silk mill was erected here, the model of which was surreptitiously obtained from Italy; it was for many years the only establishment of the kind in England, and is still one of the most extensive; and in 1750, a porcelain manufacture was established which is now in high repute for the elegance of its productions. In 1803 a military depot was established here, suitable for the arming and equipment of 15,000 men; and in 1810 a county infirmary was erected on an extensive scale, and rendered very complete in all its interior arrangements. Besides the original silk mill, Derby has now 3 others, and 2 for spinning of cotton on a tolerably extensive scale, 4 paper mills, 5 tan yards, 14 malting houses, and 2 public breweries, 5 establishments for the manufacture of silk stuffs, and 6 for small wares of cotton, &c., 5 for the manufacture of hats, 11 for hosiery, 2 bleach grounds, 9 manufactures of shot, white lead, and painters colours, 3 soap houses, 5 foundries, 2 watch manufacturing establishments, and 7 for the working of spar and petrifications into chimney ornaments, with some of almost every other occupation attendant on an active and social state. This variety of occupation since the commencement of the present century, has rendered Derby one of the most flourishing towns in the kingdom; the population, which in 1801 was only 10,332, in 1821 had increased to 17,423. The general aspect of the town is respectable, and in its principal part assumes a feature of importance; the county hall and other county buildings are stately; it has a spacious assembly room, and a literary and philosophical society, a range of alms houses for clergymen's widows, 2 others for lay persons, and several dissenting places of worship. Derby was formerly surrounded by a wall, and contained a castle and 3 monasteries, no vestiges of any one of which now remain. The Pretender's army from Scotland entered the town in 1745, but withdrew after a very short stay. Derby returns two members to parliament, and holds 7 fairs annually. The river Derwent is navigable from the Trent up to Derby in a N. N. W. direction, but the town communicates with the Trent and Mersey canal by a cut in a direction due S. and with the Erewash canal, in a direction nearly due E. which affords an easy conveyance to all the S. E. parts of the country.

Derby, West, a township 4 miles N. of Liverpool, Lancashire, which in 1821 contained 6,304 inhabitants (see Walton and Liverpool.)

Derby, a town of Connecticut, in New Haven county, seated on the Housatonic, which is navigable hence to the sea. It is 14 miles N. W. of New Haven. Pop. 2,253.

Derby, a town of Pennsylvania, in Dauphin county. Here is a cave divided into several apartments, and adorned with stalactites. It is situate on the Swatara, two miles above its conflux with the Susquehanna, and 10 S. E. of Harrisburg.

Derby, is also the name of a township in Orange Co. Vermont, on the E. side of lake Memphremagog, and bounded on the N. by the conventional line which divides the United States territory from Lower Canada. Pop. 1,469.

Dereham, a town in Norfolk, Eng. The church is a very ancient structure, with four chapels, and a curious stone font. It is 16 miles W. of Norwich, and 101 N. N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821 3,273.

Derkus, a town of European Turkey, in Rumania, on the coast of the Black Sea, 30 miles N. N. W. of Constantinople. At some former period a wall appears to have extended from this place to Ereklî, 100 miles W. of Constantinople on the coast of the sea of Marmora.

Derrmon, t. Fayette Co. Pa.

Derne, a town of Barbary on the coast of the Mediterranean. It is the capital of the district of Barca, and is a pleasant town, surrounded by gardens, and watered by a number of rivulets. The government is a dependency of Tripoli, and during the war between the United States and that power in 1808, Derne was stormed and taken by the Americans under General Eaton.

Derry, townships in Dauphin, Mifflin, Westmoreland and Columbia Cos. Pa. and Guernsey Co. Ohio.

De Ruyter, p.t. Madison Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,447.

Derwent, the name of 4 rivers in different parts of England; 1st rising in the peak district of Derbyshire, and after a course of about 50 miles in a direction S. E. by E. falls into the Trent about 10 miles below the town of Derby, from whence it is navigable. 2nd rises near Whitby, in the N. Riding of Yorkshire, and after a winding course of about 25 miles is joined by the Rye, when the united stream runs S. for about 35 miles falling into the Ouse, and 6 miles below Selby. 3rd rises at the foot of Kilhope Law Mountain, and for about 15 miles in an irregular course forms the boundary between the counties of Durham and Northumberland, when it intersects for about 7 miles the N. W. corner of the former county, falling into the Tyne about 5 miles above Newcastle. 4th rises on the border of Westmoreland, intersects the S. E. part of the county of Cumberland, and after a course of about 30 miles through Derwent and Bassenthwaite waters, and past Cockermouth, falls into the Solway Firth at Workington; this river abounds in excellent fish.

Derwent-water, near to Keswick in Cumberland, is of an oval form, three miles in length, and a mile and a half wide. It is surrounded by rocky mountains, broken into many fantastic shapes. The precipices seldom overhang the water but are arranged at some distance; and the shores swell with woody eminences or sink into green pastoral margins. The lake contains five islands; one of which near the centre, is famous for having been the residence of St. Herbert, the ruins of whose hermitage are yet remaining.

Desaguadero, a river and lake of Bolivia, communicating with the S. end of the lake Titicaca.

Desaguadero Chahalge is the name applied to part of the channel of waters concentrating in the great plains E. of the Andes, between the lat. of 36. and 41. S. whose outlet is into St. Matthias' Bay.

Descada, a small island 12 miles E. of Point Chateau, the eastern extremity of Guadaloupe, to which it is dependent; it is about 25 square miles in extent, and contains about 300 white inhabitants and 600 slaves; it was the first land-mark of Columbus on his second voyage. Lat. 16. 40. N. and 61. 20. of E. long.

Descada, Cape, the N. W. point of Terra del Fuego, forming the S. W. point of entrance into the straits of Magellan from the Pacific Ocean. Lat. 53. 48. and 74. 18. of W. long.

Descada River, see Port Desire.

Dessau, a strong town of Upper Saxony, capital of the principality of Anhalt-Dessau. It has manufactures of cloth, stockings, and hats; and is seated on the Mulda, at its conflux with the Elbe, 37 m. N. of Leipzig. Pop. about 9,500.

Detmold, a town of Westphalia, in the county of Lippe, with a fortified castle; seated on the river Weherra, 17 m. N. N. W. of Paderborn. Pop. about 2,400.

Detroit, the capital of Michigan territory. Its trade consists in a barter of coarse European goods with the Indians for furs, deerskins, tallow, &c. It is situate in a fruitful country, on the W. side of the strait, or river, that forms the communication between the lakes of St. Clair, and Erie, and the boundary line between the United States territory and Upper Canada. Long 83. 0. W. lat. 42. 40. N.

Dettenheim, a small town of Bavaria in the district of Pappenheim, in the circle of the Upper Danube, it is seated on the E. bank of the Ahltmuhl, and is remarkable as the place from near which Charlemagne in the 8th century undertook to unite by a canal, the waters of the Ahltmuhl with the Rednitz and thereby the Danube with the Rhine.

Detlebach, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Wurtzburg, now included in the kingdom of Bavaria, circle of the Lower Maine, seated on the Maine, 8 m. E. of Wurtzburg.

Dettingen, a village of Bavaria, in the territory of Hanau, circle of the Lower Maine, 4 miles S. E. of Hanau. Here George II. gained a victory over the French, in 1743.

* * There are three small towns of this name in the Duchy of Wurtemberg.

Deva, a considerable town of Transylvania, seated on the S. bank of the Marosch, about 12 m. S. W. of Carlsburgh.

Deval cotty, a town of Upper Hindoostan, on the E. bank of the main branch of the Ganges, 10 m. S. of Gangotry, in the lat. of 32. 40. N.

Devaprayaga, or Deuprag, another town of Upper Hindoostan, on the E. bank of the Ganges, a few miles S. of Sirinagur, (which see), and near the junction of 4 united streams from the N. with the Ganges, and where the water is esteemed most sacred by the Hindoos. The town contains the celebrated temple of Ramachandra, the resort of numerous pilgrims who contribute to the support of numerous Brahmins who form the principal population of the town. It suffered considerably by an earthquake in 1803.

Deucar, a district of Nepaul, bordering on the province of Oude, a town of the same name is about 90 m. N. of the city of Oude.

Develto, or Zagora, a town of European Turkey, in Rumania, the see of a Greek archbishop; situate on the Paniza, near its entrance into the gulf of Forus in the Black Sea, 58 m. N. E. of Adrianople, and 106 N. N. W. of Constantinople. Long. 27. 22. E. lat. 42. 35. N.

Deventer, a city of Holland, the capital of Overijssel, with a college. It is surrounded by strong walls, and seated on the Yssel, 50 m. E. of Amsterdam. Pop. about 10,000.

Deveron, a river of Scotland, which rises in the S. E. of Banffshire, and enters the ocean at Banff. It forms the boundary between the counties of Aberdeen and Banff for about 50 m.

Devicotta, a town on the coast of the Carnatic at the mouth of the Colran or N. branch of the Cavery river in the lat. of 11. 40. N. This place surrendered to the English in 1749, and for several years was one of the principal factories of the East India Company on that coast; the entrance to the harbour, is impeded by shoals.

Devil's Bason, a harbour in Christmas Sound, at the S. W. extremity of Terra del Fuego, opening into the S. Pacific Ocean in the lat. of 55. 25. S.; the harbour is surrounded by rocks of a very repulsive aspect, and so lofty as to preclude the rays of the sun from ever beaming on its waters, hence its name.

Devil's Island, Key and Race, names given to several small islands in the West Indies, and off the E. coast of S. America, generally of rugged aspect and difficult to approach.

Devizes, a borough town in the centre of the county of Wiltshire, England, 85 miles W. by S. of London, on the road to Bath, from which it is distant 18 miles. It was a Roman station, and at a more recent period, had considerable manufactures of worsted stuff; but two public breweries on no very extensive scale are now the only source of surplus of production.

Devonport, the principal station of the national navy of England, formerly called Plymouth Dock (see Plymouth); but received its present name by mandate of Geo. IV. on Jan. 1st, 1824; it is situate at the S. W. extremity of the county of Devon at the mouth of the Tamar river, which here forms one of the most commodious harbours in the world. This spot was first used for a marine station at the close of the 17th century, previous to which it was a mere fishing village, and it was not till after 1760 that it assumed any thing like importance, whilst during the long war from 1793 to 1816, it progressively rose to be the most extensive and complete arsenal in the world, the natural advantages having been rendered as convenient as labour and skill could make them. The natural accommodations of Devonport consist of a triple harbour, the outer one is called the Sound, the first inner one Catwater, and the upper one Hamoaze; the Sound was formerly open and exposed to the swells of the Atlantic Ocean, which during a continuance of S. W. winds, used to subject the anchorage to much inconvenience, and sometimes to danger; but in August, 1812, the first stone was sunk of a break-water, pier, or mole, 5,100 feet in length, 4,000 feet in a straight line, with an angle inclining into the Sound at each end; this stupendous work is composed of upwards of two millions tons of stone, blasted from the adjoining rocks, in pieces of 1 1-2 to 5 tons each, sunk indiscriminately into the water to work their own position; it is carried up 10 feet above high water mark at spring tides, 30 feet broad at the top, on which it is proposed to erect storehouses at intervals, and lights along its whole extent. The space within the pier is about 3 miles each way, affording anchorage for 2,000 sail of the largest ships, secure from the fury of the ocean however tempestuous; the ingress and egress being safe and easy at either end of the pier, defended from the land side on the W. by the rock of St. Carlos, and on the E. by the Shovel rock. The Catwater is formed by the estuary of the little river Plym with the Tamar, and may be regarded as the harbour of the town of Plymouth, and applicable to the commercial intercourse of the port; whilst the Hamoaze extends inland for about 4 miles, in a direction nearly due N. and about half a mile wide, forming one of the most convenient and beautiful natural basins known in the world, affording moorings for 100 of the largest ships of war, without interruption to the anchorage and movement of numerous other vessels; and with sufficient depth of water to enable ships of the largest burden to take in their stores directly off the quays and jettys, that range along its eastern shore. The Dock Yard extends 3,500 feet along the shore and comprises 96 acres, containing a basin 250 feet by 180, in which are kept the boats and launches belonging to the Yard; also two mast ponds and a canal, which enables vessels bringing stores, to land them at the door intended for their reception. Ships and dry docks for building and repairing of the largest ships of war, range along the shore of Hamoaze, and communicate with the Dock basin, a block of store houses built of stone, 450 feet long, and 300 wide, 2 roperies 1,200 feet in length, 3 stories high, and a smithery containing 48 forges, all are within the Yard. The bakehouse, brew-house, and cooperage, and slaughter house, hospital and barracks for 3,000 men, are without the Yard, but contiguous thereto; all defended on the land side by several batteries, and a line of circumvallation mounted with numerous cannon, and an outer trench excavated 22 to 20 feet deep, out of the solid rock, forming altogether the most complete and magnificent display of human art and exertion in the world. The parish church is at Stoke, about a mile distant, but the town contains two chapels of ease and numerous dissenting meeting-houses. Here are also a commodious town-hall and a public library, besides several other handsome buildings. The column erected to commemorate the name of the town is a prominent and interesting object. The streets are mostly at right angles and well paved. In the census of 1821 the population of Devonport, then Plymouth Dock, was returned with Plymouth, which see; the post office at Devonport is 217 1-2 miles S. W. of Hyde Park Corner, London, by way of Salisbury and Exeter, distant from the latter 45 miles. The block house flag-staff of the garrison is in the lat. of 50. 22. 56. N., and 4. 9. 11. long. W. of Greenwich.

Devonshire, a maritime county in the S. W. of England, bounded on the N. E. by the county of Somerset, N. W. by the entrance to the Bristol Channel, W. S. W. by the Tamar River, which divides it from the county of Cornwall, and S. by the English Channel. Its extreme length from the Start Point in the English Channel to Ilfracomb, on the shore of the Bristol Channel, is about 70 miles, but its mean length and breadth is about 50 miles, giving the largest area of any county in England, except those of York and Lincoln. It is the fourth county in order of population, and the most agricultural of any in the kingdom. Although it has the finest harbour in the world, and several other convenient ones, and intersected by numerous streams, favourable for mill sites, and other manufacturing operations, relatively, it is one of the least commercial and manufacturing counties in the kingdom. The S. W. part of the county contains a dreary tract called Dartmoor, containing upwards of 53,000 acres; the highest elevation of this moor, is 1,549 feet above the level of the sea; the other parts of the county more particularly the S. and W. are exceedingly fertile. Its principal surplus produce is cattle of a remarkably fine breed, either for dairying or for feeding, and of beautiful symmetry; the N. E. part of the county contains veins of copper, lead, manganese, gypsum, and of loadstone; antimony, bismuth, and cobalt are also found in small quantities; it has also quarries of beautiful marble and granite, none of which however are worked to any great advantage. The principal manufactures of the county are serges, kerseys, shalloons, broadcloth, blond lace, and porcelain; there is also a considerable ship-building trade at Barnstable. The woolen cloth manufactures at Tiverton and Great Torrington, and the wool-combing at Chumleigh, were formerly extensive, but have now much decayed or vanished. Besides the Tamar, which divides the county from Cornwall on the S. W., the other principal rivers falling into the English Channel are the Dart and the Exe, and into Bideford Bay, on the side of the Bristol Channel, the Torridge, and the Taw; Devonshire contains one city, Exeter.

Devon, a river of Scotland, which rises in the S. E. part of Perthshire, and, after a course of 40 miles, enters the Forth at Clackmannan, only eight miles distant from its source. In Perthshire it forms some romantic waterfalls, called the Devil's Mill, the Rumbling Bridge, and the Caldron-linn.

Deuren, a town of the Prussian states, in the duchy of Juliers, with manufactures of cloth and paper, and some iron works. It is 14 miles E. of Aix-la-Chapelle. Pop. about 3,500.

Deutz. See Duytz.

Deux Ponts, a late duchy of Germany, lying W. of the Rhine; it is about 30 miles in length from N. to S., and 12 in mean breadth, and tolerably fertile. It was ceded to France at the peace of Luneville in 1802, assigned to Austria at the general partitioning after the peace of Paris in 1814, and by Austria exchanged with Bavaria for other districts on the E. It now forms part of the Bavarian circle of the Rhine, and is supposed to contain from 50,000 to 60,000 inhabitants; besides the chief town of the same name, the other principal towns are Kussel, Honiburg and New Hornbach.

Deux Ponts, the chief town of the preceding district or duchy, is seated at the confluence of the Hornbach with the Erlbach, a short distance above the entrance of the united stream into the Blise near the S. end of the duchy. Its castle, the former residence of the grand duke, is a stately edifice; and it has two spacious churches, an academy, and an orphan house, and was formerly celebrated for a printing establishment, which produced a valuable edition of the Greek and Latin Classics, since removed to Strasburg. Pop. about 5,000; Deux Ponts is 55 miles E. by N. of Metz, and 65 N. W. by N. of Mentz. Lat. 49. 15. N. and 7. 22. of E. long.

Deoangunge, a town of Bengal, on the W. bank of the Burrampooter, 110 miles N. N. W. of Dacca.

Devarcotta, a town and district of North Hindoostan, between the Ganges and the Jumna; the town is seated on the W. bank of the main branch of the Ganges, 175 miles N. by W. of Dehli, and 90 N. W. of Sirinagar.

De Witt's Land, the name given to about 10 degrees of lat. of the N. W. part of New Holland, after the Dutch navigator of that name, who first made it known to Europeans.

Dewsbury or Dewbury, a parish and town in the west Riding of Yorkshire, England. The parish which includes the townships of Oset, Southill, and Clifton-cum. Heartshead, contained in 1821, 16,261 inhabitants. The town of Dewsbury is a place of great antiquity, being mentioned as early as 626, when Paulinus, the first archbishop of York, preached christianity to the inhabitants of the surrounding country; it is now distinguished as the seat of an extensive commerce, having upwards of 50 establishments for the manufacture of blankets, carpets, and other heavy woolen fabrics; and Heckmondwike adjoining, has 40 other establishments for the like purpose, chiefly blankets. Dewsbury is seated near the N. bank of the Calder river, 5 miles W. by N. of Wakefield, on the road to Halifax, and in 1821, the town contained 6,380 inhabitants.

Deynse, a town of Flanders, seated on the S. bank of the Ly, 9 miles W. S. W. of Ghent.

Deyrak, a town of Upper Hindoostan, on the frontier of Dehli, in the province of Sirinagar.

Desaigne, a town of France, in the N. part of the department of L'Ardeche, 25 miles W. N. W. of Valence. Pop. about 3,500.

Dexter, p.t. Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 885.

Dezensano, a town of Breeciano, situated at the S. end of lake Garda, 15 miles E. of Brescia. Pop. about 3,500.

Dezful, a populous town of Persia, in the province of Chochistan, seated on the banks of the Abzal, over which is an elegant bridge of 22 arches. Dezful is 130 miles N. by E. of Bassora; the Abzal falls into the Ahwas, which joins the Tigris, at its junction with the Euphrates.

Diadin, a town of Armenia, seated near the source of the Euphrates, and frontier of Persia, 80 miles S. S. W. of Erwan.

Diakovar, a town of Slavonia, about 20 miles S. S. E. of Essig, on the road to Brodo. Pop. about 3,000.

Diamond Harbour and Point, on the Hoogly river, (see Calcutta).

Diamond Isle, a small island lying off the S. W. point of Pegu, and S. E. point of the Bay of Bengal, in the lat. of 15. 51. N. and 94. 12. of E. long.

Diamond Point, the N. E. point of the island of Sumatra, at the entrance to the strait of Malacca, in the lat. of 5. 18. N. and 97. 48. of E. long.

"* There is a river of Sumatra, called Diamond river, falling into the strait a little S. of the point. The S. W. part of the island of Martinique in the West Indies, in the lat. of 14. 25. N. and 61. 9. of W. long. is also called Diamond Point.

Diano, a town of Naples, W. of the Apennines, in Principato Citra, 15 miles N. by E. of Policastro. Pop. about 4,500.

Diarbekir, a district of Asiatic Turkey, in the province of Algazira, the whole of which extending from 33. 20. to the lat. of 39. N. was formerly called Diarbekir; and the Pasha or governor of the province is still called the Pasha of Diarbekir. It formed the ancient kingdom of Mesopotamia; but the district of Diarbekir is now confined between the 37th and 38th degrees of N. lat.; it lies E. of the Euphrates, and is intersected by numerous streams, forming the head waters of the Tigris. It is beautifully diversified with mountains and vallies, and to a social people would form a most delightful residence.

Diarbekir, the chief city of the preceding district, or as it is called by the Turks Karls Amid, which signifies a black wall, in reference to a lofty wall of black stone with which the city was formerly surrounded, is seated on the banks of the main branch of the Tigris, in the lat. of 37. 55. N. and 39. 22. of E. long. 570 miles E. S. E. of Constantinople, and 180 N. E. of Aleppo. The Pasha resides in an extensive castle on the N. side of the city. Extensive manufactures of silk, wool, cotton, and leather, and in metals are carried on at Diarbekir; and their dyed fabrics in wool and cotton are justly esteemed for the beauty of their colours. As in most eastern cities, the streets are narrow and dirty, but many of the houses are spacious and elegant within. It contains several commodious bazaars, a magnificent mosque, and also a noble cathedral belonging to the Armenians. As a place of residence to Europeans it is considered among the most agreeable of all the Turkish cities. The population is variously estimated at from 40,000, to 80,000, consisting of Armenians, Kurds, Christians, Jews, and Turks.

Dickinson, p.t. Franklin Co. N. Y. Pop. 446. Also a township in Cumberland Co. Pa.

Dickson, a County of West Tennessee, about 28 miles from N. to S. and 25 in breadth. Duck river, which falls into the Tennessee, washes all the S. part of the county, whilst the E. and W. corners of the N. side jet upon the great Cumberland river; a collateral ridge of the Alleghany mountains intersects the county from the S. E. to the N. W. Pop. 7,261. Charlotte, N. of the mountain ridge, is the principal town.

Didier, St. a town of France at the N. E. extremity of the department of Upper Loire, 40 miles S. S. W. of Lyons. Pop. about 3,200.

* There are three other small towns of the same name in different parts of France.

Die, a town of France in the department of Drome, situate on the N. bank of the river Drome; it is the seat of a prefect, and in 1825 contained 3,509 inhabitants. It produces excellent wine, and has a mineral spring in its vicinity. It is 30 miles S. W. of Grenoble, and 80 S. E. of Lyons.

Dieburg, a town of Hesse Darmstadt, seated on the N. bank of the Gerspienz river, 7 miles E. by N. of Darmstadt, and 18 S. S. E. of Frankfurt on the Maine.

Diego, St. a town on the coast of New Albion, in the north Pacific Ocean, capital of a jurisdiction of its name. It stands in so barren a country, that in the dry season cattle are sent upward of 20 miles for pasturage. The port affords excellent anchorage. Long. 116. 53. W. lat. 33. 12. N.

Diemen's Land. See Van Diemen's.

Diepholtz, a town and castle of Westphalia, capital of a county of the same name. It has manufactures of coarse woolen and linen cloth, and stands on the river Hunte, near the lake Dummer, 30 miles N. W. of Minden, and 33 S. S. W. of Bremen; the county comprises about 265 square miles, and contains about 15,000 inhabitants; and now forms part of the kingdom of Hanover, the inhabitants subsist chiefly by breeding of cattle, which they drive down to the markets of Holland.

Dieppe, a sea port town of France, in the department of Lower Seine, with a good harbour formed by the mouth of the river Arques, an old castle and two piers. The principal trade consists in fish, ivory, toys, and laces. It was bombarded by the English in 1694, and is not so considerable as formerly. It is situate on the coast of the English Channel, opposite to Brighton, from whence packet boats sail daily to Dieppe during the summer season, forming the easiest route from London to Paris. Dieppe is 50 miles N. N. E. of Havre, 35 N. of Rouen, and 96 in a meridional line N. N. W. of Paris, the lighthouse at the entrance of the harbour is in lat. 49. 55. 34. Domingo, St. or Hispaniola, or Hayti, an island of the West Indies, extending from Cape Engano, in the long. of 68. 20. W. to Cape Donna Maria, in 57. 26. W., this gives an extreme length of 408 English statute, or 346 geographical miles, but as the west end projects out in two promontories, the mean length will not exceed 275 English statute miles, between 18. and 20. of north lat. or a breadth of 135 statute miles; these limits give an area of 23,760,000 English statute acres, being about three fourths the extent of England exclusive of Wales. The east end of the island is separated from Porto Rico, by the Mona, or Porto Rico channel, about 120 miles wide, and the northern promontory of the west end is separated from the island of Cuba, by the windward passage about 60 miles wide; and the southern promontory of the west end, is about 100 miles distant from the east end of the island of Jamaica. A chain of mountains extend from the extremity of the northern promontory of the west end to the S. E. end of the island and about the centre rise to the height of about 6,000 feet above the level of the sea. Other mountain chains run in various directions, giving great variety of feature and climate to every part of the island, whilst streams of water intersect it in all directions, contributing alike to its beauty and fertility. There are four principal streams rising about the centre of the island, the Yuna flowing into Samana Bay in the E., the Yaque de Santiago, flowing to the N., the Artibonate to the W. and the Neibe to the S.

This island was discovered by Columbus, on the 6th of December, 1492, after having touched at the Bahamas on his first voyage, and is memorable for being the first spot in America, which was colonized by Europeans. Columbus landed at Navidad near the extremity of the N. W. promontory, where he left 38 of his comrades; returning to Spain the following month. At this time the country was called Hayti by the natives; Columbus gave it the name of Espanola, or little Spain, hence Hispaniola. Columbus returned in November following, and landed on the N. coast of the island in the long. of 71 near to the mouth of a small river, which in compliment to his patroness, Isabella of Spain, he named after her. The avarice of the settlers soon excited the just indignation of the native inhabitants, whose resentment, however, was readily subdued by the more ample and destructive means of warfare of the Spaniards. Columbus returned to Spain in 1496, leaving his brother Bartholomew in command of the settlement, who soon after removed to the southern coast, and founded the city of St. Domingo, which afterwards gave name to the whole island. The number of settlers from Spain increased rapidly, and the natives were compelled to the severest labour, which soon brought on disease and premature death, and so fatal to life was the cruel policy of the Spaniards, that after a lapse of about 20 years, an efficient labourer scarcely remained on the island. Under this exigency, about 40,000 of the inhabitants of the Bahama Isles were decoyed from their homes to become labourers or slaves in St. Domingo; but such was the perverse policy of the Spaniards; that notwithstanding this acquisition, and 1,000,000 of native inhabitants, (some historians even carry the number as high as 3,000,000,) which the island was supposed to contain on its first discovery in 1492, by the middle of the following century scarcely 150 remained alive; whilst the Spaniards had progressively sunk into indolence, and the island was reduced again to a wilderness.

The French obtained a footing on the W. end of the island about the middle of the 17th century, and resumed the culture of the sugar-cane which had been early introduced by the Spaniards from the Canary Islands, but had been entirely neglected by them. By the treaty of Ryswick in 1691, Spain ceded to France all the west part of the island from the little river Federnallo on the S. to the Capotillo falling into the Bay of Manzanilla on the N., in the long. of about 71. 40. W., being about a third part of the island. After this period the French plantations progressively increased in number and importance, and in 1789 the population of the French part of the island had increased to 30,830 whites, 94,000, mulattoes, and 480,000 slaves, making a total of 534,830 inhabitants, whilst the total population of the Spanish part did not exceed 155,000, and in 1791, the following produce was exported to France: viz. 84,017,328 lbs. of coffee, 11,317,222 lbs. of cotton, 3,257,610 lbs. of indigo, 1,536,017 lbs. of cocoa, and 217,463 casks of sugar.

From this period a new and important era in the history of St. Domingo commences. The desolating mania of the French revolution, had extended to this island; an insurrection ensued, in which upwards of 5,000 of the whites fell a prey to the fury of their slaves. In 1792 the national assembly of France proclaimed the political equality of the negroes and whites; in the following year three commissioners were despatched from France, who on their arrival in St. Domingo proclaimed the emancipation of the slaves. This served as a signal for the slaves to wreak their vengeance on their white oppressors, and on the 21st of June 1793, a force of 3,000 blacks entered Cape Francois and began an indiscriminate slaughter among the white inhabitants, whilst the most cruel vengeance displayed itself over all that part of the island.

In the midst of this confusion, the English attempted to establish their authority; and a force from Jamaica succeeded in taking possession of Port au Prince, but after suffering much from disease and the resistance of the blacks, they abandoned the island in 1798. By this time the whole of the white population had become nearly extirpated, whilst the blacks, under the command of Rigaud and Toussaint L'Ouverture, had effected considerable progress in military discipline. On the 1st of July 1801, the independence of the island was formally proclaimed in the name of the republic of Hayti, when Toussaint L'Ouverture was appointed governor for life, with the power of naming his successor. On the 6th October, 1801, the French concluded a peace with England, and in the December following despatched a squadron with 20,000 men, under the command of general Le Clerc, to attempt the subjugation of St. Domingo. The troops landed in Samana Bay, at the E. end of the island. Le Clerc commenced the campaign in February 1802, and fought with varied success until the following May, when a truce was concluded upon; during which Toussaint was inveigled on board a vessel and conveyed to France, where he died in prison, in April, 1803. Suspicion of treachery in his death having been entertained against the French, hostilities recommenced with greater animosity than ever. The command of the black troops devolved on Dessalines, and the English being now regarded as auxiliaries against the French, on the 30th December 1803, the whole of the remaining French forces surrendered prisoners of war to the English.

Thus St. Domingo was again freed from all European oppression; but new calamities now awaited it. On the 1st of January 1805, the generals and chiefs of the army entered into a solemn compact, in the name of the people of Hayti, renouncing forever all dependence on France. Dessalines was then appointed governor for life, and invested with extensive powers; in September following he assumed the imperial title of Jacques the 1st, Emperor of Hayti. His ambition and tyranny brought upon him the detestation of the people, and he was slain by a military conspiracy in October 1806. He was succeeded by Christophe as "chief of the government," but Petion starting as a rival candidate for the supreme authority, a severe battle was fought between the forces of Petion and Christophe, on the 1st of January 1807, in which Petion was defeated. In the same year Christophe was appointed chief magistrate for life, with the power of appointing his successor, but like his predecessor Dessalines he was not content with conditional power, and in 1811, he assumed the regal title of Henry I. King of Hayti, making the title hereditary in his family, and Sans Souci, a village about 15 miles from Cape Francois, now called Cape Henry or Cape Hayti, the seat of his court and government. King Henry was both avaricious and cruel, and like Dessalines fell a prey to his own soldiery, who dragged him from his palace by force, and massacred him in October 1820. In the mean time, from 1801 to 1818, Petion after his defeat in 1807 retreated to the south of the west part of the island, and remained at the head of a considerable portion of the country. In 1816 he was appointed president for life, but died in May 1818, universally lamented by all who had espoused his cause. He was succeeded by Boyer, who on the death of Christophe obtained the command and government of the whole of what was formerly the French part of the island.

In 1794 Spain ceded the whole of the remaining part of the island to France, but the troubles which ensued rendered the cession nominal, the French never having been able to take possession. The Spanish flag continued to wave over the fortress of the city of St. Domingo, until the 1st of December 1821, when the inhabitants issued a formal declaration of independence, and made overtures to the republic of Columbia, to be admitted as an integral part of its confederacy, which proposition however was not acceded to. Such was the political state of St. Domingo at the period of 1822, about which time the French by intrigue endeavoured again to regain an ascendancy in the island, and conceiving all attempts by force of arms likely to prove ineffectual, they succeeded in inducing the Haytiens to agree to a pecuniary indemnity, for the loss of the plantations at the commencement of the revolution; this after several years negotiation, in 1825, was settled at 120,000,000 francs, or about £5,000,000 sterling, payable by instalments, and under regulations calculated to divert a great portion of the produce of the island into the lap of France on better terms than though she held the island in colonial possession.

Under the mild and judicious administration of president Boyer, Hayti promises to advance in prosperity and social influence; a college has been founded and liberally endowed at Cape Hayti, in which provision is made for instruction in all the languages, arts, and sciences, usually taught in the European establishments of the like kind; public schools have been established in most of the principal towns of the west part of the island; and be the future destiny of St. Domingo what it may, she is at present one of the most interesting subjects for contemplation in the world; an age has hardly passed away since the bulk of the inhabitants were held in the most abject and degraded state of bondage; since when they have successfully resisted the arms of two of the most powerful nations of their time, and now remain pursuing a silent but steady course towards giving a new and additionally important character to the social relations of the civilized world.

Of its present extent of population and produce there is no satisfactory information. The population of the Spanish part of the island is supposed to have decreased considerably since 1785, and is thought, now, not to exceed 100,000. In speaking therefore of the island of St. Domingo or Hayti, as it is now again generally called, all that is politically important in relation to population and intercourse applies almost exclusively to the W. end or about one third only of the island; the chief occupation of the comparatively few inhabitants of the eastern, or greater part of the island, being that of attending to the breeding of cattle, which they drive to the markets of the more populous districts of the west.

Under social institutions, and well directed exertion, Hayti would doubtless prove adequate to supply the whole of Europe with an abundance of all the luxurious products common to a tropical climate, whilst the artificial productions and conveniences which Hayti would be able to command in exchange, might make it the most delightful residence on earth. The temperature of the mountains ranges at a mean of about 70, and although in the plains it ranges at about 100, the pressure of the heat is considerably modified by the alternate land and sea-breezes; the coast on all sides is indented with convenient bays and har-bours. The indigenous vegetable productions of St. Domingo are various, beautiful and valuable; its mahogany is unrivalled for its texture and beauty, and there is a satin wood proportionably superior to that of other parts of the world. The flowering shrubs are various, and no where surpassed in beauty and fragrance; vanilla and the plantain are both luxuriant; pine for ship building and house carpentry is abundant, whilst the cotton tree supplies the material for canoes. Of quadrupeds one only is known peculiar to the island, the agouti cat, in size less than the common cat of Europe; all the domestic animals of Europe, have, however, been introduced, and thrive exceedingly; swine, horses, and horned cattle, all running wild in considerable numbers. The feathered race are numerous and beautiful in plumage, and more melodious than common with birds of tropical climates. There is a salt water lake of considerable extent between the French and Spanish part of the island, on the S. side, which as well as the plains and rivers of that side, abound in alligators and other reptiles of great size, and also in the noxious insects common to the situation and climate. The land tortoise is common, and the coast abounds in turtle and other fish.

Domingo, St., City of, is situate on the west bank of a river called the Ozama, in lat. and long. as previously laid down. The city was originally founded in 1496, on the opposite bank of the river, but afterwards moved to its present site. It is regularly laid out, and like most of the cities built by the Spaniards in this part of the world, the private houses have interior courts and flat roofs. The cathedral, finished in 1540, is a ponderous edifice; the government house, hall of justice, barracks, and arsenal, are all respectable buildings, it has also several convents, which have been mostly deserted by their inmates since 1794. The harbour is capacious, but exposed to the tempests from the S. W. The population, which at one time amounted to 25,000, is now reduced to half that number, and indicates decline rather than prosperity. It was sacked by the English Admiral Drake, in 1586, who obtained a ransom from the inhabitants of about £7,000 to prevent further devastation. It has not experienced any marked vicissitudes since that period.

" There are several other towns called St. Domingo in different parts of America, settled by the Spaniards, but all inconsiderable.

Dominica, one of the West Indian Leeward Islands, lying N. of Martinique and S. of Guadeloupe, being about 34 miles from N. to S. and 10 in mean breadth. It was discovered by Columbus on Sunday, November 3, 1493. A party of Frenchmen settled upon it about the beginning of the 17th century, who by cultivating the friendship of the natives, succeeded in the culture of the soil. At the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, it was agreed that it should be neutral, but the English took possession of it in 1760, and it was confirmed to them at the peace of 1763. It was captured by a French force from Martinique in 1778, but restored to the English in 1783, since when it has remained in their possession. It is very productive of coffee of a choice quality, and yields some sugar. Charlotte Town at the mouth of a river towards the S. end of the island on the W. side, is in lat. 15. 18. N. and 61. 28. of W. long.

Dominica, the largest of the islands of the Pacific Ocean, called the Marquesas. Long. 139. 2 W. lat. 9. 41. S.

Domino, St. one of the Tremitti islands, in the gulf of Venice, 15 miles from the coast of Naples in the lat. of 42. 10. N.

Domitz, a town of Lower Saxony, in Mecklenburgh-Schwerin, with a fort seated at the confluence of the Elde and Elbe, 25 m. S. of Schwerin.

Dommel, a river of Dutch Brabant, which receives the Aa below Bois le Duc, and then flows into the Meuse.

Domo d'Ossola, a town of Italy, in the Milanese, with a castle, seated near the frontier of the Valais on the Tessa, 20 m. N. of Varallo.

Domotica, or Dimotice, a large town of European Turkey, situate on the W. bank of the Marissas, 12 miles S. by W. of Adrianople. Pop. about 8,000.

Dompair, a town of France, in the department of Vosges, 10 m. W. N. W. of Epinal.

Domremy, a town of France, in the department of Meuse, the birth-place of the celebrated Joan of Arc, the Maid of Orleans. It is seated on the Meuse, 5 m N. of Neufchâteau.

Domevillers, or Danvillers, a town of France in the department of Meuse, 14 m. N. of Verdun.

Don, a river of Europe (the Tanais of the ancients,) which intersects the south-east provinces of Russia. It issues from the lake St. John, in the government of Tula, and after a very circuitous course of several hundred miles, flows into the sea of Azoph. This river has so many windings, and such numerous shoals, as to be scarcely navigable, except in the spring, on the melting of the snows; and flat-bottomed boats only, except in the same season, can pass into the sea of Azoph.

Don, a river of Scotland, which rises in the W. part of Aberdeenshire, receives the Urie-water at Inverary, passes by Kintore, and enters the German Ocean, at Old Aberdeen.

Don, a river in Yorkshire, Eng. which rises on the borders of Cheshire, flows by Penistone, Sheffield, Rotherham, Doncaster, and Thorn, and joins the Ouse near its termination in the Humber.

Donaghadee, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Down, it is seated on the coast 35 miles W. N. W. of the Isle of Man, and 23 W. by S. of the Mull of Galloway. It is celebrated as the mail packet station between Ireland and Scotland (See Port Patrick.) It has a custom house, and exports some cattle and other live stock to Scotland, but in other respects its commerce is very inconsiderable, the receipt of customs not equalling the expense. Population of the town in 1821, 2,795, and the parish 3,793 more: on Mew island at the entrance of the harbour, which has been made convenient for the packets, is a light house in the lat. of 54. 40. N. and 5. 24. of W. long.

Donaldsonville, p.v. the capital of the parish of Ascension. Louisiana, on the Mississippi.

Donaueschingen, or Doneschingen, a town of Suabia on the E. border of the Black Forest, in the principality of Furstenburg. It is the chief residence of the prince; in the court yard of whose palace are some springs, collected in a reservoir about 30 feet square, which has the honour of being called the head of the Danube. It is 13 m. N. N. W. of Schaffhausen.

Donauwert, a strong town of Bavaria, seated on the N. bank of the Danube, at the influx of the Wernitz, 25 miles N. by W. of Augsburg; here is a bridge over the Danube, which causes Donauwert to be a place of considerable intercourse. Pop. about 2,500.

Doncaster, a handsome town in the S. E. part of the west riding of Yorkshire, Eng. It is situate on the great high road from London to York and Edinburgh, on the S. bank of the river Don, over which are two handsome bridges. The principal street is about a mile in length; the mansion house, in which the mayor and justices hold their sittings, is a spacious and elegant building; there is also a town hall, theatre, dispensary, hospital, and two or three other public buildings, and the church dedicated to St. George is a noble edifice. Doncaster has 5 tan yards, several flax dressers, and some manufactures of sacking, carpets, nails, &c. and its trade in corn is considerable; but the agreeableness of its locality renders it more celebrated as a place of gaiety and fashion, than as a manufacturing or trading town. The annual races are about the gayest in the kingdom, and the frequent balls and concerts held in the mansion house make it the resort of all the fashion and gaiety of the surrounding country; there are also about a dozen separate private establishments for the education of young ladies and gentlemen; these with its constant thoroughfare tend to render it a cheerful and an agreeable residence. It is 158 miles N. from London, 18 N. E. of Sheffield, 20 S. E. of Wakefield, and 37 S. of York. The population, which in 1801 was 5,697, in 1821 had increased to 9,116. Market on Sunday.

Dondra Head, the southern point of the island of Ceylon, in the lat. of 5. 55. 30. N. and 80. 42. of E. long. The land is low and densely populated, but appears to have been of greater importance than at present, there being the ruins of a magnificent Hindoo temple in the vicinity. See Madura.

Donegal, a maritime county forming the N. W. extremity of Ireland; it is about 70 miles in extreme length, but being indented by numerous bays and harbours, it has about 150 miles of sea coast; the principal bay is called Lough Foyle, and divides Donegal from the county of Londonderry, opening by a narrow strait into the north channel. Lough Swilly is another capacious bay, opening into the Atlantic Ocean, and Donegal bay, forms the southern boundary of the county, which is bounded on the E. and S. E. by the counties of Tyrone and Fermanagh. The river Finn intersects the centre of the county from W. to E. and then takes a northern course into Lough Foyle. Donegal is a mountainous and rather dreary district, and its inhabitants may be considered the rudest in Ireland, the greater portion speaking only their vernacular language. The mountains contain various minerals; kelp is made upon the coast, which yields also a salicious sand used in the manufacture of glass; the spinning of flax, the linen manufacture, and distillation of spirits prevail over the greater part of the county; the principal towns are Lifford, Raphoe, Johnstown, Letterkenny, Ballyshannon, Donegal, and Killibegs; at Ballyshannon is a valuable salmon fishery. It contains the ruins of several castles and other works of antiquity. For divisions, superficies, population, &c. see Ireland.

Donegal, a town and parish of the preceding county, seated at the head of a bay 111 miles N. W. of Dublin, and 25 S. W. of Lifford. Pop. of the town in 1821, 696, and of the parish 4,428.

*. There are four townships called Donegal in the state of Pennsylvania.

Doneraile, a town and parish of Ireland, in the county of Cork. Near it are quarries of beautiful variegated marble. It is situate on the Awbeg, which falls into the Black Water 19 miles N. W. of Cork, and 113 S. W. of Dublin. Pop. of the town in 1821, 2,455, and the parish 1,419 more.

Dongola, or Dungala, a town of Nubia, capital of a province of the same name. It contains 10,000 houses of wood, and is seated on the Nile, among mountains, 500 miles N. by W. of Senaar. The country is celebrated for a fine breed of horses, and the inhabitants for their skill in horsemanship. Long. 32. 5. E. lat. 19. 25. N.

Donjon, a town of France, in the department of Allier, 24 m. S. E. of Moulins.

Donnington, a town in Lincolnshire, Eng. Much hemp is cultivated in the neighbourhood. It is 8 miles W. S. W. of Boston, and 106 N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,638.

* There are 7 villages of the same name in different parts of England, the principal one in Leicestershire, with a population of 2,308.

Donny Brook, one of the out parishes of the city of Dublin, celebrated for its annual saturnalia or fair.

Donzy, a town of France, in the department of Nièvre, 22 m. N. of Nevers.

Doobah, a term applied by the Hindoos to tracts of land lying between two rivers; the most celebrated tract is that lying between the Ganges and Jumna, in the provinces of Allahabad, Agra, and Dehli.

Doon, a river of Scotland, which issues from a lake of the same name in Ayrshire, and enters the frith of Clyde, 2 m. S. of Ayr.

Doraa, a town of Arabia, in Yemen, on the side of a mountain, 26 m. S. of Sana.

Dorat, a town of France, in the department of Upper Vienne, seated on the Abnan, near its junction with the Sevre, 25 m. N. of Limoges.

Dorchester, a borough and the capital of Dorsetshire, England. It was formerly much larger, and the ruins of the walls are still to be seen in some places. It has three churches; and a fine terrace-walk, planted with trees, almost surrounds the town, which has no manufactures, but is famous for excellent ale. A little to the S. is a Roman amphitheatre, constructed of chalk and turf, supposed to be the most perfect in the kingdom. One mile to the S. W. is the Maiden castle, another work of the Romans; there are three ramparts and ditches, nearly oval, and the whole area is 115 acres. Dorchester is seated on the river Frome, about 10 m. from the sea at Weymouth, 53 E. of Exeter, and 120 W. by S. of London. Pop. in 1821, 2,743.

Dorchester, a town in Oxfordshire, Eng. which was a station of the Romans, and ruined in the wars with the Danes. It was a bishop's see till 1066, when William the Conqueror translated it to Lincoln; and it had five churches, though now but one, which was the cathedral. It is seated on the Tame, 3-4 of a mile above its junction with the Isis; the united streams forming the river Thames, 10 miles S. E. of Oxford, and 49 W. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 854.

Dorchester, a county of the state of Maryland, lying between the Nanticoke and Choptank rivers, on the E. side of Chesapeake bay. Pop. 18,625. The chief town is Cambridge, on the S. bank of the Choptank, 60 miles S. S. W. of Baltimore.

Dorchester, p.t. Grafton Co. N. H. 90 m. from Portsmouth. Pop. 772.

Dordogne, an interior department in the S. W. of France, comprising the late province of Perigord, and part of the Limousin; a river of the same name intersects the S. part of the department; the Vizere, Ille, and la Drome, all falling into the Dordogne, in its course to the Garonne at Bourg, intersects other parts of the department, which is in general fertile and yields some delicious wines; it is divided into five arrondissements, the principal towns of which are Perigueux, the capital, Bergerac, Nontron, Ribera, and Sarlat; the other principal towns are Belves, Monpont, and Eaciderfil. For territorial extent, population, &c. &c. see France.

Dorestro. See Silistria.

Dorking, a beautifully picturesque town in Surrey, England, with a market on Thursdays, celebrated for a remarkably fine breed of poultry; a vast quantity of lime is burnt in the neighbourhood. It is 23 m. S. S. W. of London bridge.—Pop. in 1821, 3,812.

Dorn, a village in a detached part of Worcestershire, Eng. 3 m. S. E. of Camden in Gloucestershire. The Roman fowway runs through it, and abundance of coin, both Roman and British have been found here.

Dornburg, a town of Upper Saxony, in the principality of Weimar, with a castle; situate on a hill, by the river Saale, 14 m. E. of Weimar, and 40 S. W. of Leipsig.

Dornock, a borough on the E. coast of Scotland, capital of Sutherlandshire, at the entrance of a frith of the same name, over which it has a ferry to Tain. It is a small place, and half in ruins, but was formerly the residence of the bishops of Caithness, and part of the cathedral is kept up as the parish church. It is 40 miles N. of Inverness. Long. 3. 48. W. lat. 57. 52. N. Pop. in 1821, 3,100.

Dorp, Dorpat, or Dorfat, a town of Russia, in the government of Riga, with a university; seated on the Embur, between the lakes Wosero and Pepas, 60 m. S. of Narva, and about 50 E. of Pernau. Pop. about 5,000.

Dorset, p.t. Bennington Co. Vt. Pop. 1,507.

Dorsetshire, a maritime county of England, having about 70 miles of coast in the British Channel; bounded on the W. by Devonshire, N. by the counties of Somerset and Wilts, and E. by Hampshire; it is of an irregular form, having an extreme length of 55 miles from W. to E. and 35 in extreme breadth, but the mean lines do not much exceed half that extent; the superficial area being only 1,006 square miles. The soil is generally rich and fertile, though in some parts very sandy; the northern part, which is divided by a range of chalk hills from the southern, affords good pasturage for cattle; while the southern part chiefly consists of fine downs, and feeds incredible numbers of sheep. The chalk hills, which run through every county from the S. E. part of the kingdom thus far, terminate at the further extremity of this; but on the coast, chalk cliffs extend beyond it into Devonshire, 10 miles W. of Lyme. From the Hampshire border to the neighbourhood of Blandford a heathy common extends, which causes an exception to the general character of fertility which this county merits; but the rich vales to the S. W. make ample amends. The greater altitude of the county is 669 feet above the level of the sea; the climate is mild and congenial. The principal rivers are the Stour, Piddle, and Frome. Here is plenty of poultry of all sorts, swans, woodcocks, pheasants, partridges, fieldfares, &c. The principal towns on the coast are Lyme Regis, Melcombe Regis, Weymouth, Bridport, Wareham, and Poole; at the two latter some ships are built, and some foreign trade carried on; and Poole was formerly celebrated for its extensive interest in the Newfoundland fishery; and considerable manufactures of cordage, twine, and coarse woollens were formerly carried on in the vicinity of Bridport and Poole. The commercial and manufacturing concerns of the county have of late years declined and are now, relatively, insignificant, the shipping being principally employed in carrying, and the rental, taxes, and supply of shop goods for the consumption of the county, are now paid out of the surplus produce of sheep and lambs for the London market, some cattle, wool, and stone, from the quarries of Portland, and Purbeck, and freight of shipping. Some trifling manufactures also contribute to constitute an exchange; and the W. part of the coast abounds in mackerel during the season. The principal towns in the interior are Dorchester (the capital), Corfe castle, and Shaftesbury, each of which, as well as each of those on the coast, and the county, return two members to parliament. There are 13 other market towns, and upwards of 200 villages in this County.

Dorsetville, p.v. Chatham Co. N. C.

Dorsten, a fortified town of Westphalia, in the county of Recklinghausen, seated on the Lippe, 15 m. E. by N. of Wesel.

Dort, or Dordrecht, a city of South Holland on an island formed by the Meuse, which is here called the Merwe. The island was formed in 1431, in November of which year an inundation destroyed 72 villages and drowned 100,000 persons. In 1457 Dort was nearly destroyed by fire, and is further celebrated for an assembly of protestant clergy from all parts of Europe, in 1618—1619 called the synod of Dort, which condemned the tenets of Arminius. Here are several Lutheran and Calvinist churches, a fine council-house an excellent academy, and the mint of South Holland. It has a good harbour, and a great trade in corn, wine, and timber; of the latter immense rafts are floated hither from Andernach, in Germany. It was formerly the chief depository of Rhenish wines; but its commerce has much declined of late years, having been transferred to Rotterdam. The father of the celebrated De Witt was Burgomaster of Dort, and Vossius was once superintendent of its academy. The natural situation of Dort is such that it has never been taken by an enemy; but it surrendered to the French in 1795. It is 10 miles S. E. of Rotterdam. Long. 4. 45. E. lat. 51. 51. N. Pop. about 20,000.

Dortmund, a strong town of Westphalia, in a nook at the S. extremity of the upper bishopric of Munster. It was lately imperial, and is seated on the Emser, 15 m. S. W. of Ham, and 30 S. by W. of the city of Munster. Pop. about 4,000.

Dordrecht, or Dordrecht, a town of Holland, in Gelderland, with a foundry for bombs and cannon balls; seated south of the Yssel, 10 m. S. E. of Doesburg.

Douarnenez, a town of France in the department of Finistère, seated on a bay of the same name, at the entrance of the English channel, 8 m. N. W. of Quimper.

Douay, a city of France, formerly the capital of the department of Nord, with a fine arsenal, a foundry for cannon, a military school, a citadel, and three famous colleges; to which a great number of the catholic youths of England and Ireland are sent for education. It was taken by the Duke of Marlborough in 1710, and retaken by the French in 1712, after the suspension of arms. It is 110 miles N. by E. of Paris, 70 E. S. E. of Bologne, and 18 S. of Lisle, to which it is connected by a canal. It is the seat of a prefect, and in 1835 contained 18,854 inhabitants.

Doubs, a department of France, on the frontier of Neuchâtel in Switzerland. It comprises the eastern part of the late province of Franche Comte, and is watered by a river giving name to the department which falls into the Saône a little above Chalons. Doubs is a woody and mountainous district, interspersed with fertile vallies; the mountains yield a considerable supply of iron, the forests abundance of timber, whilst sheep and black cattle abound in the vallies, yielding a considerable supply of butter and cheese, the latter is celebrated by the name of gruyere; the vine is also cultivated with success, and to some extent; it has been proposed to unite the river Doubs with the Ille, falling into the Rhine, and thereby unite the waters of the north sea, with the Mediterranean. The department of Doubs is divided into four arrondissements; Besançon, 210 miles S. E. of Paris, is the capital; and the chief towns of the other three arrondissements are Baume, Pontarlier, and Montbéliard; there are two other considerable towns, viz. Quingey and Ornans.

Doue, a town of France, in the department of Mayenne and Loire, with a considerable manufacture of druggets and tammies. Near it is a vast Roman amphitheatre, cut out of the solid rock. It is 9 miles S. W. of Saumur.

Dove, a river of Derbyshire, Eng. which rises in the Peak, near Buxton, parts the county from Staffordshire, and after a course of about 40 miles joins the Trent, 4 miles below Burton.

Dover, Strait of, between the S. E. point of England, and the N. W. extremity of France, leading from the Atlantic Ocean, through the English channel into the north sea; the narrowest part of the strait is about 20 English statute miles, and the two usual points of intercourse about 23 miles. Dover castle being in 1. 19. 7. and Calais lights in 1. 51. 1. of E. long. being a difference of 32 miles of long. which in the lat. of 51. is equal to 19 geographical or 23 English statute miles. The straits extend from the S. W. in a direction N. N. E. for about 44 m., intersected by the long. of 51. of N. lat.

Dover, Town of, which gives name to the preceding strait, is seated on the English coast, in the county of Kent, and is celebrated in every period of English history; by the ancient Britons it was called Dour, by the Romans Dulris, and by the Saxons Dovre; and the Romans regarded it as Clavis et refragulum, totius regni—the lock and key of the whole realm. Dover may doubtless still be regarded as the great outlet and portal of the realm on the side of northern Europe, and from its peculiar local situation and advantages to be still entitled to high consideration. But as navigation has advanced towards perfection, and England advanced in her maritime ascendancy, in a relative sense, Dover has become an inconsiderable place, and in point of security and defence is very insignificant compared with either Portsmouth or Devonport; while Harwich, Southampton and Falmouth vie with it, as points of egress and ingress to and from foreign parts, and since the application of steam to purposes of navigation, numerous visitors to and from France now proceed and arrive direct from and to the Thames at London, who used formerly to pass by way of Dover. Dover is, however, still (1831) the medium of conveyance for the mails, and of all messengers and travellers intent on despatch, between England and France, for whose accommodation packets proceed to and from Calais with every tide, and the intercourse is still very great, constituting the chief support of the town. It extends for near a mile along the shore, and is divided into two parts; the eastern part is called the town, at the extremity of which, on an eminence, is the castle, supposed to have been first founded by Julius Cæsar, the west part is called the pier, and is overhung by a range of chalk cliffs, which seem to threaten an immediate overwhelming of all below; the heights 300 to 350 feet, above the level of the sea, are fortified with trenches, subterranean works and casements for the accommodation of 2,000 men, and in clear weather present fine prospects of the coast of France. Dover is one of the (five) cinque ports vested with peculiar privileges: by the 32 Hen. VIII. cap. 48. On condition of furnishing a number of ships equipped and manned for the national defence, one of the privileges was, each port returning two members to parliament, by the title of Barons of the Cinque Ports. Dover post office is 71 m. S. S. E. of London Bridge, by way of Canterbury, from which it is distant 16 miles. It is divided into two parishes, with two weekly markets on Wednesdays and Saturdays. The castle is a very extensive edifice, and interesting from its antiquity, and the historical events connected with it; besides the castle and two churches, the other public buildings are a town hall, theatre, military hospital, victualling office, and custom house: the business of the latter is confined almost exclusively to the inspecting the baggage of the passengers arriving by the packets. The harbour will admit ships of 500 tons burthen; but the town carries on little or no foreign trade. Pop. in 1811, 9,074, and in 1821, 10,327.

Dover, p.t. Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 1,042.

Dover, p.t. Strafford Co. N. H. 10 m. fr. Portsmouth on the falls of the Cohecho, a stream running into the Piscataqua. The falls have several pitches, one of which is 40 feet perpendicular, affording a vast water power, which has been applied to manufacturing purposes. The cotton manufactories produce 10,000 yards of shirting a week. The iron works roll and slit 1,000 tons of iron annually, and make 700 tons of nails. New establishments are also in progress, and the mill sites here are numerous. Dover is one of the oldest towns in the state. Pop. 5,449.

Douglas, Cape, a promontory on the W. coast of America, the W. point of the entrance to Cook's Inlet. Its summit forms two very high mountains. Long. 153. 30. W. lat. 58. 56: N.

Doulaincourt, a town of France, in the department of Upper Marne, 10 m. S. W. of Joinville.

Doullens, a town of France in the department of Somme, with two citadels; seated on the Autie, 15 m. N. of Amiens; it is the seat of a prefect. Pop. in 1825, 3,504.

Downe, Down, or Donna, a town of Scotland, in the parish of Kilmadock, Perthshire, with the ruin of a huge square castle, whose tower is yet full 80 feet in height. Here is a manufacture of pistols; also an extensive work called the Adelphi cotton-mill. It is seated on the Teih, 8 m. N. W. of Sterling, and 32 S. W. of Perth. In 1821 the parish contained 3,150 inhabitants.

Dourdan, a town of France, in the department of Seine and Oise, with a manufacture of silk and worsted stockings: seated on the Orge, 25 m. S. W. of Paris.

Douro, a river of the Peninsula, rising near Soria, in old Castile, in the long. of 2. 30. W. It rises to the W. of Soria, and from thence runs S. for about 20 miles, when it takes a course nearly due W. past Aranda into Leon, past Zamora to the frontier of the Portuguese province of Trazos Montes; it then takes a course S. S. W. past Miranda, and for about 60 miles forms the boundary between Leon in Spain and Tras os Montes: it then takes a course N. by W. dividing the latter province and Entre Douro e Minho from Beira, falling into the sea a short distance below Oporto. The meridional distance from its source to its entrance into the sea is about 300 miles, while the course of the stream will be near 400 miles; it receives numerous tributary streams both from the N. and S.

Dowlatabad, formerly called Amednagar, a province of the Deccan of Hindoostan; intersected by the Godavery river, bounded on the N. by Candesh, W. by the Gaute, S. by Visiapour and Golconda, and E. by Berar. Aurungabad is the capital.

Dowlatabad, one of the celebrated hill-forts of Hindoostan, and formerly the capital of the preceding province. The fort is 420 feet above the level of the plain. In the beginning of the 14th century the Emperor Mahomet III. caused a great number of the inhabitants of Dehli, to emigrate S. of the Godavery river, and attempted to make Dowlatabad the seat of government of his empire, but the project did not succeed, and his successor returned to the ancient capital. Dowlatabad nevertheless continued an important place and capital of the province, until the time of Aurungzeb, who fixed his residence at Aurungabad (which see), about 10 miles to the S.; it is now included in the territories of the Nizam of the Deccan.

Down, a maritime county on the N. E. coast of Ireland, opposite to the Isle of Man, it is bounded on the N. by the Lough of Belfast, which divides it from the county of Antrim, S. by Carlingford Bay, which divides it from the county of Louth, and on the W. it is bounded by the county of Ar magh. It is 53 miles in extreme length from S. W. to S. E. and about 25 in mean breadth, the N. E. being indented by Strangford Lough, containing about 100 square miles of surface: a canal from Carlingford Bay to the Lough Neagh, bounds the W. end of the county, and the river Lagan falling into Belfast Lough, waters the northern side; the river Bann intersecting the S. W. Down is the fifth county in Ireland, in order of population, both collectively and relatively, and although it is one of the least productive counties in the country, a great portion of its surface being occupied as bleach grounds, the industry of the inhabitants in the linen manufactures, enables it to command an equal or greater share of comforts than in most other parts of Ireland; the S. part of the county is mountainous, Slieve Donard Peak rising to the height of 2,800 feet above the level of the sea; various minerals are found in different parts of the county, but none are worked to advantage, the linen manufactures absorbing all the labour and exertion of its inhabitants, about an equal portion of whom are Protestants, emigrants, or descendants of emigrants from Scotland. Remains of antiquity are common in every part of the county. The principal towns are Downpatrick (the capital and a bishop's see), Newton Ardes, Bangor, Donaghadee, Killyleagh, Hillsborough, Dromore, (another bishop's see), and Newry, at the head of Carlingford Bay, which is the largest and most considerable trading town in the county. For extent of surface, divisions, &c. see Ireland.

Down, or Downpatrick, the chief town of the preceding county, is pleasantly located on the banks of a stream falling into the S. end of Strangford Lough, 74 miles N. N. E. of Dublin, and 23 S. by E. of Belfast; it a bishop's see in conjunction with Connor, in the county of Antrim, and besides the cathedral has three other places of religious worship; its other public buildings consists of a diocesan school, hospital, town hall, court house and goal. Down is celebrated as the supposed place of interment of Ireland's adopted saint, St. Patrick, and a well in the vicinity dedicated to that saint, is held in high veneration. Down participates in the linen manufacture; its population in 1821, amounted to 4,123, and the parish to 4,417 more. It returns a member to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Downe, a township in Cumberland Co. N. J.

Downham, a town in Norfolk, Eng. seated on the side of a hill, about a mile from the Ouse. It has a great trade in butter, which is sent up the river in boats to Cambridge, and thence conveyed in waggons to London, under the name of Cambridge butter. It is 11 miles S. of Lynn, and 86 N. by E. of London, and is celebrated for a foundery of church and turret bells, of a peculiarly harmonious tone. Pop. in 1801; 1,512, and in 1821, 2,044.

Drave, a river which rises in Germany, at Innichen in Tyrol, flows through Carinthia and Stiria, then along the confines of Slavonia and lower Hungary, and after a course of about 300 miles joins the Danube a little below Essig.

Drayton, a town in Shropshire, England, with a market on Wednesday, it is seated on the banks of the river Tern, at the N. E. end of the county, on the road from Shrewsbury to Newcastle. It has 3 tan yards, 2 paper mills, and 2 manufactures of hair cloth; 151 miles N. W. of London. Pop. in 1801, 3,162, and in 1821, 3,700.

* * There are 16 villages called Drayton, and 9 Draycott, in different parts of England. Dray is a Saxon word, but its application to the names of places is not very obvious; the etymologist must draw his own inferences respecting it.

Dresden, a city of Germany, and the capital of the kingdom of Saxony. It is divided by the Elbe into the old and new town, which are united by a grand bridge, and surrounded by strong fortifications. It has a castle, an academy of painting and sculpture, and a magnificent church for the Roman catholics, with a tower 300 feet in height, one Calvinist, and 11 Lutheran churches. The houses are built of freestone, almost all of the same height; and though the palaces are few, it is deemed the handsomest city in Germany. The palaces of Holland and Japan are full of curiosities from that country and China; and the picture gallery may claim precedence over every individual gallery in Italy. The royal palace has a tower 355 feet in height. Dresden is deservedly celebrated for its manufacture of porcelain, the repository for which is in the castle. Here are also manufactures of gold and silver lace, jewellery, paper-hangings, and wind-instruments of music, &c. &c. The arsenal contains specimens of the first invented fire arms, and a curious collection of arms of all ages and countries. The other public buildings of Dresden are the house of assembly of the Saxon diet, an academy for the young nobility, a military school, and several edifices for charitable institutions. It was taken by the king of Prussia in 1745, and again in 1756, but retaken in 1759; and it was bombarded by him in 1760, for nine days, when he was obliged to raise the siege. Dresden is further rendered memorable for its neighbourhood being the principal theatre of operations between the allied and French armies, during the greater part of the year 1813. The Russian and Prussian troops having entered it in the month of March, was obliged to quit it in May, after the battle of Lutzen; and Bonaparte afterwards held his head-quarters here for a long time. On the 26 and 27th of August of the same year, the allied army, 200,000 strong, under prince Schwartzburg, attempted to carry the town by assault; but Bonaparte having arrived from Silesia, with his guards, the night before the attack, repulsed them with great loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. It was at this time, the celebrated general Moreau, received a mortal wound, while in conversation with the Emperor of Russia. The allies, in consequence of this disaster, immediately commenced their retreat into Bohemia; and the French being too eager to profit by their success, had sent general Vandamme with about 30,000 men, into the mountains of that country to cut off their retreat. But on their arrival near Culm, they were assailed on all sides; and after a furious conflict, the whole army was nearly destroyed, and the commander with the whole of his staff were made prisoners. On the 6th of November, after the battle of Leipzig, marshal St. Cyr who remained in Dresden with a French force of 39,000 men, after a fruitless attempt to negotiate a retreat, was compelled to yield to an unconditional surrender. Prior to the spoliation by Prussia in 1756 Dresden contained about 65,000 inhabitants, from which period it progressively declined down to 45,000 in 1810, but since the restoration of peace in 1814, it has gradually increased, and in 1825 contained again a population of 54,000. In the vicinity are several fine gardens and public promenades, which serve to render Dresden one of the most agreeable abodes in the north of Europe. It is in the lat. of 51. 2. 50. N. and 13. 43. of W. long. 230 miles N. N. W. of Vienna, 240 N. N. E. of Munich, 100 S. by E. of Berlin, 190 E. of Cassel by way of Leipzig, from which it is distant 55 miles. See Pilnitz and Saxon.

Dreux, a town of France, in the department of Eure and Loire, with a considerable manufacture of cloth for the army. It is seated on the river Blaise, at the foot of a mountain, 48 m. W. by S. of Paris. It was burnt by Hen. II. of England, in 1186, taken by Hen. V. in 1421, and is farther celebrated for a battle fought in its neighbourhood, on the 18th of December 1562, between the army of the King of France and the protestants under the Prince of Conde, when the latter were defeated. It surrendered to Hen. IV. of France in 1593, and is now the seat of a prefect, with a pop. of 6,032 in 1825.

Drewnville, v. Cheshire Co. N. H. included in Walpole.

Driesen, a town of Brandenburg, in the New Mark, on an island, formed by the river Netze, near the Polish frontier, 20 miles E. of Landsberg.

Drillo, or Achates, r. Sicily, in the valley of Noto, which runs into the Mediterranean, 6 m. S. E. Terra Nuova.

Drinana Point, cape, Ireland, on N. coast of the bay of Donegal; 3 m. S. Killibegs.

Drin, or Drinaw, r. which rises in S. W. part of Servia, and runs into the Save, 32 m. W. Sabaoz.

Drinaza, r. Servia, which runs into the Save, 15 m. W. Sabaoz.

Dringenburg, t. Prussia. Minden; 6 m. E. S. E. Paderborn. Pop. 734.

Dringfort, t. Prussia; 9 m. N. E. Rastenburg.

Drino Nero, or Black Drino, or Drilo, r. E. Turkey, which rises in the lake near Akrida; joining the Drino Bianco, it takes the name of Drino only, and runs into the Adriatic; about 8 m. S. W. Alessio, forming a bay at its mouth, called the Gulf of Drino. It is navigable nearly 100 m. for large rafts.

Drissa, a town of Russia, in the government of Polotak, at the conflux of the Drissa with the Dwina, 20 m. W. N. W. of Polotak, and 272 S. of Petersburg.

Drista. See Silistria.

Drivastro, a town of European Turkey, in Albania, 20 m. N. E. of Dulcigno.

Drogheda, a seaport on the S. coast of Ireland, seated at the head of a bay on the banks of the river Boyne, which here divides the counties of Meath and Louth, Drogheda, being a town and county of itself, with a separate jurisdiction. It is a respectable town, and carries on a considerable trade in butter, grain, and coarse linens; the harbour is tolerably commodious, but its entrance is impeded for ships of large burthen by a bar. It is divided into three parishes; Oliver Cromwell took it by storm in 1649, and it was near here where the decisive battle was fought between the forces of William and James in 1691, when the latter were defeated. See Boyna. Drogheda is 24 m. N. of Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 18,300. It returns a member to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Droitwich, a borough in Worcestershire. Here are famous salt springs, which were in great celebrity at the period of the Norman conquest; from these is made much peculiarly fine white salt. It is seated on the Salwarp, 7 m. N. N. E. of Worcester, and 116 W. N. W. of London. It is connected with the river Severn by a canal, 7 m. in length, and the Birmingham and Worcester canal runs at a short distance, and by this means the salt is distributed over all parts of the kingdom. Droitwich is divided into four parishes, and returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 2,176.

Drome, a Department of France, takes its appellation from the river Drome, which crosses it, bounded by the department of the Upper Alps, Lower Alps, and Vaucluse; the Rhone bounds it on the west. The country is high, full of mountains and valleys; the soil in many parts unproductive. Valence is the capital. Pop. 253,372. Protestants, 34,000.

Drome, or Druna, a r. of France, which rises near Valdrome, passes by Die, Pontaix, Saillans, Crest, Livron, &c., and falls into the Rhone about 11 m. S. Valence.

Dromo, a small island in the Grecian Archipelago. Long. 24. E. lat. 39. 28. N.

Dromore, a town and parish in the county of Down, Ireland; the town is a bishop's see, the palace of the prelate is a stately edifice. It is 20 m. W. by N. of Downpatrick, and 66 N. of Dublin, on the road to Belfast. Pop. of the town in 1821, 1,861, and of the parish 12,769 more; there is another parish and town of the same name in the county of Tyrone. Pop. of the town 415, and of the parish 7,698.

Dromore, p.t. Lancaster Co. Pa.

Dronero, a town of Piedmont, at the foot of the Alps, on the river Maira, 15 m. S. S. W. of Saluzzo, and about the same distance W. by N. of Cuni. It contains 6 churches, and has a fine bridge across the river. Pop. about 6,500.

Drontheim, the most northerly of the four great dioceses of Norway, extending from the lat. of 62. 5. to 65. 20. N. being about 80 miles in mean breadth; it is intersected by several small streams, and the coast is indented with numerous inlets and bays, and flanked with numerous islands; although a dreary district, the industry of the inhabitants counteracts in a considerable degree the inhospitality of its position and climate. It is divided into 80 parishes containing a population of about 250,000, having considerably increased during the last and present century. The chief town of the same name is seated on a point of land, formed by a deep inlet, about 40 m. from the open sea, in the lat. of 63. 26. N. and 10. 22. of E. long., 253 m. N. E. of Bergen, about the same distance due N. of Christiana, and 360 N. W. of Stockholm. It was the residence of the ancient kings of Norway, and is now the principal trading town of the diocese, and exports a very considerable quantity of fir timber and deals, some pitch, tar, peltry, &c. It is the residence of the bishop of the diocese; the cathedral is a stately edifice; the houses are mostly built of wood, but the streets are commodious, and in the summer season this town is not an unpleasant residence. Pop. about 9,000.

Drosendorf, a town of Austria, with an ancient castle, seated on the Teyra, on the frontier of Moravia, 10 m. N. of Horn.

Drossen, a town of Brandenburg, in the New Mark, 14 m. S. E. of Custrin.

Drum, the name of two parishes in Ireland, one in the county of Mayo, and the other in Roscommon; there are also about thirty other parishes, and several villages in different parts of Ireland beginning with Drum, such as Drumara, Drumboe, Drummannon, &c. &c.

Drumsna, a town of Ireland, in the county of Leitrim, seated on the E. bank of the Shannon, 4 m. S. E. of Carrick, and 73 from Dublin, it is rather a neat town. Pop. in 1821, 606.

Drusenheim, a town of France in the department of Lower Rhine, seated on the Moselle, near the Rhine, 15 m. N. by E. of Strasburg.

Druses, a community of people in Syria, which had its origin in a fanatical persecution of a caliph of Egypt, against the Mahomedans. About the beginning of the 11th century, the caliph and his prophet (a native of Persia), both met a violent death, and such of their disciples (the Druses) as adhered to their tenets, fled for a refuge to the mountains of Lebanon, and Antilibanus; from whence they successively made war against the Crusaders, the Sultans of Aleppo, the Mamelukes and Turks; they were effectually subdued by Amurath III. in 1588, who imposed a regular tribute upon them, appointing an emir or chief whom he invested with executive power, and held him responsible for the payment of the tribute. This organization, however, the Druses soon turned against the Turks, with whom they have since been involved in repeated conflicts with alternate success; they still maintain a nominal independence, occupying about 70 miles of coast from Saïde the ancient Sidon, to Gebail or Djebail Bairut or Berat (which see) being their chief station. Their number is estimated at about 120,000, all the males being trained to arms. Their language is the Arabic; and they now appear to have but little religion of any kind, praying indifferently in Christian churches or Turkish mosques.

Dryburg, or Driburg, a town in the Prussian States, seated near the source of a stream, falling into the Weser, in the principality of Paderborn; it is pleasantly located and distinguished for its baths; 10 m. E. of the town of Paderborn.

Dublin, a maritime and fertile county on the E. coast of Ireland, being about 30 miles in extreme length, and 13 in mean breadth. Its capital a city of the same name is the capital of all Ireland, and in extent of population and architectural display is the second city of the British dominions in Europe, but in other respects inferior to either Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, or Edinburgh. For divisions, extent of superficies, population, &c. of the county of Dublin. See Ireland.

Dublin City, the capital of Ireland, is seated on the banks of the river Liffey, at its entrance into a bay of about 40 square miles in surface. The city lies up the river, about a mile from the bay, which is much more remarkable for its picturesque beauty on either side than for its navigable uses. This bay has been compared, rather idly, by some person in the first instance, with that of Naples; and after him, still more idly, by a thousand others. It forms a vast semicircular basin about eight miles in diameter, perilous on its shallows and breakers; which are, however, counteracted by a long and massive central mole running into it, with a lighthouse at its extremity, and two piers on either side at its entrance. A bold peninsular promontory, called the hill of Howth, shelters it on the north, having a range of lowlands from its base skirting the sea, luxuriantly wooded and varied, exhibiting here and there, a church, a mansion, or a pretty villa: whilst, on the south, it is bordered, at a short distance, by the picturesque and beautiful range of hills called the Wicklow mountains.

Dublin resembles the cities to be met on the continent much more than those of England, in the frequent juxtaposition of magnificence and meanness. The late Mr. Curran compared it to a man with a new coat over a dingy under dress. Its square area of about two miles and a half contains more noble edifices, wretched habitations, and public charities, than will be found within the same compass elsewhere. It is in form a rectangle, divided by the river into two nearly equal parts. We will suppose the spectator in the open space called College-green, on the left bank of the river and eastern side of the city. Looking eastward, he beholds the Bank of Ireland, formerly the parliament house, on his left; and the University immediately facing him, with a bronze equestrian statue of king William between.

The Bank of Ireland presents a noble, simple, and really classic mass of Grecian architecture. Its principal front is a grand Ionic colonnade, 147 feet long, resting on an elevated plane, reached by a flight of steps.

The front of the University, at a right angle with the Bank, is a long and florid Corinthian façade; the central columns surmounted by a pediment, and the whole terminated by Corinthian pavilions, with coupled pilasters of the same order. An octagonal vestibule, with the museum on the right, leads from the town into the first of three squares, which is built of hewn stone, and contains three principal buildings;—the chapel, presenting a beautiful Corinthian colonnade, on the left; the theatre or examination-hall on the right, exactly corresponding; and beyond this square, on the left hand, forming the smaller side of a rectangle, with a simple pilastered front, the hall in which the fellows and students of the whole university dine. The library, though inferior to to many others in the number of volumes, is one of the most complete and precious in Europe; containing rich materials of bibliography. It consists of two compartments; the ancient library of the university, entered at one end, and presenting a long and noble vista, with, on either side, a gallery and balustrade above. The books are admirably arranged in stalls beneath. At the remote end is a handsome pavilion, containing the Fagel library, a gem in its kind, once the family library of the Fagels, Grand Pensionaries of Holland, and purchased by the university. There is, again, archbishop Usher's library, left by him to the university, of which he was the founder,—containing many books noted and commented on with his own hand. There is, lastly, a collection of valuable, or at least curious, manuscripts, Persian, Arabic, Chinese, and Irish. Graduates of the university only, as in the Bodleian, have the privilege of reading; but studious strangers are admitted, upon a proper introduction to the provost and board. The chapel and theatre were built from the designs of sir W. Chambers; the latter contains a monumental marble group in memory of provost Baldwin, full of grace, sentiment, and beauty, and not sufficiently appreciated or known. There are also some mediocre portraits, including one of Swift, in whom, by the way, his Dublin alma mater could discover only ill nature and incapacity. The spectator returns to his former place, goes up Dame-street, and meets at its extremity on the left hand the Royal Exchange, on an elevated site, a quadrangle of which the principal façade presents a Corinthian portico surmounted by Corinthian pilasters and a balustrade, over which is visible the summit of the dome. The interior is a rotunda formed by twelve fluted Corinthian columns, and richly stuccoed. Immediately to the left is the Castle, the residence of the vice-regal court. The upper castle-yard or court is a quadrangle, with an Ionic structure crowned with a Corinthian tower and cupola, from which the vice-regal flag waves; and on the opposite side a colonnade leads to the vice-regal apartments. In the lower chapel-yard is observed a Gothic chapel built by a living architect of Dublin: it is a very graceful specimen of the pointed Gothic.

Crossing the river to the north side, the Law Courts present themselves; a noble edifice, ill-placed on a low site, looking immediately over the river: it is a modern building, the first stone having been laid by the duke of Rutland, lord lieutenant, in 1786. The whole façade is 450 feet, with a central portico of Corinthian columns surmounted by a pediment, and allegorical statues over these,—the wings connected in a right line with the front by arched screen walls with areas behind. The hall a circular area, lighted from the top and surmounted by a dome with a mosaic ceiling, is paced round and round, or occupied in groups, by barristers, attorneys, and strangers, while business is proceeding in the several courts which are in the periphery of the hall. Returning on the same side, and descending with the river, Sackville-street, a spacious and even noble avenue, opens on the left. At about half its length appears Nelson's pillar, a heavy column, placed in its centre, with a perverseness of absurdity rarely seen to break a fine and complete view. The new Post-office, a fine building, with an Ionic fluted portico surmounted by a pediment and several allegorical figures, is in this street immediately near Nelson's pillar; and at the remote end another handsome mass of buildings, comprises the Lying-in Hospital and Rotunda Assembly-rooms. A little further on are the King's Inns, comprising the record-office and prerogative court; a recent edifice, with much of architectural and well-executed sculptural ornament. Having retraced his steps to the river, and followed its course a short way, the observer beholds the Custom-house, with its principal front nearly at the water's edge—its centre a Doric portico, supporting an entablature and frieze rather too ornamental, with various allegorical groups single figures,—and a noble dome, supported by columns and surmounted at its vertex by a colossal statue of Hope,—placed there most inauspiciously,—for all idea of customs or commerce has been abandoned even in expectancy, and the building receives another destination. Crossing again to the left bank or south side of the town, the spectator should halt for a moment on Carliale-bridge to view Sackville-street,—unfortunately broken and disfigured by Nelson's pillar, but adorned by its own breadth and elegance,—the portico of the Post-office, and the Rotunda in the distance; the south front of the Custom-house, and a noble line of walled quays, over an innavigable river flowing into a bay without ships; Westmoreland-street, with on either side a portico of the bank and a pavilion of the university; and d'Olier-street, with the Dublin Library, and a view of the front of the new square of Trinity-college. A little further on to the south is the theatre, a handsome building, and adapted to its purposes, built in 1821 by Mr. Henry Harris, whose name is honourably associated with the English drama.

There are in Dublin five squares; three on the south and two on the north side of the river; of which one, called Stephen's-green, may be called magnificent, from its space, ornament, and edifices. The river is crossed by seven bridges within the city, all, with one exception, modern and well built, and one of them of cast iron. Sarah's bridge, so called from Sarah, countess of Westmoreland, who laid the first stone in 1791, is about a mile above the city; consisting of a single arch, beautifully constructed and of very picturesque effect.

Dublin is an archiepiscopal see, and is singular in the United Kingdom as having two cathedrals, both of which are more interesting for their antiquity and monumental associations than for their architecture. St. Patrick's cathedral, founded in 1190, but commenced in its present form in 1370, is a Gothic structure, beautiful only for its arched stuccoed ceiling; and containing, among many other monuments, that of Jonathan Swift, dean of St. Patrick's, "one who loved virtue, liberty, and his country; and here only released from the torture of his honest indignation."

Christ-church cathedral, founded, it is stated, in 1038, but constructed successively some centuries later, is a dilapidated Gothic edifice, containing some interesting monuments: among them that of earl Strongbow, the first English invader of Ireland. There are, besides the two cathedrals, nineteen churches and two chapels of ease; of which few are deserving of particular notice. St. Andrew's is a vain and unfinished attempt after the church of the Rotunda at Rome. St. Werburgh's exhibits the Ionic, Corinthian, and composite, in its facade; and contains the remains, but not the monument, of lord Edward Fitzgerald. St. George's is a modern edifice, with a handsome Ionic fluted portico and a light and lofty steeple.

There are in Dublin twenty Roman Catholic chapels. The metropolitan chapel, built by subscription, and begun in 1816, is in the best taste, — a large edifice, with a simple but majestic Doric portico, resting on an elevated plane, approached by a flight of steps, and sustaining a marble pediment. The places of worship for dissenting non-catholic congregations are also very numerous, and exceed, in proportion, the number in any other part of the United Kingdom. There are about a hundred public hospitals, and other benevolent institutions and private associations, for the relief, protection, reformation, and education of the poor.

Dublin contains one public and two large subscription libraries; the Dublin Society, for purposes of science and art; the royal Irish academy, and several others. Literature, however, in Dublin is rather an accessory accomplishment than a profession: there is no authorship, no publishing trade. The university sends forth well educated and disciplined generations, but does no more: the junior fellows are occupied with the "crambre repetita" of public and private lectures, and other academic duties, whilst the senior fellows live in opulence and learned ease.

The medical and surgical schools are well supplied with professors and all the other means of knowledge,—much frequented, and in high repute. Several attempts have been made in Dublin, but without success, to establish a school of art: men conscious of their genius, or who have proved it, migrate to London. From these may be singled out, without distinguishing invidiously, the president of the royal academy in London (Mr. Shee,) and Mr. Mulready.

The chief manufactures of Dublin are, what are called Irish poplins, tabinets, silks, cottons, woollens, and hardware,—of which last the extent does not at all equal the excellence.

Dublin occupies a square area of about 2 m. and a half. It is distant 102 m. from Belfast, 95 from Waterford, 122 from Limerick, and 156 from Cork. Lat. 53. 21. N. Long. 6. 0. 15. W. Pop. 200,000.

Dublin, p.t. Cheshire Co. N. H. 70 m. fr. Boston. Pop. 1,218. Also towns in Huntington, Bedford, Philadelphia and Montgomery Cos. Pa., Laurens Co. Geo. and Franklin Co. Ohio.

Dubois, a county of Indiana. Pop. 1,774. Fortersville is the chief town.

Dubro, a town of Russian Poland in the province of Volhynia, seated on the banks of a branch of the Przypiec, near the frontier of Galicia; it was formerly celebrated for its great annual fair. It is 24 miles S. E. of Lucko. Pop. about 6,500, chiefly Jews.

Duddington, a pleasant village on the S. side of Edinburgh, Scotland.

Duderstadt, a town of Germany, in the territory of Eichsfeld, 18 miles E. of Gottingen. Pop. about 4,000.

Dudley, a town of Worcestershire, Eng., insulated in the county of Stafford, 10 miles W. by N. of Birmingham, and 128 from London. It is a place of antiquity, having the remains of a castle, built about the year 700; the neighbourhood abounds in coal, iron, and limestone, and the town participates largely in the manufactures of the district; having about 20 establishments for the manufacture of nails, anvils, vices, tracery, and other heavy iron work; 10 other establishments for the manufacture of fenders and fire irons, 5 glass houses, and two other establishments for glass cutting; 3 malt and coffee mill makers, 20 malt ing houses, &c. &c. It has two churches, that of St. Thomas, recently rebuilt, is a beautiful structure with a lofty spire. The pop. which in 1801, was only 10,107, and in 1811, 13,925, in 1821 had increased to 18,211.

Dudley, a town in Worcester county, Massachusetts near the frontier of Connecticut, 20 m. S. of Worcester. Pop. 2,155.

Duffel, a town of the Netherlands, a few m. N. of Malines. Pop. about 3,000.

Duke of York Island, an island in the Pacific Ocean, discovered by commodore Byron, in 1765, lying N. of the Friendly islands. Long. 172. 30. W. lat. 7. 56. S.

Duke of York Island, an island in the Pacific Ocean, lying between New Britain and New Ireland, so named by captain Carteret, in 1767. The natives go entirely naked; are stout, well made, and of a light copper colour; their hair is woolly, but they dress it with grease and powder, and make it hang straight. Their huts are made chiefly of bamboo, and placed under the shade of cocoa-nut trees, with a fence before them, within which the plantain, banana, yam, sugar-cane, &c are cultivated. The island produces, besides the plants above-mentioned, betel-nuts, mangoes, bread-fruit, and guavas. Here are also dogs, hogs, poultry, and some spices. The nutmeg was seen by captain Hunter, who anchored in Port Hunter bay, in this island, in 1791. Long. 151. 20. E. lat 4. 7. S.

Duke's County, in Massachusetts. See Martha's Vineyard.

Dulas, a village of Wales in the isle of Anglesey, 10 m. N. W. of Beaumaris. It stands on the Irish sea at the mouth of a river of the same name; and is much frequented on account of the corn and butter trade, and for fern-sakes and kelp. Pop. in 1821, 220.

* * There are several small rivers in different parts of Wales, named Dulas, and also a village in Herefordshire.

Dulcigno, a town of European Turkey, in Albania, seated at the mouth of the river Boina, 15 m. S. W. of Scutari, which see. Long. 18. 56. E. lat. 42. 23. N. Pop. about 8,000.

Duleek, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Meath, formerly the see of a bishop, but now an inconsiderable place. It is seated near the S. bank of the river Boyne, 3 m. S. W. of Drogheda, and 21 N. by W. of Dublin. Pop. of the town in 1821, 1,030, and of the parish 2,668 more.

Dulken, a town of the Prussian states, lying about midway between the Rhine and the Maese, 20 m. N. by W. of Juliers. Pop. about 4,000.

Dulwich, a beautifully sequestered village in Surrey, 4 m. S. of London. It is famous for a college, founded by Edward Alleyn a comedian, called the college of God's Gift; to which is attached a gallery containing a beautiful collection of paintings; the village is seated in a vale. Pop. included with Camberwell, which see.

Dumaring, a town of the island of Borneo, on the E. coast. Long. 117. 30. E., lat. 2. 10. N.

Dumbarton, County of, sometimes called Dumbarton, formerly Lennox, formed a narrow strip of territory between the lowlands and highlands of Scotland, extending W. from near the Frith of Forth, for about 25 miles to the mouth of the Clyde, and then N. for about 25 miles more between Loch Long and Loch Lomond, the mean breadth not exceeding 5 miles; the grand canal from the Clyde to the Forth runs along the E. part of the county, which is divided into 12 parishes: the principal towns and villages are Cumbernald and Kirkintilloch in the E. part; Kirkpatrick, Killpatrick, Dumbarton, Cardross, Bonhill, and Kilmarnock in the centre; and Roseneath, Row, Lup, and Aroquhar in the N. The cotton manufacture is carried on in the central part of the county, and illicit distillation in the N.

Dumbarton, the chief town of the preceding county, is a royal burgh, seated on the N. bank, of the Clyde, at the junction of the Leven, the outlet of Loch Lomond; on a point of land formed by the junction of the two rivers is a castle, occupying a very commanding position, and formerly deemed the key of the pasturage between the lowlands on the W., as well as commanding the navigation of the Clyde. The town consists principally of one long street, in the form of a crescent, parallel with the Leven; over which is a handsome bridge of five arches. It has a handsome church, with a lofty spire erected at the close of the last century. Its principal manufacture is glass; a portion of the inhabitants are employed in the cotton manufacture in connexion with Glasgow. It has a convenient port for small vessels, and a quay, but no custom house, being included in the port of Greenock. It is 12 miles W. N. W. of Glasgow. Pop. in 1801, 2,541, and in 1821, 3,481.

Dumboos, or Domboos, a salt lake on the north frontier of Bournou, in the interior of North Africa, from whence much salt is carried to Agades and other parts of western Africa; there is a considerable town of the same name on the W. side of the lake, which is S. of the Tropic of Cancer, in the long. of 21. 50. E.

Dumfries, a county of the S. of Scotland, being about 65 miles in extreme length from E. to W., and 30 in mean breadth its superficial area being 1,006 square miles; it is bounded on the N. by the counties of Ayr, Lanark, Peebles, Selkirk, and Roxburg, and E. S. E. by the English border, W. S. W. by Kirkcudbrightshire, and S. by the Solway Frith: is intersected from N. to S. by three considerable rivers, abundant in salmon and trout, viz. the Nith, Annan, and Esk, all running from the N. into Solway Frith, and is divided into 44 parishes, including four royal burghs, viz. Dumfries, Annan, Lochmaber, and Sanquhar. A great part of this county is mountainous, over-spread with heath, well stocked with game, and affording pasturage to numerous herds of sheep and black cattle, which are driven into England, in great numbers; the valleys watered by the three rivers before mentioned, and the coast bordering on the Frith, are fertile both in pasture and tillage; the mountains in the N. W. part of the county contain a bed of rich lead ore, yielding a small portion of silver; coals and lime abound over the greater part of the county, and on the English border both copper and iron have been found; the county also contains a vein of antimony, and two mineral springs. It has no manufactures of importance.

Dumfries, a royal burgh, and chief town of the preceding county, seated on the E. bank of the river Nith, where that river forms the boundary between the counties of Dumfries and Kirkcudbright, and about 7 miles above its entrance into Solway Frith. Dumfries is a port of entry, but its external commerce is inconsiderable (except coastwise); it derives its chief importance from being the assize town for the county of Kirkcudbright as well as for Dumfries, and from being the seat of the commissary and sheriff court and of the Presbytery and Synod, while the agreeableness of its locality renders it the focus of gaiety and fashion for all the S. W. part of Scotland. It has 2 bridges over the Nith, one of them ancient, the other modern and elegant, 2 churches, a catholic chapel, and 4 dissenting places of worship. Its other public buildings are the town house, guild-hall, infirmary, house of correction and lunatic asylum; Dumfries is 38 m. W. N. W. of Carlisle, 75 S. W. of Edinburgh, 79 S. S. E. of Glasgow, and 80 E. N. E. of Port Patrick. Pop. in 1801, 7,288, and 1821, 11,052. It is the place of interment of Burns. Dummer, t. Coos Co. N. H., 20 m. fr. Lancaster. Pop. 65.

Dun, a town of France, in the department of Meuse, on the river Meuse, 15 m. N. N. W. of Verdun.

Dun le Roi, a town of France, in the department of Cher, on the river Auron, 15 m. S. of Bourges.

Dunamunda, a town of Russia, in the government of Riga. It formerly belonged to the duchy of Courland, but was taken by the Swedes in their wars with the Poles. In 1700 it was taken by the Poles, and retaken the next year by Charles XII. In 1710 it was taken by Peter the Great. It is situate at the mouth of the Dwina, 15 m. N. W. of Riga, to which it is the outport, and 20 N. of Mittau. Long. 23. 41. E., lat. 57. 5. N.

Dunaburgh, a town of Russia, in the government of Vitepsk, seated on the E. bank of the Dwina, about 100 m. above Riga. The Russians formed extensive entrenchments near this place in 1812, but abandoned them on the approach of the French towards Moscow. Pop. about 6,000.

Dunbar, p.t. Fayette Co. Pa.

Dunbar, a town of Haddingtonshire, on the S. E. coast of Scotland, seated on the shore of a bay opening in the German Ocean, the harbour, defended by a battery, is difficult of access, but safe and commodious when attained. It is a port of entry, but its foreign commerce is inconsiderable; it has a yard for ship-building, a ropery, soap work, one or two iron foundries; exports a considerable quantity of corn to the London market, and the inhabitants in the season pursue the herring fishery with much industry. Here was anciently a castle, now in ruins, which stood on a rock, and before the use of artillery, was deemed impregnable. Under the rock are two natural arches, through which the tide flows; and between the harbour and the castle, is a stratum of vast basaltic columns of red stone, interspersed with veins of jasper. Dunbar is distinguished in various periods of Scottish history through several centuries, and was formerly deemed of much greater importance than at present. It was created a royal burgh about the middle of the 14th century. The parish extends for about 9 m. along the coast, and in 1801 contained a pop. of 3,951, and in 1821, 5,272. It is 27 m. E. of Edinburgh, and 29 N. W. of Berwick on Tweed. Lat. 56. N. and 2. 30. of W. long.

Dunbarton, p.t. Merrimack Co. N. H. 65 m. fr. Boston. Pop. 1,067.

Dunblane, or Dumblane, a town of Scotland in Perthshire, formerly a bishop's see, with a magnificent cathedral; it is 6 m. N. of Stirling. Pop. in 1821, 3,135.

Duncansby, or Dungisby Head, the extreme N. E. point of Great Britain, in the lat. of 58. 40. N. and 3. 8. of W. long.

Dunchurch, a village in Warwickshire, Eng. 80 m. N. W. of London on the mail coach road to Liverpool and to Holyhead, by Birmingham, which makes it a place of great intercourse; it derives its name from its situation on the border of what was formerly an extensive heath, called Dunsmore heath, celebrated for a legendary tale of a cow of enormous size, which roamed upon it.

Dundalk, a parish and town on the E. coast of Ireland, in the county of Louth, and of which it is the assize and chief town. The town is seated at the mouth of a small river, falling into a bay of the same name. It participates largely in the linen manufacture, and is distinguished for a manufacture of fine cambrics, established in 1737. It has a custom house, and an elegant town hall, and other public buildings. Pop. in 1821, 9,256, and the parish 3,096 more. It is 18 m. N. of Drogheda, and 12 S. of Newry. It returns a member to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Dundee, a seaport of Scotland, seated at the S. extremity of Angus, or Forfarshire, on the N. shore of the Frith of Tay, which forms a convenient and commodious harbour for ships of large burthen. Next to Edinburgh and Glasgow, Dundee is the most manufacturing and commercial town in Scotland; independent of its extensive coasting trade, it imports a large quantity of flax and other products direct from the Baltic, and employs several ships in the Greenland whale fishery. Its manufactures consist of sail-cloth, cotton, bagging, osenaburgs and other heavy linen fabrics, and coloured sewing threads. The town consists of 4 principal streets, diverging from a square in the centre; the public buildings are a town house, trades hall, infirmary, orphan and lunatic asylum, 3 churches, and a theatre. Dundee was erected into a royal burgh in 1165, and has been exposed to the repeated ravages of the contending parties which have prevailed in Scotland since that period; the last time it suffered from such cause was in the time of Cromwell, when it was taken by assault and given up to pillage by the troops under general Monk, who shared 260 a man from the booty they obtained. It is 22 m. E. of Perth, and 42 N. E. of Edinburgh. Lat. 56. 27. N. and 3. 3. of W. long. Pop. in 1801, 26,064, and in 1821, 30,575.

Dundonald, a village S. of Irvine, in Ayrshire, Scotland, abounding in excellent coal. The cotton manufacture is also carried on in the villages. Pop. in 1801, 1,240, and in 1821, 2,482.

Dunfermline, a royal burgh of Scotland, in Fifeshire, seated near the S. W. extremity of the county about 3 m. from the north shore of the Frith of Forth. It is celebrated for its once magnificent abbey, which fell a prey to the plundering army of Edward I., and as the place of interment of Malcolm Canmore, the founder of the abbey; 7 other Scottish monarchs, 5 queens, and several of the most eminent persons who figure in the Scottish history. Dunfermline has been celebrated in latter times for its extensive manufacture of fine linen, and still ranks among the most important manufacturing towns of Scotland. The town is well built on an eminence, and commands some beautiful prospects of the surrounding country; its public buildings consists of a town house, an elegant guildhall, &c. It is 17 m. W. of Edinburgh. Pop. in 1801, 9,980, and in 1821, 13,681.

Dungannon, a town of Ireland, in the S. E. part of the county of Tyrone. It returns a member to the parliament of the United Kingdom. It is 11 m. N. by W. of Armagh, and 73 from Dublin. Pop. in 1821, 3,243.

Dungarvon, a town of Ireland, seated at the head of a bay, in the county of Waterford; although the harbour is safe and convenient, it is not a port of entry, its principal trade consists of potatoes and fish, for the Dublin market. It returns a member to the parliament of the United Kingdom, and is frequented in the summer season for sea bathing; the principal object of the town is the ruin of an ancient castle, 17 m. W. by S. of Waterford, in the lat of 52. 2. N. and 7. 35. of W. long. Pop. in 1821, 5,105.

Dungeness, a celebrated promontory forming the S. E. point of the county of Kent, Eng. at the entrance into the straits of Dover; the lighthouse is in the lat. of 50. 55. 1. N. and 0. 57. 48. of E. long.

Dunkeld, a town of the highlands of Scotland, seated on the N. bank of the river Tay, in a delightfully romantic part of the county of Perth.—It was the capital of ancient Caledonia; and at an early period a Pictish king founded here a monastery of Culdees, which was converted into a bishopric by David I. in 1130, and for a length of time held the first rank in Scotland. The choir of the cathedral is still entire, and serves for the parish church. At a more recent period it was much frequented as a place of fashionable retreat, and for obtaining goat's whey; but this practice has ceased. The town and surrounding country is claimed by the Duke of Argyll, as his exclusive property, and as such, he has converted the whole of the adjacent vicinity to his own immediate profit and gratification; here is an elegant bridge of 7 arches over the Tay. Dunkeld is the chief market town of the highlands; it is 15 miles N. of Perth, on the line of the military road to fort Augustus and Inverness. Pop. in 1821, 1,364.

Dunford, a township in Greene Co. Pa.

Dunkirk, a seaport of France, in the department of Nord. It was taken from the Spaniards by the English and French in 1658, and put into the hands of the English, but sold to the French by Charles II. in 1662. Louis XIV. made it one of the best fortified ports in the kingdom; but all the works are demolished, and the basins filled up, in consequence of the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713. The French afterwards resumed the works; but they were ordered to be demolished at the peace of 1763. They continued thus till the peace of 1793, when the works were again resumed; and the next year it was declared a free port. The English attempted to besiege this place in 1793, but were obliged to retire with loss. Dunkirk is divided into the old and new town, is well built, has a spacious market place, and an elegant modern built church; as a seaport it is now but of little note. It is the seat of a prefect, and in 1825 contained a population of 23,012; 16 m. E. by N. of Calais.

Dunstaffnage, a castle of Scotland in Argyleshire, one of the first seats of the Pictish and Scottish monarchs. Here was long preserved the famous stone, used as the coronation seat of the Scottish monarchs, which was removed to Scone by Kenneth II., and thence by Edward I., in 1296, to Westminster abbey, where it now remains as an appendage to the coronation chair. Some of the ancient regalia still continue in the castle; and near it is a small roofless chapel, of elegant architecture, where several of the kings of Scotland are said to be interred. It stands on a promontory, almost insulated, at the entrance of Loch Etive, 24 m. N. W. of Inverary.

Dunster, a town in Somersetshire, Eng. It has a castle, on a steep knoll; and at one corner of the terrace is an ancient turret, supposed to be part of the original castle, built in the time of William I. A priory stood on the N. W. side of the castle, part of which now serves for the parish church. It stands on the edge of a vale, near the Bristol channel, 20 m. N. W. of Taunton, and 161 W. of London. Pop. 895.

Dunwich, a borough in Suffolk, Eng. It was formerly a bishop's see, and had many churches which have been swallowed up by the sea. The remains of two churches and a palace are the only marks left of its former greatness. It is seated at the top of a loose cliff 24 miles S. of Yarmouth, and 100 N. of London; it returns 2 members to parliament. Pop. in 1821, 200.

• • There are numerous other towns and villages in England, the names of which begin with Dun, a Saxon word signifying a down or level place, or country. There are also a number more in Ireland, and Scotland, but none that merit any particular mention.

Duren, or Deuren, a town of the Prussian states of the Rhine, on the E. bank of the Roer, in the duchy of Juliers, 15 m. E. of Aix-la-Chapelle. Pop. about 4,700.

Durham, a maritime county, on the N. E. coast of England, bounded on the S. and S. W. by the river Tees, which divides it from Yorkshire; the western extremity of the county juts upon Westmoreland and Cumberland, and the rivers Derwent and Tyne divide it from Northumberland on the N.; the line of the coast from the mouth of the Tees to the Tyne, is about 32 miles, but in its extreme extent from N. to S. the distance is 36 miles, and from E. to W. about 40 miles; being, however of a triangular form, its superficial area does not exceed 1,061 square miles. All the W. part of the county is mountainous, some of the peaks rising upwards of 2,000 feet above the level of the sea: from these mountains rises the river Wear, which by its circuitous course and collateral streams, waters all the interior parts of the county. The chief characteristic of this county, is the coal mines, which yield about two million tons annually, chiefly for the supply of London, and the E. and S. E. parts of England. The river and coasts abound in salmon and other excellent fish, while the E. and S. E. parts of the county yield a surplus of agricultural produce, both in grain and cattle: it owns also a considerable extent of shipping, employed chiefly in the conveyance of its coal, the value of which, including the freight and its supply of agricultural produce, together with some lead, iron, and mill-stones, constitute an exchangeable amount, exceeding £1,000,000 per annum. The principal towns besides the capital of the same name, are Stockton, Darlington, and Bernard castle, on the N. bank of the Tees; Gateshead, and South Shields on the S. bank of the Tyne; Monk Wearmouth, Bishop's Wearmouth, and Sunderland, at the mouth of the Wear; Bishop's Auckland, Chester-le-Street, &c. in the interior.

Durham City, the chief place, and capital of the preceding county, is seated on the banks of the river Wear, about the centre of the county, on the line of the great high road from London to Edinburgh, 10 miles from the sea in a direct line, about 20 from the mouth of the Wear by the course of the stream, 14 from the Tyne at Newcastle, 19 from the Tees at Darlington, 242 in a meridional line, and 255 by the line of road N. by W. of London. It was created a bishop's see, by a king of Northumberland prior to the conquest, who out of devotion conferred the whole county of Durham upon St. Cuthbert, a monk of Landisfarne, its first bishop, and his successors for ever. This grant was confirmed by William the Norman Conqueror, who constituted it a principality, or county palatine; hence the county is sometimes designated the principality of Durham; and the revenue of the see justifies the appellation, it being the richest in England. The cathedral was founded towards the close of the 11th century, and is a magnificent edifice, upwards of 400 feet in length, seated on an eminence 80 feet above the surface of the river; the principal tower is 214 feet in height. Besides the cathedral there are six other churches, three of them fine edifices, two Roman catholic, and several dissenting places of worship. Durham has also a stately castle, founded by William the Norman, now the bishop's palace, and several public buildings more immediately belonging to the city; while the goal, house of correction, courts and governor's house for county purposes, have all been recently rebuilt in a handsome style. There are three bridges over the river; and on the whole, the city of Durham presents a very interesting and imposing aspect and is celebrated in several pages of English history. It returns two members to parliament; market on Thursday; it has no manufacture of importance. Pop. in 1801, 7,530, and in 1821, 9,822.

On the principal rock (for the rest are under water) Mr. Winstanley built a light-house in 1700, which was destroyed by a storm in 1703, and the projector perished in it. In 1709 another, built of wood, was erected by Mr. Rudyard, which was consumed by fire in 1755. Within four years after, one was built by Mr. Smeaton, which also was burnt down in 1770; and another, of stone, was completed by him in 1774, which has hitherto withstood the fury of the elements. The building to the height of 33 feet from the foundation, is a solid mass of stones, engrafted into each other; above this are four rooms, one over the other, and at the top a gallery and lantern. It is nearly 80 feet high; and its distance from the Ram Head, the nearest point of land is 12 m. Long. 4. 24. W., lat. 50. 8. N.

Edinburghshire, or Mid Lothian, a county of Scotland, bounded on the N. by the Frith of Forth, E. by the shires of Haddington, Berwick, and Roxburg, S. by those of Selkirk, Peebles, and Lanark, and W. by Linlithgowshire. It is divided into 31 parishes, comprising an area of 354 square miles. The soil is fertile, and produces corn of all sorts with plenty of grass; also coal, iron, limestone, and black marble. The principal rivers are the N. and S. Esk, Leith, Amond, and Gala, all flowing into the Frith of Forth. See Scotland.

Edinburgh, the capital of Scotland stands on the southern shore of the Frith of Forth about a mile and a half from the sea. The situation of this interesting city is worthy of the capital of such a romantic land. Built on three lofty eminences, the interior arrangement of its streets and public edifices, and the surrounding scenery, afford a spectacle of the greatest beauty and variety. The castle, from which it originated, is built on the rocky verge of the central hill, and marks, with Holyrood-house on the opposite side, the limits of the Old Town. The northern division is occupied by the New Town, which is as remarkable for the neatness of its buildings and the elegance of its streets and squares as the more ancient quarter is for its closeness and irregularity. The two divisions are connected by a bridge thrown over the intervening hollow, and an artificial hillock called the Mound. The southern quarter is less distinguished for regularity of plan than the New Town, but contains several important public buildings, and is joined to the other parts of the city by Bridge-street, formed of the north and south bridges, which respectively cross the two lakes, now dry, that formerly separated the different eminences on which it stands. About a mile and a half distant is the Frith of Forth. On the east rise, the precipitous rocks named Calton-hill, Arthur's-seat, and Salisbury-crag; the Corstorphine-hills bound the prospect on the west; and the Pentland mountains, with those of Braid, form the romantic landscape of the south. The principal part of the Old Town consists of the High-street, which is more than a mile long, and in some parts ninety feet wide; of Cowgate, which runs parallel with the former; and of innumerable lanes and alleys which form the communication between these great avenues. Owing to the narrowness of the inferior streets, and to the extreme height of the houses in the larger ones, this quarter of the city has to strangers an unpleasant appearance; but when viewed without relation to the advantages of domestic comfort, there is something very imposing in its massy extent of building; while the beautiful bridge across the southern valley, covered as it is on each side by rows of handsome houses, offers an object as picturesque as it is singular. The New Town is intersected by George-street, which is terminated by St. Andrew's-square on the east, and Charlotte-square on the west, and is 115 feet wide. The principal streets parallel with this are Prince's-street and Queen-street, which are crossed by others of proportionate width and extent. But every year is adding to the size and beauty of this elegant capital. The road by which it is connected with Leith has become a street, and the new road over the Calton-hill has opened another magnificent passage for its growing wealth.

Of the public buildings of Edinburgh the most interesting are the palace and abbey of Holyrood. The former is a quadrangular edifice, surrounding a spacious court, the sides of which are ornamented with piazzas. The west front is supported by circular towers at the angles, and has a portico and cupola resting on Doric columns. It was in a small apartment of the north-west tower that Rizzio was murdered while attending the unfortunate queen Mary; and the bedchamber which she occupied, with some relics of its furniture, are still shown. The great gallery is 150 feet long by 72 wide; and is now used by the nobility when they elect their sixteen representatives in parliament. Of the ancient abbey only the walls remain standing, but the spot marked out as its burial-ground possesses the dust of a long line of kings. The castle is at present employed as a barrack, and can hold about 3,000 men. It was once a place of great strength; the rock on which it is situated being near 200 feet above the plain beneath, and in some places overhanging the base. Palisades, a dry ditch surmounted by a draw-bridge, and two batteries to protect the gate, form the principal defences of the fortress; the area of the whole occupying about seven acres.

Of the religious edifices of Edinburgh, the church of St. Giles is the principal and the most ancient. Charles I. made it the cathedral of the new diocese, and it was a collegiate church as early as the year 1466. It is built in the form of a cross, and occupies one entire side of the Parliament-square. The most remarkable circumstance connected with it is, that it is divided into four parts, each of which is a distinct church. It is here also that the General Assembly is held, and that the affairs of the Scottish church are ordered by its ruling ministers. The part of the building most admired is the elegant tower and spire, which rise from the centre of the edifice to the height of 161 feet, and are ornamented by richly wrought arches. Of the other churches it is only necessary to mention that of Trinity college, founded by Mary of Gueldres in 1462, a noble Gothic structure; and those of St. Andrew's and St. George, which are elegant buildings of modern erection. Besides these, which belong to the national church, there are six episcopal chapels, of which St. Paul's and St. John's, raised within late years, are amongst the grandest of modern structures: the former is after the model of King's college chapel, Cambridge; and the latter is a parallelogram, the parts of which are composed in richest Gothic style. A Roman Catholic chapel built in 1814, is greatly admired for a similar species of architecture; and almost every class of dissenters has its appropriate place of worship.

The university was founded in the year 1582, but at that period had only one professor: another, however, was soon after appointed, and then a third, till the number increased to twenty-seven, the present establishment. The original building belonging to the university was so ill adapted to its increasing celebrity, that in 1789 it was partly taken down, and a new structure commenced; but from want of funds the work was for many years delayed, and was not till of late resumed, and then on a diminished scale. The university library contains more than 50,000 volumes; and the number of students is, on an average, 2,000. Next to this establishment we may mention the high school, founded in the sixteenth century, and consisting of a rector, four masters, and near 500 scholars.

The charitable institutions are numerous, and some of them richly endowed. The hospital, established by the celebrated jeweller of James VI., George Heriot, is a handsome Gothic edifice; and under its venerable roof 180 boys are boarded and educated with benevolent care. Watson's hospital is also on a similar plan; and there are others for the support of decayed tradesmen, their wives, and daughters. Of the literary and scientific institutions of Edinburgh, the Royal, Antiquarian, and Wernerian societies are deservedly distinguished; and there is no other city in Europe where the men of letters and scientific ability bear so great a proportion to the number of the inhabitants.

No particular manufacture is carried on in this city; the working and trading classes being chiefly supported by the production and sale of the more general articles of domestic use. Edinburgh sends one member to parliament. Distance N. N. W. of London 396 miles. Lat. 55. 58. N. Long. 3. 12. W. Pop. in 1821, 112,335. See Leith.

Edisto, a river in South Carolina, which after a course of about 140 m. falls into the Atlantic Ocean by two channels, about 40 m. S. of Charleston. The island, formed by the divergence of the stream, contains about 3,000 inhabitants, the greater part of whom are slaves.

Edmonton, a village of Middlesex, England, 6 m. N. of Shoreditch Church, London, on the great high road to Edinburgh. It has nothing but its thoroughfare to entitle it to notice. Pop. in 1801, 5,093, and in 1821, 7,900.

Edwards, a county on the E. frontier of the state of Illinois, bounded by the great Wabash river, 35 m. from S. to N. and about 30 in mean breadth, the little Wabash intersects the W. side of the county; and towards the S. part, between the two rivers. Pop. 1,649. Albion is the capital.

Egmont op den Hoef, a village of North Holland, 3 m. W. by S. of Alkmaer. It appears to have been a considerable town, but was destroyed in 1573, by the enraged Spaniards, after their failure before Alkmaer. It now exhibits extensive and picturesque ruins perhaps the only ruins in all Holland. Near it are two other villages; Egmont op Zee, a m. to the W. on the sea-coast; and Egmont Binnen, nearly two m. to the S.; where a bloody but undecisive battle was fought, in 1799, between the allied English and Russian army, and the French and Dutch.

Egremont, a town in Cumberland, Eng. On the W. side is an artificial mount, with the ruins of a castle; and 3 m. S. E. of the town, in the wooded vale of the Calder, are the remains of the Calder abbey. Egremont, is seated near the Irish sea, on the river Eden, 5 m. S. S. E. of Whitehaven, and 269 N. W. of London.

Egypt, a country comprising the N. E. extremity of Africa, having about 400 m. of coast, between Alexandria, and El Arish, including the indentations of lakes and bays; Cape Bourlos its N. extremity is in lat. 31. 36. N., from which point it extends inland to the frontier of Nubia, in the lat. of about 24. 30. giving a length of about 500 m. while its boundaries E. and W. are very undefined. It is divided from Asia, at its N. E. extremity, by an extensive desert, and further S. by the gulf of Suez, and the Red sea, (see Suez.) It is bounded on the W. by the deserts of Barca and Libya, and parts of Africa but little known, and in its extreme limits from W. to E. may be considered as comprising about 2 degrees of long. or 122 statute m. between 31. and 32. E.; the inhabited parts however, do not exceed more than 15 to 25 m. on each side of the Nile, which runs in a direction N. by W. through the whole extent of Egypt, except for about 120 m. above its entrance into the Mediterranean, where it diverges into two main and numerous collateral channels. This is called the Delta of the Nile, comprising an area of about 12,000 square m. studded over, the greater part, with towns and villages.

In the marshes of this region grows that remarkable reed grass celebrated in ancient times by the name of papyrus, the leaves of which afforded the first materials for making paper. It has a tapering stem surmounted by a tuft or plume of hairy leaves.

This country, so celebrated in history for its fertility, its policy and arts, appears first to have attained pre-eminence under the renowned Sesostris about 1720 years antecedent to the christian era. For nearly four centuries prior to this period, Egypt appears to have been divided into several petty sovereignties, under what was then termed Hycsos or Shepherd Kings, of whom Amasis at Thetmosis was the first who gained an ascendancy over his compeers; this ascendancy was acquired about 100 years prior to that of Sesostris; and it appears to have been the descendants of Amasis who were ruling in Egypt at the time of the death in western Asia, when Jacob and his family established themselves in the valley of Gessen, or Goshen, east of the Nile. From the descendants of Amasis and Sesostris sprung the race of the Pharaohs, who ruled over Egypt for 12 centuries, until Cambyes king of Persia, became master of it, 525 years B. C. By the Pharaoh's all those wonderful structures were raised, and works perfected, which we cannot behold without astonishment. These are, the pyramids, the labyrinths, the immense grottos in Thebaid, the obelisks, temples and pompous palaces, the lake Mæris, and the vast canals, which served both for trade, and to irrigate the land. After this conquest, Cambyes demolished the temples, disinterred the remains of Amasis and burnt them, and persecuted the priests. This country continued under the Persian yoke till the time of Alexander of Macedon, who having conquered Persia, built the city of Alexandria. He was succeeded by Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, 324 years B. C. Ten kings of that name succeeded each other, till Cleopatra, the sister of the last Ptolemy, ascended the throne; when Egypt became a Roman province, and continued so till the reign of Omar, the second caliph of the successors of Mahomet, who drove out the Romans after it had been in their hands 700 years. When the power of the caliphs declined in the 13th century, Saladin set up the empire of the Mamelouks who in time became so powerful, that they extended their dominions over a great part of Africa, Syria, and Arabia. Next, about 1570, Egypt yielded to the arms of Selim, the 2nd emperor of the Turks, under whose dominion it still continues.

The present inhabitants are composed of four different races of people; the Turks, who assume to be masters of the country; the Saracen Arabs, who were conquered by the Turks; the Copts, who were descended from the first Egyptians that became Christians; and the Mamelouks, who were originally Circassian or Mingrelian slaves, and being the only military force, continued for centuries to be the real masters of the country; and Egypt had been for many years, distracted by the civil wars between the different contending beys, by which its 24 provinces were governed. The famous Hassan Ali, the Turkish admiral, gained several victories over them in 1786; but though he repressed, he could not totally subdue them. The French invaded Egypt in 1798, under Bonaparte, who defeated the beys in several engagements; but after the departure of Bonaparte, a strong British force arrived to aid the country, and the French were expelled in 1801. But the Turkish Pacha, finding the power of the Mamelouks broken by their conflicts with the French, partly by treachery and partly by force, succeeded in driving them out of Egypt into Nubia.

The complexion of the Egyptians is of a dusky brown, they are generally indolent and cowardly; and the lower class are disgustingly filthy in their persons; the richer sort do nothing all day but drink coffee, smoke tobacco, and sleep; and they are ignorant, proud, haughty, and ridiculously vain. But the Copts are an ingenious people, and have great skill in business. From March to November, the heat, to an European, is almost insupportable; but the other months are more temperate. The S. winds which occur at intervals, from February to the end of May, are by the natives called poisonous winds, or the hot winds of the deserts; they are of such extreme heat and aridity, that no animated body exposed to it can withstand its fatal influence; and for the three days that it generally lasts, the streets are deserted. The sands are so subtle, that they penetrate into the closets, chests, and cabinets, which, with the hot winds, are probably the cause of sore eyes being so very common here. It rains very seldom in Egypt; but that want is fully supplied by the annual inundation of the Nile.

When the waters retire, all the ground is covered with mud; then the corn is harrowed into it, and in the following March there is usually a plentiful harvest. But some lands are never fallow, and yield three harvests annually; particularly in Lower Egypt, where sowing and reaping are going on incessantly, wherever the water of the river can be obtained for irrigation. There is no place in the world better furnished with corn, flesh, fish, sugar, fruits, and all sorts of garden vegetables; and in Lower Egypt, oranges, lemons, figs, dates, almonds, cassia, and plantains, are produced in great plenty. Lentils form a considerable article of food to the inhabitants of Upper Egypt, who rarely enjoy the luxury of rice; and onions remarkably mild and of the purest white continue to be a favourite diet among all classes.

The animals of Egypt are tigers, hyenas, antelopes, apes, black-cattle, fine horses, large asses, the camelion, crocodiles, hippopotami, the cerastes, or horned viper, and a kind of rat called ichneumon. This animal is domesticated among the Egyptians, as the cat is among us. He destroys rats and mice, and hunts also birds, serpents, lizards and insects. He sucks the eggs of the crocodile, and even kills the young ones when they first come out of the shell. It is a fable however, that the ich-neumon enters the jaws of the Crocodile while he is asleep and devours his entrails. This animal was so highly esteemed for his services that he was deified by the ancient Egyptians.

Among the birds may be mentioned eagles, hawks, pelicans, water fowls of all kinds, and the ibis, which resembles a duck, and was deified by the ancient Egyptians, on account of its destroying serpents and noxious insects.

The pyramids of Egypt, so justly celebrated as evidences of human labour and art, are all built on rocky and sandy plains; the largest is 500 feet in height, and covers eleven acres of ground. They are situated in the south part of the Delta, or Lower Egypt, on the W. bank of the Nile. Egypt is now spoken of as divided into three parts, Lower, or the Delta, Middle, and Upper. During the reign of part of the Pharaohs, Thebes in Upper Egypt in the lat. of 25. 25. appears to have been the capital of the whole country; afterwards transferred to Memphis, in the lat. of 29.; and during the reign of the Ptolemies, the seat of the empire was transferred to Alexandria, whilst at the present time Cairo is the seat of government. Under the present Pasha, Mahomed Ali, who has ruled since 1798, Egypt has made advances in enterprize and cultivation almost without a precedent; and cotton wool, indigo, sugar, and grain, are again forming the basis of an extensive external commerce. Respecting the extent of the pop. of Egypt, information is very imperfect, both in reference to the past, as well as at the present time, being now variously estimated at from 2 to 4 millions: conjecture has hardly ever offered an opinion as to the number in former times. In further illustration of this very interesting section of the globe, see Nile, Suez, and Thebes.

Ekingen, a town of Suabia, near which the Austrians were defeated by the French, in 1805. It is seated on the Danube, 12 m. S. W. of Ulm.

Ekingen, another town of Suabia, seated on the Neckar, opposite Rotenberg, 6 m. W. by S. of Tübingen, and 25 S. S. W. of Stuttgart; both these towns are in the dominions of the king of Wurtemberg, and contain each about 4,000 inhabitants.

Ehrenbreitstein, a fortress of Germany, in the circle of Lower Rhine, on the E. bank of the river Rhine, opposite Coblenz. It stands on the summit of a stupendous rock, not less than 800 feet above the level of the river, and is deemed to be impregnable. It has a communication with Coblenz by a subterraneous passage, cut out of the solid rock, and is plentifully supplied with water from a well 280 feet deep. In the vale of Ehrenbreitstein is an old palace, which belonged to the elector of Treves. This fortress surrendered to the French through famine, in 1799, after a blockade of above 20 months.

Eibenstock, or Eybenstock, a town of Upper Saxony, in the circle of Erzeberg, near the N. W. frontier of Bohemia, 60 m. S. by E. of Leipzig. Pop. 3,200.

Eichsfeldt, a territory of Germany, at the N. E. extremity of the circle of the Lower Rhine, surrounded by Brunswick, Thuringia, and Hesse. It produces much flax and tobacco. Heiligenstadt is the capital. It is now divided between Prussia and Hanover: it formerly belonged to the elector of Mentz, and contained a pop. of 90,000, on a surface of about 600 square miles; Stadt Worbis and Mulhausen are the other principal towns.

Eichstadt. See Aichstadt.

Eil Lock. See Linné Lock.

Eilenburg, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, situate on the Mulda, 12 m. N. E. of Leipzig.

Eimeo, one of the Society isles, in the Pacific Ocean, lying 12 m. W. of Otaheite. The products of the two islands, and the manners of the people, are much the same. Eimeo has steep rugged hills, running in different directions, leaving large valleys, and gently rising ground about their sides. The hills, though rocky, are generally covered with trees almost to the tops.

Eisbeck, a fortified town of Lower Saxony, in the principality of Calenberg. It has manufactures of cloth and all kinds of stuffs; and in the mountains near it are mines of silver, iron, copper, and lead. It is situate 17 m. N. of Göttingen, and 45 S. of Hanover. Pop. about 5,000.

Eisenach, or Eysenach, a town of Upper Saxony, at the western extremity of Thuringia, capital of a principality of the same name, with a celebrated college. The duke resides in a castle within the town; and there is another on a mountain out of it, called Wartburg, which, in 1521, was for some time the asylum of Luther. It is seated on the Nesse, at its conflux with the Horsel, 16 m. W. of Gotha. Long. 10. 21. E., lat. 51. 0. N. Pop. about 8,000.

Eisenartz, or Eisenitz, a town of Germany, in Stiria, famous for its iron mines, 34 m. N. N. W. of Gratz.

Eisenberg, another town in Thuringia, 35 m. S. W. of Leipzig. Pop. 3,500.

Eisnstadt, a town of Hungary, with a magnificent palace, 5 m. N. W. of Odenburg, and 27 S. of Vienna.

Eisleben, a town of Upper Saxony, capital of the county of Mansfield, with a decayed castle. The celebrated Luther was born and died here. In the churches of St. Andrew and St. Ann are the superb burial places of the ancient counts of Mansfield. Eisleben contains many breweries, and derives much profit from the neighbouring iron mines. It is 28 m. N. N. W. of Naumburg. Long. 11. 47. E., lat. 52. 32. N.

Eisfeld, a town of Upper Saxony, in the principality of Coburg, with a castle. It has manufactures of vitriol, &c. and stands on the Werra, near its source, 7 m. E. of Hildburghausen.

Elba, an island in the Mediterranean sea, between Italy and the island of Corsica, and separated from Tuscany by the channel of Piombino. It was known to the Greeks by the name of Æthalia, and to the Romans by that of Ilva. The form of the island is very irregular, the length from E. to W. is about 14 m. and the greatest breadth, which is at the W. end, is between 8 and 9 m. and contains a pop. of about 14,000 souls. The whole island presents numerous mountains, separated by deep valleys, and some plains of considerable extent; the south-west part is the most elevated, and are composed of black and white granite, susceptible of a fine polish. Elba has been renowned for its mines of iron and load-stone, for a period beyond the reach of history. Aristotle speaks of them as opened from time immemorial; it has also quarries of fine marble. On the N. E. part is the mountain, or mine of iron ore, which supplies most of the forges of Italy. The tower of Voltorajo stands on this mountain, on a shaggy rock. The view from this tower is wonderfully fine every way, as the eye overlooks the whole island, that of Corsica, many scattered islets, the channel of Piombino, and a great range of continent. On the E. side of the mountain stands Rio, a village inhabited by miners. Under it breaks out the only rivulet in Elba, which does not run above a mile before it falls into the sea; but the water gushes out of the rock in such abundance, that it turns 17 mills in that short course. The soil of Elba is very shallow, with scanty room for cultivation, and few places level enough for corn, producing little more than six month's provision for its inhabitants; but the island is so situated that it can, in spite of a blockading fleet be always supplied with provisions, and the garrison with reinforcements. The wine is good, if made with care and properly kept; the fruit of its standard trees are excellent, though not in great plenty; orange and lemon trees thrive very well in the sheltered vallies and narrow plains near the sea. There are several springs of excellent water in the island; and the climate is much milder than the adjacent continent, for it produces many fruits and plants that cannot stand the Tuscan winters. Among the animals and birds are wild boars, hedge-hogs, partridges, quails, canary-birds, nightingales, ortolans, &c. It has no rivers; but there are a number of rivulets. This island was held with Piombino, by the Appiani, as a fief of the empire, till Charles V. thought proper to transfer it to Cosmo I. duke of Florence, that he might rescue it and the adjacent coasts from the Turks and French. Before the French revolution, it was subject to the prince of Piombino, except Porto Ferrajo, and Porto Longone, the former belonging to the duke of Tuscany, and the latter to the king of Naples; but in 1801 the French became possessed of the whole island. It now owes its chief celebrity to the circumstance of its having been ceded by the powers of Europe in full sovereignty to Napoleon Bonaparte; after the surrender of Paris to the allies in March 1814. He landed at Porto Ferrajo, the capital of the island, on the 4th of May in that year, but on the 26th of February following, he embarked again for France, and reached Paris, without encountering the least obstruction: since when the island has been wholly ceded to the duke of Tuscany. Porto Ferrajo, on the N. side of the island, is in lat. 42. 50. N., and 10. 15. of E. long.

Elbassano, a town of European Turkey, in Albania, 45 m. S. E. of Durazzo.

Elbe, a river of Europe, rising on the N. E. frontier of Bohemia, bordering on Silesia, in the lat. of 50. 30. N., and 15. 35. of E. long., flows S. for about 40 m. past Königsgratz to Pardubitz, in the circle of Chrudin, from whence it takes a meandering course in a N. W. direction to Melnick, where it receives the Moldau from the frontier of Austria on the S.: from Melnick, it continues a winding course through the circle of Leutmeritz, in which it receives the Eger from the frontier of Franconia, on the W. S. W. and then enters the circle of Meissen in Upper Saxony, still running in a N. W. direction past Dresden, into the duchy of Saxony to Magdeburg; from whence it takes a direction N. by E. to Havelberg, where it receives the Havel; from Havelberg it intersects in a N. W. direction the Old Mark of Brandenburg; and then divides Mecklenburgh Schwerin, and the duchy of Saxe Laubenburgh on the N., from Luneburg Zell, to Hamburgh: from whence it becomes navigable for ships of the largest burthen, dividing for about 70 m. the duchy of Holstein on the N., from Bremen on the S.; and after a course of 380 m. in a meridional line, and upwards of 500 m. by the course of the stream, falls into the North sea at Cuxhaven, in the lat. of 53. 52. N., and 8. 46. of E. long. The Elbe is rendered subservient to the purposes of navigation; and by itself and collateral branches, receives and distributes produce along lines of country, several hundred m. in extent. See Lubeck.

Elberfeldt, or Elerfeldt, a town of the grand duchy of Berg, seated on the banks of the Wipper, which falls into the Rhine between Cologne and Dusseldorf. It has extensive manufactures of linen, silk, and wool, and a pop. of near 20,000. It is 18 m. due E. of Dusseldorf.

Elephanta, called by the natives Gharipoor, an island on the W. coast of Hindoostan, 5 m. from Bombay. It contains one of the most celebrated temples of the Hindoos. The figure of an elephant of the natural size, cut coarsely in stone, appears on the landing place, near the foot of a mountain. An easy slope then leads to a subterranean temple, hewn out of the solid rock, 80 feet long, and 40 broad, the roof supported by rows of pillars 10 feet high. At the further end are gigantic figures of the three Hindoo deities, Brahma, Vishna, and Seva, which were mutilated by the zeal of the Portuguese, when this island was in their possession. Elephanta was ceded to the English by the Mahrattas Elouthe, a kingdom of Tartary, lying to the N. W. of Chinese Tartary. It was conquered in 1759 by the emperor of China. See Kalmucs.

Elgin, a borough of Scotland, capital of Murrayshire, and formerly the see of a bishop. Here are many large old buildings over piazzas. Its cathedral was one of the most magnificent structures in Scotland; of which its ruins are a sufficient proof. Two miles to the N. E. on the banks of a lake, is the palace of Spynie, formerly the residence of the bishop, of which some rooms are still pretty entire. Elgin stands on the Lossie, 5 m. from its port at Lossiemouth, where there is a tolerable harbour, whence much corn is exported. It is 38 m. E. N. E. of Inverness, and 163 N. of Edinburgh.

Elginshire. See Murrayshire.

Elsinburg. See Helsingburgh.

Elsinore, a town in Denmark, seated on the Sound, in the isle of Zealand. It is the most commercial place in Denmark, next to Copenhagen, being the residence of a considerable number of foreign merchants, and the consuls of the principal nations trading to the Baltic. A little to the E. is the fortress of Cronborg, which guards the Sound. Every vessel as it passes, pays a toll at Elsinore, in return for which, the crown takes the charge of constructing light-houses, and erecting signals to mark the shoals and rocks, from the Categat to the entrance into the Baltic. Elsinore has no harbour, but a good and safe road, and is 22 m. N. of Copenhagen.

Long. 12. 35. E., lat. 56. 9. N. See Cronborg.

Elster, White and Black, two rivers of Upper Saxony, the first rises near the northern frontier of Franconia and runs N. nearly parallel with and E. of the Saal, into which it fills about 18 m. N. W. of Leipzig; this river proved very disastrous to the French troops, on their retreat after the battle of Leipzig, in October 1813.—The Black Elster rises near the Spree in Upper Lusatia, and after a winding course E. of the Elbe, falls into that river in the duchy of Saxony.

Elsterberg, a town on the W. bank of the White Elster, near its source, 7 m. N. of Plauen.

Elstervoerda, a town and castle of Upper Saxony, in Miania, on the E. bank of the Black Elster, 24 m. N. by W. of Dresden.

Eltham, a town in Kent, Eng. Here are the remains of a palace, in which Edward II. often resided, and his son, John of Eltham, was born; it is now in part converted into a farm house, and the stately hall forms the barn. It is 8 m. S. W. of London Bridge. Pop. in 1821, 1,863.

Elvas, a strong frontier town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, and a bishop's see, with a castle. Here is a cistern so large, that it will hold water enough for the town for six months. The water is brought by a Moorish aqueduct, three miles in length, which, in some places is supported by several stories of arches. On the side of it is a forest of olive-trees, among which are walks and fine mountains. Elvas was bombarded by the French in 1706. A royal academy for young gentlemen was founded here in 1733. It is seated near the Guadiana, 15 m. W. of Badajoz, and 118 E. of Lisbon. Pop. about 16,000.

Ems, or Embs, a town of Germany, in Tyrol, near which are some baths impregnated with sulphur. It is 10 m. S. E. of the lake of Constance.

Encheysen, a town of N. Holland, on the Zuider Zee. It was once a flourishing place; but its harbour being now obstructed by sand, it has lost its former consequence. It was taken by the English in 1799. It is 27 m. N. E. of Amsterdam.

Endeavour Strait, a strait of the S. Pacific Ocean, which separates New Guinea from the N. E. point of New Holland. It received its name from captain Cook, who explored it in 1770. Its length, is 10 leagues, and its breadth about five, except at the N. E. entrance, where it is contracted to less than two miles, by the islands called Prince of Wales Islands.

Endingen, a town of Suabia, in Brisgau, near the Rhine, 7 m. N. N. E. of Old Brisach.

Enfield, a town in Middlesex, Eng. It was once famous for an extensive royal chase, disforested in 1779; and had a royal palace, of which little now remains, the front having been taken down in 1792, and its site occupied by some houses. It is 10 m. N. of London. Pop. 8,227.

Enfield, p.t. Grafton Co. N. H. 105 m. fr. Boston. Pop. 1,492.

Enfield, p.t. Hampshire Co. Mass. Pop. 1,058.

Enfield, a town of Connecticut, in Hartford county, situate on the E. bank of the Connecticut, 16 m. N. by E. of Hartford. Pop. 2,129.

Enfield, p.t. Tompkins Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,332. Also a village in Halifax Co. N. C.

Engadina, or Inthal, a delightful valley of Switzerland, in the canton of Grisons, extending along the banks of the river Inn, from its source to Tyrol. It is divided into Upper and Lower, the chief towns are Surz and Cernetz.

Engelberg, a valley of Switzerland, in the canton of Unterwalden, 10 m. long, surrounded by mountains. It is subject to the abbot of a Benedictine monastery of the same name, whose revenues arise principally from a commerce in cheese. The country contains extensive glaciers, on the side of fertile mountains, fine black marble, white veined; small crystals called Swiss diamonds; silver and vitriol. The abbey is 12 m. S. W. of Altdorf.

Engelholm, a sea port of Sweden, in Schonen, on a bay of the Categat, with good anchorage near the entrance to the Sound. In 1678, it was taken by the Danes, after an obstinate defence. It is 44 m. N. by W. of Lund. Long. 12. 57. E., lat. 56. 22. N.

Egers, a town of Germany, in the Westerwald, capital of a county of its name; seated near the Rhine, 6 m. N. W. of Coblenz.

Enghein, a town of the Netherlands, in Hainault, 15 m. S. W. of Brussels, on the road to Tournay. It gives the title of Duke to one of the Bourbon family.

Engia, Engina, or Egina (its ancient name), an island of European Turkey, in the gulf of Engia, between Livadia and the Morea. It has a town of the same name, 22 m. S. S. W. of Athens. Long. 23. 39. E., lat. 37. 45. N.

England, the southern part of the island of Great Britain is a very irregularly shaped territory, extending in its extreme length, from the Land's End in Cornwall, in the lat. of 50. 4. 7. and long. of 5. 41. 31. to Berwick, at the mouth of the Tweed, which divides it from Scotland, in the lat. of 55. 46. 21. N., and 1. 59. 41. of W. long. The meridional distance between these two points is 366 geographical, or 425 English statute m.; this line, however, intersects the entrance to the Bristol channel, South and North Wales, and the Irish Sea; the extreme meridional line that could be drawn on English ground, from N. to S. would be from Berwick to St. Alban's Head, in the county of Dorset: this line would measure 366 statute m.; and the extreme length from W. to E. would be from the Land's End, Cornwall, to the Dudgeon lights on the N. E. coast of Norfolk, which would measure 359 statute m. The four S. E. counties of Somerset, Dorset, Devon, and Cornwall, however form a promontory; and as the superficial area of England by actual survey proves to be 50,535 square m. taking the length from N. to S. to be 366 m. the mean breadth from W. to E. will be within 150 m. The sea on the S. is called the English Channel, and which divides England from the N. W. coast of France: the sea at the S. E. point is called the straits of Dover, and divides England from the N. W. point of France and the Netherlands: the sea on the E. coast of England is called the North Sea, or German Ocean, and divides England from Holland, Germany, and Jutland: the sea on the N. W. coast of England is called the Irish Sea, and divides England from the N. E. coast of Ireland. Wales, North and South, bound the centre of its western side; and the four S. W. counties before mentioned, project into the Atlantic Ocean. England, for local purposes, is divided into 40 counties, viz.: Bedford, Berks, Bucks, Cambridge, Chester, Cornwall, Cumberland, Derby, Devon, Dorset, Durham, Essex, Gloucester, Hants, Hereford, Huntingdon, Hertford, Kent, Lancaster, Leicester, Lincoln, Middlesex, Monmouth, Norfolk, Northampton, Northumberland, Nottingham, Oxford, Rutland, Salop, Somerset, Stafford, Suffolk, Surrey, Sussex, Warwick, Westmorland, Wilts, Worcester, and York; each of which is subdivided into hundreds and parishes. For judicial purposes it is divided into six circuits; and for ecclesiastical purposes into two archiepiscopal and 20 episcopal sees, or jurisdictions. The extent, relations, &c., of each of the several counties, towns, &c., are noticed in their alphabetical place in this work.

The face of the country affords all that beautiful variety which can be found in the most extensive tracts of the globe; not, however, without romantic, and even dreary scenes, lofty mountains, craggy rocks, black barren moors, and wide uncultivated heaths; and yet, few countries have a smaller proportion of land, absolutely sterile and incapable of culture. The richest parts are, in general, the midland and southern. Towards the N. it partakes of the barrenness of the adjoining parts of Scotland. The E. coast is in many places, sandy and marshy. A range of rude and elevated land, sometimes rising into mountains 3,000 feet in height, extends from the borders of Scotland to the very heart of England, forming a natural division between the E. and W. sides of the kingdom. Cornwall is also a rough hilly tract; and a similar character prevails in part of the adjacent counties. These mountainous tracts abound with various mineral treasures, more particularly coal, iron, copper, lead, and tin.

The rivers of England are numerous, and contribute essentially to the beauty and fertility of the country, as well as to facilitate the conveyance of its products from one part of the kingdom to another: the four most deserving of notice for their magnitude and utility, are the Trent, Mersey, Severn, and Thames. These four rivers rise in the interior of the country, and flow in contrary directions, the first to the N. E., the next to the N. W., the Severn to the S. W., and the Thames to the S. E.; and being rendered navigable and united to each other by canals, they afford an admirable facility of conveyance over all parts of the country. In addition to these, the great Ouse and the Nen, flow from the centre of the country in a N. E. direction, into the N. sea between the Thames and the Trent, and the Nen is united to the line of canal which unites those two rivers, and thereby with the Mersey and Severn. Further N. are the Humber, Tees, Wear, Tyne, and the Tweed, which divides England from Scotland, all flowing from W. to E. into the North Sea: and on the other side is the Eden, Derwent, Ribble and the Dee, flowing into the Irish Sea: the tributary rivers deserving of notice, are the Medway and Lea, falling into the Thames, the Soar and Derwent falling into the Trent, the Don, Aire, and Ouse falling into the Humber, the Irwell into the Mersey, and the Upper and Lower Avon and Wye into the Severn; all of which are navigable, and yield a variety of fish: The Tamar, Torridge, Tame, Exe, Arun, and a few other rivers of inferior note, intersect the S. and S. W. parts of the country, falling into the Bristol and English channels. The lakes are neither numerous nor extensive, and are chiefly in the N. W. counties: those of Westmoreland and Cumberland, in particular, exhibit such varieties of beautiful scenery, as to become the object of summer excursions from every part of the country. With respect to climate, England is situate in the N. part of the temperate zone, so that it enjoys but a scanty share of the genial influence of the sun. Its atmosphere is inclined to chillness and moisture, subject to frequent and sudden changes; and is more favourable to the growth, than to the ripening of the products of the earth. No country is clothed with so beautiful and lasting a verdure, but the harvests, especially in the northern parts, frequently suffer from unseasonable rains. The country, nevertheless, generally affords an abundant supply of grain, and all the other necessaries of life, and the rigours of winter, and the heats of summer, are felt here in a much less degree than in parallel climates on the continent; a circumstance common to all islands. The whole country, some particular spots excepted, is sufficiently healthy; and the longevity of its inhabitants is equal to that of almost any region. All its most valuable productions, both animal and vegetable, have been imported from foreign countries, and have been kept up and improved by constant attention. England has now no other wild quadrupeds than those of the smaller kind; as the fox, badger, marten, otter, hare, rabbit, squirrel, &c. On the other hand, every kind of domestic animal, imported from abroad, has been reared to the greatest degree of perfection. The horse has been trained up for all the various purposes of strength and swiftness, so as to excel in those qualities the same animal in every other country. The whole number kept in Great Britain has been estimated at 1,500,000, including every valuable variety of that noble animal. The breeds of cattle in various parts of the kingdom have also been cultivated with much care, and have been brought to the largest size and greatest justness of shape. The different races of sheep are variously distinguished, either for uncommon size, goodness of flesh, or plenty or fineness of wool. The deer of its parks, which are originally a foreign breed, are superior in beauty of skin, and delicacy of flesh, to those of most countries. Even the several kinds of dogs have been trained to degrees of courage, strength, and sagacity, rarely to be met with elsewhere. Domestic poultry, as well as wild birds, are numerous; the shape and beauty of plumage of the pheasant, and delicious note of the nightingale, cannot be surpassed. The improvement in the vegetable products of this island is not less striking than in the animal. Nuts, acorns, crabs, and a few wild berries, were almost all the variety of vegetable food which its woods could boast. To other countries, and to the efforts of culture, it is indebted for corn, esculent roots, plants, and all its garden fruits. The seas as well as the rivers of England are stocked with a great variety of fish, which yield a plentiful article of provision to all ranks of people.

The English are generally of a middle size, and are upon an average an inch shorter than the Americans. They are well-formed, handsome, robust, and though not so fair as the northern nations generally, of a florid complexion. The females are distinguished for their grace and beauty. In the cities a d among the more fashionable classes their dress is showy, although the fashions are generally copied from the French. The manners of the English are formal, stiff, and reserved, and there is no country where ranks and conditions are fenced round with so many barriers.

Of the early history of England, but little is known prior to its becoming a province of the Roman empire, during the first century of the Christian era. The first invasion of England by the Romans was under Julius Cæsar in the year 55, at which period the country was inhabited by a very numerous but hardy and rude race of people denominated Britons, living in tribes and subject to an austere and rigorous priesthood. About the year 86 the whole country, after numerous conflicts, was subdued by the Romans. During a period of nearly 400 years, from the time of Agricola to the year 447, when the Romans finally quitted the island, they had effectually succeeded in reconciling the natives to a dependence on their government, and in diffusing a taste and desire to cultivate and practice the arts of social life; they had, however, so implicitly yielded to Roman government and protection, that, on being left to govern and protect themselves, they were unable to withstand the rude and vigorous attacks of the Picts and Scots, who poured into the country from the north. The Romans, on being applied to by the Britons, declining from inability to render them assistance, the Britons invited the assistance of the Saxons, a people who had acquired celebrity for their valour in the north of Europe. In the year 449 Hengist and Horsa, two Saxon leaders, arrived with a force of 1,600 men, who succeeded in speedily subduing the Scots and Picts; but perceiving the inefficiency of the Britons, the Saxons obtained a succession of reinforcements, made allies of the Scots and Picts, and turned their whole force to the subjugation of England; and, in the progress of time, the country became divided into seven monarchies, some one of which, however in its turn maintaining an ascendancy over the rest, the ascendant monarch being regarded as king of England. The following is a list of the seven monarchies: with the dates of their foundation and extinction, viz—

Kent	founded in	454	extinct	823
South Saxons . .	—	491	—	685
East Saxons . . .	—	527	—	827
Northumberland .	—	547	—	827
East Angles . . .	—	575	—	792
Mercia	—	582	—	827
West Saxons . . .	—	592	—	828

This period is denominated the Heptarchy, which merged into an undivided sovereignty under Egbert, the 17th king of the West Saxons, in 828. In 860 the Saxon Dynasty in its turn was assailed by the Danes, and, after repeated conflicts and aggressions, Sweyn, a Dane, was crowned king of England in 1013. The crown reverted again to the Saxons in Edward, surnamed the Confessor, in 1042; but on the 14th of October, 1066, the destinies of England were placed in the hands of William of Normandy, surnamed the Conqueror, from the decisive victory he gained on that day, over Harold II., king of England. From that period to the present time the whole country has been under the rule of a successive line of kings, except for 11 years, from 1649, to 1660, when it was under the protectorate of Cromwell, during which time it was ruled by the Parliament or the Protector, and was called the commonwealth of England.

England, New. See New England.

English Town, p.v. Monmouth Co. N. Y.

English Turn, a bend in the river Mississippi, 18 m. below New Orleans.

Enkioping, a town of Sweden, in Upland, on the N. side of Lake Mæler, 21 m. S. W. of Upsal.

Ennis, a town in the parish of Drumcliff, Ireland, capital of the county of Clare. It is seated near the head of a bay, on the N. side of the river Shannon. It is 19 m. N. W. of Limerick, and 113 S. S. W. of Dublin. Population of the town (which is sometimes called Clare), in 1821, 6,702, and the remainder of the parish 3,533 more. It returns a member to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Enniscorthy, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Wexford, with a manufacture of coarse woolen cloth, and some iron works. It is situated on the Slaney, close under Vinegar-hall, 10 m. N. of Wexford, and 27 N. E. of Waterford.

Enniskillen, a borough of Ireland, capital of the county of Fermanagh. It is seated on an island in Lough Erne, where that lake is contracted for about six miles to the width of an ordinary river, and has a strong fort, it being a pass of great importance between the N. and S. of Ireland. In 1595 it made an obstinate defence against the army of queen Elizabeth, and again in 1690 against James II. It is 80 m. N. W. of Dublin. Population, in 1821, 2,399, and of the parish 10,000 more. It returns one member to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Ennisville, p.v. Huntingdon Co. Pa.

Eno, or Enos, a town of European Turkey, in Rumelia, and a Greek archbishop's see; seated near a gulf of the Archipelago, at the influx of the Marissa, 90 m. S. by W. of Adrianople, and 145 W. S. W. of Constantinople. Long. 28. 15. E., lat. 40. 46. N.

Enosburgh, p.t. Franklin Co. Vt. Pop. 1,560.

Ens, a town of Austria, on a river of the same name, at its conflux with the Danube, 12 m. E. S. E. of Lintz.

Essene, a town of Egypt, on the E. side of the Nile. Here are considerable ruins of the ancient Antinoë. It is 120 m. S. of Cairo. Long. 30. 54. E., lat. 28. 5. N.

Ensisheim, a town of France, in the department of Upper Rhine, on the river Ille, 10 m. S. of Colmar.

Enskirken, a town in the duchy of Juliers, 15 m. S. W. of Cologne.

Enstorf, a town of the palatinate of Bavaria, 22 miles N. of Ratisbon.

Entlibuch, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Lucern, 14 m. W. S. W. of Lucern.

Entre Douro e Minho, the most N. W. province of Portugal, lying on the sea coast, between the rivers Douro and Minho, and bounded on the E. by Trallos Montes. It is 68 miles from N. to S., and 40 broad, and in 1810 contained a population of 907,965. Braga, 30 miles N. N. E. of Oporto, is the capital. It is watered by two other rivers, falling into the Atlantic Ocean, viz. the Lima and Cavado; the other principal towns are, Lagos, Lapeda, and Moncao, on the S. bank of the Minho, which divides the province from the Spanish province of Galicia: Port de Lima, and Viana, near the mouth of the Lima, Barcellos, between Braga and the mouth of the Cabado, Guimaraens, and Amarante in the S. E. and Oporto on the N. bank near the mouth of the Douro, which separates the province from Beira.

Eperies, a town of Upper Hungary, capital of the county of Szros, celebrated for its mines of salt. It is seated on the Tatza, 20 miles N. E. of Cassovia. Long. 21. 13. E., lat. 48. 50. N. Pop. about 7,500.

Epernay, a town of France, in the department of Marne. It was taken by Henry IV, in 1592, when marshal Biron was killed while the king's hand was on his shoulder. The wines produced in its neighbourhood are excellent. It is 17 miles N. W. of Chalons, and the seat of a prefect, with a population in 1825, of 4,997.

Epernon, a town of France, in the department of Eure and Loire, 15 m. N. N. E. of Chartres.

Ephesus, a village of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, anciently one of the most splendid cities of Asia Minor, and the most frequented emporium of that continent. Of its former splendour there is nothing to be seen but heaps of marble, overturned walls, columns, capitals, and pieces of statues. The fortress, which is upon an eminence, seems to have been the work of the Greek emperors; and also the aqueduct, part of which is yet standing, supported by pillars of fine marble. The eastern gate has three basso-relievos, taken from some ancient monuments; that in the middle was constructed by the Romans. The most remarkable structure was the Temple of Diana, deemed one of the seven wonders of the world, and which the primitive Christians had converted into a church; but it is now so entirely ruined, that it is not easy to find the ground-plot. Ephesus is seated near the mouth of the Cayster, which formerly afforded a good harbour for ships, but is now almost choked up with sand. The present inhabitants are only Greek peasants, who live in extreme wretchedness and insensibility. It is 30 miles S. S. E. of Smyrna. Long. 27. 23. E., lat. 38. 8. N.

Ephrata, or Tunkerstown, a town of Pennsylvania, in Lancaster county, and the principal settlement of a sect called Tunkers [Dippers], who are of German extraction, and first appeared in America in 1719. It is 22 miles N. of Lancaster.

Epinal, a town of France, capital of the department of Vosges. It is famous for its paper-mills, and seated on the river Moselle, near the mountains of the Vosges, 65 miles S. W. of Strasburgh, and 196 E. by S. of Paris. Pop. in 1825, 7,941.

Epping, a town in Essex, Eng. It is famous for excellent butter, and seated at the N. end of a forest of the same name, 17 miles N. N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,688.

Epping, p.t. Rockingham Co. N. H. 20 m. fr. Portsmouth. Pop. 1,263.

Epsom, p.t. Merrimack Co. N. H. Pop. 1,418.

Epsom, a town in Surrey, Eng. celebrated for its mineral waters and salts; and on its neighbouring downs are annual horse-races. It is 15 miles S. S. W. of London. Population in 1821 3,890.

Epworth, a town in Lincolnshire, Eng. on the isle of Axholm, with a manufacture of sack. John Wesley, the founder of the Arminian sect of methodists, was born here. It is 11 miles N. of Gainsborough, and 106 N. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,502.

Erbach, a town of Franconia, capital of a county of the same name, with a castle. It is 22 miles W. by S. of Wertheim, and 35 S. S. E. of Frankfort.

Erekli, a town of European Turkey, on the N. shore of the sea of Marmora, 55 miles W. of Constantinople. It was the ancient Heracleia, and contains the ruins of an amphitheatre, built by the emperor Severus; and a wall at some former time extended from this place to Derkus on the shore of the Black Sea, a distance of about 55 miles, the object of which, seems to have been the protection of Constantinople from the northern barbarians.

* * There is another town of the same name on the S. W. shore of the Black Sea, 130 m. E. by N. of Constantinople.

Erfurt, a city of Upper Saxony, sometimes accounted the capital of Thuringia, with a university and two strong forts. The principal magistrate is sometimes a protestant and sometimes a papist; but the greatest part of the burghers are protestants. It has three fine libraries, one of which belongs to the papists, another to the university, and a third to the protestant ministers. The inhabitants are computed at 15,000. A fire happened here in 1736, which burnt down 180 houses, and several churches. In 1806 it was taken by the French; and in 1814, it surrendered to the allies. It is seated in a fertile country, on the river Gerar, 58 m. W. S. W. of Leipzig.

Eribol, Loch, in Scotland, an arm of the sea, on the N. coast of Sutherlandshire, in the long. of 4. 30. W., capable of affording a safe retreat to the largest vessels. It receives several streams; particularly that which flows from a lake called Loch Hope.

Ericht, Loch, a lake of Scotland, lying in the counties of Inverness and Perth. It is 24 m. in length and one in breadth, surrounded by lofty mountains and rugged cliffs, and its banks covered with heath and a few straggling birches and alders. Its outlet, at the S. extremity, is the river Erich, which flows into Loch Rannock.

Erie, Lake, one of the great chain of lakes in North America, lies between 79. and 84. W. long., and 41. and 43. N. lat. Its length is 230 m. and 40 its medium breadth. It is upwards of 660 m. in circumference, and navigable for ships of any burthen. The coast on both sides is generally favourable for batteaux and canoes; yet in some places, chiefly on the S. side, there are rocks that extend several m. in length. Some of these, near the mouth of the Cuyahoga, rise 40 or 50 feet perpendicular out of the water, and project over the lake. The heathen Indians, when they pass this impending danger, offer a sacrifice of tobacco to the water. The islands and banks towards its W. end are so infested with rattlesnakes, as to render it dangerous to land on them. The lake is covered, near the banks of the islands, with a large pond lily; the leaves of which are thickly spread on the surface of the water, to an extent of many acres: on these, in the summer, lie myriads of watersnakes, basking in the sun. This lake, at its N. W. end, receives the waters of the great chain, from the N. W. by the river Detroit, and discharges them by the river Niagara, over the great falls at its N. E. end, into Lake Ontario. It forms the boundary line between the United States, and British North American territories, both parties claiming an equal right of navigation. During the war of 1812—1815, the Americans had a squadron of 9 vessels, carrying 56 guns, and the British one of 6 vessels, carrying 68 guns; on the 10th of September 1813, after an action of three hours, the whole of the British squadron surrendered to the American Commodore Perry. The English have a fort called fort Erie, at the N. E. extremity of the lake where it narrows into the river Niagara, in the lat. of 42. 57. N., and 78. 20. of W. long.

Erie, a county of West Pennsylvania. The N. W. side is washed by the shore of the lake, the W. end borders on the State of Ohio, and the E. end on that of New York. Its area is about 750 square m. Pop. 16,906. A town of the same name seated near the shore of the lake, is 315 m. in a meridional line, N. N. W. of Philadelphia.

Erie, a county of New York, bordering on the E. end of the lake and Niagara river, bounded N. by the Tonnewanta, and S. by the Cattaraugus river. Buffalo, opposite the British fort Erie, is the chief town. Pop. 35,710.

Erie, p.v. Erie Co. N. Y.

Erie, p.t. Erie Co. Pa. on Lake Erie at the harbour of Presqu' Isle which is safe and commodious but has only 8 feet water at the entrance. The town has considerable trade, principally by the lake commerce. A turnpike road extends from hence to Pittsburg.

Erieville, p.v. Madison Co. N. Y.

Erie Canal, the largest in the United States unites Lake Erie with the river Hudson. It is 362 m. long, 40 feet wide and 4 deep. It has 679 feet of lockage; the locks are 90 feet in length and 15 in width. This immense work leaves the lake at Buffalo and passes northwardly along Niagara river towards lake Ontario. It then turns to the east and proceeds northward of the small lakes of New York to the valley of the Mohawk down which it passes to the mouth of that stream. It then follows the western bank of the Hudson to Albany where it joins the river. It has several large aqueducts; one of which across the Genesee at Rochester is 804 feet in length, and two other across the Mohawk are 1188 and 748 feet in length. The sides of the canal are paved with stone or covered with thick grass. There are a number of branches or side cuts to this canal; one of them which extending from Syracuse to Oswego is 38 m. long, and another to Geneva 20 m. The navigation upon this canal is very great, and the canal duties amply compensate the cost of the work, which was above 7,000,000 dollars. It was begun in 1817 and finished in 1825.

Travelling upon the canal is very easy and cheap. The boats for passengers are 80 feet long with cabins nearly the whole length of the deck. They are drawn by horses and proceed 4 m. an hour, day and night. The fare is 4 cents per mile.

Eriskay, a small island of the Hebrides of Scotland, at the S. end of South Uist; noted for being the first place upon which Charles Stuart landed, in his wild attempt to gain the British crown.

Erité, a village in Kent, Eng. on the Thames, 5 m. E. by S. of Woolwich. Great quantities of corn and wood are shipped hence; and here the East India ships, in their passage up the river, generally discharge a part of their cargoes.

Erivan, the capital of Persian Armenia, in a province of the same name, and the seat of an Armenian patriarch. The city is defended by a fortress, in which is the governor's palace, and by a castle, on the river Zuanqui, near the lake of Erivan, which is very deep, and 60 m. in circumference. The Maidan is an open square, 400 paces over, in which are very fine trees. The baths and caravanserais have their beauties, but the churches of the Christians are small, and half under ground. It is seated on the banks of the Arus river, which runs past Shirvan into the Caspian sea, from which it is distant about 130 m., and about the same distance from Gonieh on the S. E. shore of the Black Sea. Long. 44. 10. E., lat. 40. 20. N.

Erkelens, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers; seated on the Roer, 10 m. N. W. of Juliers. Pop. about 2,300.

Erlau, or Erlau, a populous town on the frontiers of Lower and Upper Hungary, 60 m. E. N. E. of Buda. It is the see of an archbishop. The cathedral and archiepiscopal palace are stately edifices.

Erlangen, a town of Franconia, with a university and a palace. It is divided into the old and new town; and the latter is one of the handsomest towns in Germany. The principal manufactures are hats, gloves, and stockings. It is seated on the Rednitz, 12 m. N. of Nuremberg; and is now included in the dominions of the king of Bavaria. Long. 11. 2. E., lat. 49. 38. N.

Erne, a river of Scotland, which issues from a lake of the same name in Perthshire, flows by Crieff, and joins the Tay, a little below Abernethy.

Erne, a river of Ireland, which issues from a small lake on the N. border of the county of Longford, flows N. through that of Cavan, and N. W. through Fermanagh into Donegal bay. In the latter county it forms a lake, called Lough Erne, 30 m. in length, containing several islands; and on one in the middle part, where the lake is very narrow, stands the town of Enniskillen.

Ernee, a town of France, in the department of Mayenne, on a river of the same name, 15 m. N. W. of Laval.

Erodu, or Erroad, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Coimbatore, with a large mud fort. Much coarse cotton cloth is made here and in the vicinity. It is seated on a canal from the Bhawani, E. of the Cavery river, 75 m. W. N. W. of Trichinopoly.

Errol, t. Coos Co. N. H. on the W. of Umbagog lake. Pop. 82.

Erromango, one of the new Hebrides in the S. Pacific Ocean, 70 m. in circumference, with low shores. On the W. side is a promontory that separates two bays, and captain Cook, from the treacherous behaviour of the inhabitants, named it Traitor's Head. Long. 169. 19. E., lat. 18. 47. S.

Ervy, a town of France, in the department of Aube, 17 m. S. by W. of Troyes.

Erzerum, or Arz Roum, the capital of Turkish Armenia, with Armenian and Greek episcopal sees. It is surrounded by double walls, defended by strong towers, and estimated to contain 125,000 inhabitants. The Turks are all janissaries; but most of them tradesmen, and receive no pay. The Armenians have two churches, the Greeks but one; the latter are mostly braziers, and live in the suburbs. A great trade is carried on in furs, Persian silks, cottons, calicoes, and drugs. This city is a thoroughfare, and a resting place, for the caravans to the East Indies. It is situate between the two sources of the Euphrates, at the foot of a chain of mountains, 104 m. S. E. of Trebisond, on the S. E. shore of the Black Sea. Long. 41. 36. E., lat. 39. 57. N.

Erzgebirg, Circle of, a populous district of Upper Saxony, forming the S. W. part of the Margraviate of Meissen, or Misnia, bounded on the

S. by the Bohemian mountains. It abounds in valuable minerals. Freyburg, Altenburg, and Chemnitz, are the principal towns.

Escalona, a town of Spain, in New Castile, surrounded by walls. It is situate on an eminence, in a fertile country, near the Albreche, a tributary of the Tagus, 20 m. N. W. of Toledo, and 32 S. W. of Madrid.

Escambia, a county of West Florida. Pop. 3,386. Pensacola is the capital.

Eschwege, a town and castle of Germany, in the landgraviate of Hesse Cassel, seated on the Werra, 25 m. E. S. E. of Cassel.

Escorial, a village of Spain, in New Castile, seated on the Guadara, 15 m. N. W. of Madrid. It takes its name from a noble structure, founded by Philip II. in memory of the victory gained over the French near St. Quentin, in 1557. This edifice consists of a royal palace, a church, a monastery, a college, a library, shops of different artists, apartments for a great number of people, beautiful walks, large alleys, an extensive park, and fine gardens. It is built of grey stones, found in the neighbourhood, and in the form of a gridiron, because St. Lawrence, on whose day the victory was gained, suffered martyrdom by being broiled on such an instrument. It is a long square of 740 feet by 580, and four stories high, with a tower at each angle 200 feet high; and the palace forms the handle of this imaginary gridiron. The most remarkable part is the arched chapel; in which is a magnificent sepulchre called the Pantheon, being built in imitation of that church at Rome: it is the burying-place of the kings and queens of Spain; and is thought by some to be the most curious piece of architecture in the world. The church is built after the model of St. Peter's at Rome.

Esgueyra, or Esgueria, a town of Portugal, in Beira, 8 m. S. of Avero.

Esk, a river which rises in Scotland, in the N. E. part of Dumfriesshire, and flows S. E. through a dale to which it gives name to the edge of the county. It there receives the Liddel from Roxburghshire, and enters Cumberland, flowing S. by Longtown into the N. E. extremity of Solway frith.

Esk, a river of Scotland, in Edinburghshire, formed by the junction of two streams called N. and S. Esk. They almost encircle the town of Dalkeith, passing on each side of the eminence on which it stands, and unite a little below the town. The river enters the Frith of Forth, at Musselburgh.

Esk, North and South, two rivers of Scotland, in Angusshire, which descend from the hills called the Braes of Angus. The former divides the county from Kincardineshire for several miles, and reaches the ocean, a little to the N. of Montrose: the latter, after traversing the whole breadth of the county, enters the bay on the W. of the same town.

Eski Shehr, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, on the river Sakaria, which falls into the Black Sea, 80 m. E. S. E. of Bursa. Long. 31. 18. E., lat. 39. 48. N.

Esne, Asna, or Esnay, a town of Egypt, supposed to be the ancient Latopolis. Here is an ancient temple, with walls on three sides, and in the front 24 columns, well preserved: within it are three stories of hieroglyphics, of men about three feet high; and the ceiling is adorned with animals, painted with beautiful colours. On the N. side of the town is another temple; richly carved with hieroglyphics, crocodiles, &c. and a mile to the S. is the monastery of St. Helena, which contains many magnificent tombs. Esne stands on the Nile, 300 m. S. of Cario. Long. 31. 40. E., lat. 24. 46. N.

Esopus, p.t. Ulster Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,770.

Espalion, a town of France, in the department of Aveyron, on the river Lot, 14 m. N. N. E. of Rhodéz. It is the seat of a prefect, and in 1925 contained 3,261 inhabitants.

Esperance, p.v. Schoharie Co. N. Y.

Esposenda, or Espandenda, a sea-port of Portugal, in Entre Douro e Minho, at the mouth of the Cavado, 22 m. N. of Oporto. Long. 8. 21. W., lat. 41. 32. N.

Esquimaux, a people of North America, chiefly inhabiting Labrador, the shores of Hudson's bay, the country between Gulf Welcome and Mackenzie's River, and probably Bhering's Straits. To the S. they extend as far as Slave Lake, and, to the N., the territory which they occupy is bounded by an icy sea, if such a sea really exists, or else they extend their wandering excursions into a frozen desert. A permanent establishment of this nation was met with by Captain Ross, at Prince Regent's Bay, in lat. 76. N.; and their huts were numerous in many parts of Melville Island, in lat. 75. N. The latter officer observed them frequently in the islands of the Archipelago of Barrow's Straits, though their timidity prevented any intercourse. Little, squat, and feeble, the complexion of these Polar men partakes less of a copper hue, than of a reddish and dirty yellow. Their huts, which are of a circular form, and are covered with deer-skins, can only be entered by creeping on the belly. Yet the rude necessities of the climate have suggested to this feeble race many contrivances which do honour to their ingenuity. The snow-house, or the comfortable, and comparatively speaking commodious dwelling, which they construct from the frozen snow that surrounds them, affords a favourable example. The rapidity and neatness with which they raise these edifices, and render them impervious to the rigorous atmosphere around, is truly admirable; and these edifices, when finished, afford their inhabitants a similar protection to that which the vegetable world receives from a covering of snow. The Esquimaux of Prince Regent's Bay, and of the Arctic Highlands, are entirely ignorant of boats and canoes, affording, it is said, a unique instance of a fishing tribe unacquainted with the means of floating on the water. Ross advances strong grounds for considering them as the true aboriginal race, from whence all other Esquimaux are derived. They seem utterly ignorant of the nations to the south, and may be considered as an independent tribe, separated by almost impassable mountains from the regions of South Greenland, and extending beyond the most northern inlet of Baffin's Bay. They are almost entirely destitute of religious ideas. The other tribes have canoes made of the skins of the sea calf, which sail with great swiftness. These savages patiently work a grey and porous stone into the shape of pitchers and kettles. The edges of these vases are elegantly ornamented. They preserve their provisions of meat in bags, filled with whale oil. Those who live near the mouth of Mackenzie's River, shave their heads, a peculiar custom, but not sufficient of itself to prove an Asiatic origin.

Esquimaux Bay, a bay on the S. coast of Labrador, at the entrance to the straits of Belleisle from the gulf of St. Lawrence. Long. 57. 59. W., lat. 51. 30. N.

Esquimaux Islands, a cluster of small islands in the gulf of St. Lawrence, off the entrance to the bay.

Esseg, or Eszek, a trading town of Sclavonia, with a strong castle. It has a wooden bridge over the Drave, into Lower Hungary, and the marshes, 8 m. in length, and 80 feet in breadth, with towers at a quarter of a m. distant from each other. It is a difficult pass, and several battles have been fought here between the Turks and Germans. Esseg was taken from the Turks in 1687, since which time it has continued in the hands of the house of Austria. It is seated on the river Drave, 100 m. W. N. W. of Belgrade, and 136 S. of Buda. Long. 19. 16. E., lat. 30. 45. N. Pop. about 9,000.

Essen, a town of Westphalia, in the duchy of Berg. Here are several Catholic churches and convents, but the inhabitants are chiefly Lutherans. It is 8 m. E. of Duisburg.

Essens, a town of Westphalia, in East Friesland, near the German Ocean, 20 m. N. N. E. of Emden.

Essequibo, a river of Dutch Guiana, on which is a settlement of the same name, in lat. 7. N. long. 58. 30. W. It formerly belonged to the Dutch, but was ceded to the English in 1814. The river is 300 m. long and 20 wide at its mouth but incommoded with shoals. The whole district is fertile and well cultivated, producing coffee, cotton, sugar and cocoa.

Essex, a maritime and beautifully fertile county of England. It is bounded on the S. by the river Thames, which divides it from the county of Kent. The county is nearly a square, the area of which is 1,532 square m. It possesses a variety of soil and face of country. The S. W. part is occupied principally by the two forests of Epping and Hainault, and is noted for its butter, which takes the name of Epping butter. The N. W. part from Saffron-Walden to Cambridge, is famous for the growth of saffron; and for a kind of triple crop of coriander, carraway, and teasle, which are all sown together, but come to maturity at different periods. The middle part is a fine corn country, varied with gentle inequalities of surface, and sprinkled with woods. The part bordering on the Thames and the sea consists chiefly of marshy grounds, which afford excellent pasturage, being secured from the inroad of the tides by embankments. Its contiguity to the metropolis, affords it a facile and advantageous market for its surplus produce of grain, seeds, calves, butter, poultry, potatoes, fruit, wild fowl, and oysters, all of which it supplies in a greater proportion than any other county in the kingdom; yet, notwithstanding all the advantages of fertility, abundance, and contiguity to market, pauperism and crime prevail to an equal extent to any, and to a much greater extent than in most other parts of the kingdom. The manufacture of baize and other worsted stuffs was formerly carried on over the greater part of this county, but since the middle of the 18th century it has progressively declined, and is now almost extinct. It has large establishments for the printing of calico, and mills for making sheet lead.

Essex is also the name of a county in Upper Canada, forming a promontory at the southern extremity of the province, and nearly surrounded by lakes Erie, and St. Clair, and Detroit river.

Essex is also the name of five counties in different parts of the United States of America: viz.

First in Vermont, bounded on the E. for about 45 m. by the Connecticut river, and bounded on the N. by Lower Canada; its mean breadth is about 20 m. Population 3,961: chief town Guildhall.

Second, forming the N. E. part of the state of Massachusetts, bordering on New Hampshire and the Atlantic Ocean; it is intersected by the Merrimack river, and contains several large towns: viz. Newburyport, Ipswich, Gloucester, Marblehead, Salem, and Beverly, &c. Population 82,867. Salem is the chief town.

Third, in New York, bounded on the E. for 52 m. by lake Champlain. Population 19,167. The court house is at Elizabethtown, in Pleasant Valley.

Fourth, in New Jersey, bounded on the W., N. and E. by the Passaic river; its area is only about 150 square m. Pop. 41,023. Newark, is the chief town; its contiguity to New York renders it the most populous and important part of the State.

Fifth, in the E. District of Virginia, on the S. W. bank of the Rappahannock river, along which it extends about 36 m. being about 8 m. in mean breadth. Pop. 10,531. Tappahannock, is the chief town.

Essex, p.t. Chittenden Co. Vt. Pop. 1,664. Also a village in Middlesex Co. Conn.

Esslingen, a village of Austria, on the N. bank of the Danube, about 6 m. E. S. E. of Vienna, between which and Aspern a sanguinary battle was fought between the French and Austrians, on the 21st and 22nd May, 1809.

Esslingen, a town of Suabia, in the kingdom of Wurtemberg. Here are several convents, but the inhabitants are chiefly Lutherans. It has three extensive suburbs, and its district yields good Neckar wine. It is seated on the Neckar, 8 m. S. E. of Stuttgart. Pop. about 7,000.

Estain, a town of France in the department of Meuse, 12 m. E. N. E. of Verdun.

Estakar, a town of Persia, in Farsistan, capital of a district of the same name. Near it are the magnificent ruins of ancient Persepolis. It is 50 m. N. E. of Shiras. Long. 53. 40. E., lat. 30. 5. N.

Estavayer, a town and bailiwick of Switzerland, in the canton of Friburg, with a fine castle, seated on the lake of Neuchâtel, 13 m. W. of Friburg.

Este, a populous town of the Venetian territory, 14 m. S. S. W. of Padua.

Estella, an episcopal town of Spain, in Navarre, with a castle and a university; seated on the Ega, 15 m. W. S. W. of Pamplona. Long. 2. 2. W., lat. 42. 38. N.

Estepa, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, with an ancient castle on a mountain, 18 m. S. of Ecija, and 58 E. of Seville.

Estepona, a town of Spain, in Granada, near the coast, 20 m. W. S. W. of Marbella.

Esterabad. See Asterabad.

Esthonia, or Revel, a government of the Russian empire, bounded on the W. by the Baltic, N. by the gulf of Finland, E. by Ingria, and S. by Livonia. After having been long an object of bloody contention between the Russians, Poles, and Swedes, it was confirmed to the latter by the peace of Oliva in 1660; but it was subdued by Peter the Great in 1710, and finally ceded to Russia in 1721. It is divided into 4 circles. Revel is the capital.

Esthwaite-water, a lake in Lancashire, Eng. between Hawkshead and Windermere-water. It is two m. and a half long, and half a m. broad, intersected by a peninsula from each side, jetting far into the lake. On the banks are villages and scattered houses, pleasantly situate under woods and hanging grounds clothed with verdure, all heightened by the strong back ground of rocky mountains. No char are found in this lake, though it is connected with Windermere-water.

Estill, an interior county in the E. part of the state of Kentucky, intersected by the Kentucky river; its area is about 500 square m. Pop. 4,618. Irvine is the chief town.

Estillville, p.v. Scott Co. Va.

Estremadura, a province of Spain, extending from the lat. of 37. 56. to 40. 15. of N. lat. bounded on the W. by the Portuguese province of Alemtejo and part of Beira. It is about 90 m. in mean breadth, giving an area of 14,400 square m. The pop. in 1820, was returned at 428,493. The N. end is intersected by the Tagus, and the S. by the Guadiana; it seems a country of great capability. The vine, olive, and corn, all luxuriate within its limits. Cattle and fine wool are the chief articles of trade; and great herds of black swine are fed on the hills, which are covered with oaks. Badajoz, near the Portuguese frontier, is the capital, and the other principal towns are Plazencia, Coria, Alcantara, Albuquerque, Truxillo, Merida, Olivenza, Xeres, and Llerena.

Estremadura, the metropolitan province of Portugal, lying on both sides of the Tagus; its area is about 700 square m. and the pop. in 1810, was returned at 826,680. The part S. of the Tagus is mountainous and unproductive, whilst the N. although in parts mountainous, is exceedingly fertile; the vine, olive, orange, lemon, and other delicious fruits, as well as corn, millet, and legumes, abound. Besides Lisbon, the capital of the province, and of all Portugal, the other principal towns are Leyria, Thomar, Abrantes, Santarem, and Alenquer, all N. of the Tagus, and Setubal near the coast on the S.

Estremos, a town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, and one of the strongest in the kingdom, being surrounded by ten bastions. An earthenware is made here, generally esteemed for its beauty and fine smell; and in the vicinity are quarries of beautiful marble. It is 18 m. W. of Elvas. and 100 E. of Lisbon. Pop. about 6,500.

Ezek, or Esseg. See Esseg.

Elampes, a town of France, in the department of Seine and Oise, seated on the river Loet or Elampes, 15 m. E. of Chartres. It is distinguished for the murder of its prefect on the 1st of March, 1792. Pop. in 1825, 7,693.

Elaples, a town of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, situate on the English Channel, near the mouth of the river Canche, 13 m. S. of Boulogne.

Etaya, or Etarech, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Agra, situate on the E. bank of the Jumna, which is here 60 feet high. On the top, near the river, are the remains of a fort. It is 62 m. S. E. of Agra. Long. 79. 16. E., lat. 26. 45. N.

Ethiopia, a name by which a vast region of Africa has been distinguished by some geographers, who have divided it into Upper and Lower Ethiopia. The first includes Nubia, Abyssinia, and part of Guinea: the second all the countries S. of the equinoctial line, as Congo, Monumugi, Monomotapa, &c. Ethiopia appears to have once been a great and powerful empire, but the details of its history are lost in the vortex of time. The Egyptian empire, was probably founded on the ruin of that of Ethiopia.

Etienne, St. a town of France, in the department of Loire. Beside the manufactures of arms, hardware, and cutlery (the most considerable in France,) the weaving of ribbands forms a considerable article of commerce. Coal is found in the neighbourhood, and also a soft stone, fit for grindstones. It is the seat of a prefect, 20 m. S. E. of Montbrison, and 32 S. W. of Lyon. Pop. in 1825, 19,102.

* * There are about a dozen other towns in different parts of France, named after St. Etienne, (Stephen) all inconsiderable.

Etive Loch, a navigable inlet of the sea, on the W. coast of Scotland, in Argyleshire. It is 20 m. in length, but of very unequal breadth; and its banks are indented with creeks, which afford safe anchorage. About 7 m. from the entrance it contracts into a narrow channel, called Connel, where a ridge of rocks occasion, at particular times of the tide, a violent current. About 2 m. below is the ancient castle of Dunstaffnage.

Etna. See Etna.

Etna, a township in Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 362. Also a village in Tompkins Co. N. Y.

Eton, a town in Buckinghamshire, England, seated on the N. bank of the Thames, opposite to Windsor, to which it is united by an elegant stone bridge over the river. Eton is celebrated for its school, founded by Henry VI. 1440, for the education of 70 scholars, a portion of which, when duly qualified, are annually elected to King's College, Cambridge. In addition to the 70 foundation scholars, there are generally 3 to 400 of the sons of the opulent classes, receive their education at Eton. The buildings are commodious and elegant, their light gothic turrets form a beautiful and interesting contrast to the massive and majestic towers of Windsor Castle, from which it is separated only by the river. Eton is 22 m. N. W. of London. Pop. in 1821, 2,475.

Etruria. See Tuscany, and Stoke upon Trent.

Ettenheim, a town in the territory of the grand duke of Baden, 25 m. S. by E. of Strasburg.

Ettlingen, a town of Suabia, in the duchy of Baden, on the river Albe, 4 m. S. S. W. of Durlach.

Eu, a town of France, in the department of Lower Seine, with a strong castle, and a harbour for small vessels at Treport. The principal trade is in serges and lace. It is seated on the river Bresle, near the English channel, 15 m. N. E. of Dieppe.

Eufemia, St. a town of Naples, on the W. coast of Calabria Ulteriori, on a gulf of the Mediterranean, to which it gives name, 27 m. S. by E. of Cosenza.

Eu-ho, or Precious-river, a river of China, in Pe-tche-li, which flows N. E. into the Pei-ho, at Tien-sing. Much grain is conveyed by this river for Pekin and it is also important for its connection with the N. extremity of the grand canal.

Eulë, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Kurzim, with a gold mine, 11 m. S. by E. Prague.

Euatorgia, or Kostof, a town of Russia, in the Crimea or government of Taurida, situate on the W. side of a salt lake, and near the Black Sea, 68 m. S. by W. of Perecop. Long. 33. 16. E., lat. 45. 12. N.

Eupem. See Oesper.

Euphrates, a noble river of Western Asia, which rises from three sources in Turkish Armenia. The principal head is about 35 m. S. E. of Erzerum, and is called by the Turks Bingheuil Frat, or 1,000 springs, and on the opposite side of the mountains from whence these springs flow, the Rakai, a branch of the Aras, which falls into the Caspian sea below Shirvan, also has its source: another branch of the Euphrates rises about 35 m. N. by W. of Erzerum; these two branches unite in the long. of 40. E., and lat. of 39. 50. N., and about 40. m. W. by S. of Erzerum, from whence the united stream becomes navigable for boats. Another branch rises on the frontier of Persia, in the long. of 43. 40. E., and runs a course nearly due W. to the long. of 39. 25. and lat. of 39.; the united streams are then called the Frat, and flow in a direction S. S. W. to Semisat, in the lat. of 37. 8. N. and long. of 37. 20. E., being within 60 m. of the gulf of Aïasso, at the N. E. extremity of the Mediterranean; from this point the Euphrates flows in a S. E. direction through 12 degrees of longitude in European Turkey, falling into the gulf of Persia, in the lat. of 30., and long. of 48. 40. E., the meridional distance from the source to the mouth of this noble river, is about 800 m. but the course of the stream is about 1,200. It is navigable for ships of the largest burthen to Bassora, 35 m. from its mouth; and, were the country through which it runs, inhabited by a social and well organized people, it might be instrumental to the conveyance of a reciprocal interchange of the products of Asia and Europe. A social, scientific, and enterprising people would not be content with its communicating with the Persian gulf, but would unite its waters with the Mediterranean on one side, and the Caspian sea on the other. The ancient Babylon was seated on its banks. See Syria. Irak-Arabi. and Roum, and Tigris.

Eure, a department of the N. of France, so named from a river which intersects the E. part, falling into the Seine, about 15 m. above Rouen; the Seine then forms its northern boundary to its entrance into the sea. Eure, however, may be considered a manufacturing and agricultural, rather than a maritime department. It is divided into five arrondissements.

Eure and Loire, an interior department of France, bordering on the preceding province, on the S. It is so named from the two rivers, the Eure and the Loire, both of which rise within the department; the Loire flowing to the S., and the Eure to the N., as described in the preceding article.

Europe, one of the five grand divisions of the globe; the extreme limits of which, are Cape Matapan, S. in 36. 23. N. and 22. 29. E., Cape St. Vincent, W. in 37. 3. N. and 9. 2. W., Cape North, N. in 71. 10. N. and 25. 50. E., Cara River, E. in 66. 30. N. and 63. 30. E. The longest meridional line, that could be drawn across Europe, would be from Europa point, in the strait of Gibraltar which divides Europe from the N. W. extremity of Africa, in the lat. of 36. 7. N., and 5. 20. of W. long., to the Cara river, in the long. of 63. 30. E. in the lat. of 66. 30. N. This line, the angle of which is N. E. bearing E. would intersect the gulfs of Dantzic, Riga, and Finland, and the lakes Ladoga and Onega; and its length would be 3,065 geographical, or 3,546 English statute m. The longest line that could be drawn from S. to N. would be from Cape Matapan at the S. extremity of the Morea, to Cape North, at the northern extremity of Finmark: this line would intersect the gulf of Riga, the entrance to the gulf of Finland, and the N. E. shore of the gulf of Bothnia; and its length would be 2,090 geographical, or 2,423 English statute m. The boundaries of Europe, however, on all sides, are extremely irregular, jutting out into several great peninsulas, so that if it was resolved into a square, the sides would not exceed 1,600 geographical m. each way. It is bounded on the N. by the Arctic Sea, W. by the Atlantic Ocean, S. from the long. of 5. W. to 35. E. by the Mediterranean Sea, and E. by Asia.

Among all the divisions of the globe, Europe is that in which perhaps the works of external nature are on the smallest scale, and in which certainly the development of mind is the greatest. "A mere adjunct of the immense Asiatic continent"—to use the words of the most illustrious geographer of modern times—"the whole peninsula could hardly contain a basin large enough for the Nile, the Kiang, or the Amazon. Its loftiest mountains cannot be compared in height, or in extent to the Andes, or Himalayas. If all its downs and uncultivated lands were added to the sandy plains of Africa, the augmentation might be wholly imperceptible. The productions of the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms are here few and insignificant. Its mines do not abound in gold; the diamond is not found among its minerals. There are not more than fifteen or twenty species of quadrupeds that belong exclusively to Europe, and these are not of the most useful kind. Some animals, as the horse, the ox, the sheep, and the dog, have been greatly improved by the care and industry of man; but the most valuable natural productions have been imported from other quarters of the world. The silk-worm was brought from India, fine wool from Mauritania, the peach from Persia, the orange from China, and the potato from America. If it is rich, its wealth has been derived from the produce or spoils of other countries." Presenting a less extent of surface than Asia, Africa, or America, this continent shows that surface more crowded with men, improved by cultivation, enriched by productive industry, and extensive commerce, embellished with mighty cities, and splendid works of art, illumined with the reflections of genius, and invested with irresistible preponderance in the scale of political importance. In other regions, we contemplate, amid the great physical features of the scene,

A world of wonders, where creation seems
No more the works of Nature, but her dreams.

In Europe, we behold a yet more elevating spectacle,—spirit asserting its supremacy over body,—and man, the lord of nature, pursuing most gloriously the high destiny originally assigned him 'to replenish the earth,' and to subdue it.' In other regions, it is matter we wonder at; in Europe, it is mind we admire. Here humanity has her chosen seat, and from hence have emanated her noblest gifts.

The superficial extent of Europe has been variously estimated by different geographers. Our want of information respecting the extent of some countries, and the doubts regarding the real boundaries between Europe and Asia, noticed above, increase the difficulty of stating precisely the extent of surface belonging to Europe. Kitchen reckons 3,258,038 English square miles; Hassel, 3,331,579; and Crome, 3,796,349. Perhaps, notwithstanding its irregularity of form, we may ascertain the superficial area of this continent with tolerable accuracy, by reducing it to an oblong square. If for angles of this square, be taken the North Cape in Norway, and the town of Ekaterineburg in the Russian government of Perm, Bordeaux in France, and Cape Solomon the eastern extremity of the Island of Crete, the sides of this parallelogram will measure 2,100 m., and 1,500 m. respectively, and will enclose a superficies of 3,150,000 square m.; and the different portions of land excluded from this measurement, will amount to about 300,000 square m., making in all a superficial extent of 3,450,000 square m. Europe thus embraces about one-sixteenth part of the whole terrestrial surface of the globe; and, with all its islands, does not exceed in superficial extent, the Australian continent. Europe is particularly distinguished by the seas and numerous gulfs that wash its shores, and the number and extent of its inland waters. Hence the facility with which the commercial intercourse of nations is here conducted; and hence too the influence which Britain has been enabled to exert over the political destinies of Europe, as a great maritime power. Europe has an abundance of inland lakes. The greater part of them are situated in Switzerland, Upper Italy, Germany, Russia, and Sweden; but very few of them can be compared, in point of extent, to those found in other parts of the world. The largest European lake is the Ladoga, in Russia, which has a superficial extent of 6,340 square m.; the Onega, in the same country, is about half that size, and greatly exceeds the largest of the remaining lakes. The accumulation of lakes, or insulated pools of water, in some places of Europe, is very remarkable. Some Russian governments possess an incredible number. They are less numerous in the western parts of Europe. But in Iceland, a hundredth part of the territory is occupied by lakes. Europe is abundantly watered, though its rivers are greatly inferior in size to those of the other continents. In fact, this continent is too much intersected by the sea, and presents too small a mass of land, to abound in such magnificent streams as are found elsewhere. In the eastern part only, where it stands connected with the great Asiatic mass of land, is found any considerable breadth of contiguous territory, and here also do we find its largest rivers.

The greater part of Europe is a mountainous surface; but the masses which tower up in the south greatly exceed those of the north. The plains of Europe are much inferior in dimensions to the same physical feature in the other continents. With the exception of the wide valley of the Theiss, and the basin of the Po, we do not recognise any extensive plain on the south of the Sudetic chain; but an enormous plain extends from the mouth of the Rhine, over the whole of northern Germany and the greater part of Poland, to the foot of the Uralian chain. The difference in general elevation between northern and southern Europe may be illustrated by stating, that if the waters of the Atlantic Ocean were to rise 1,500 or 1,600 feet above their present level, the whole of northern Europe, with the exception of the mountainous districts of Norway and Scotland, would be laid under water; while southern Europe, on the contrary, being higher than the level of such inundation, would form one or two large and high islands. The most elevated districts in Europe are Switzerland and Savoy. In the comparatively level countries of Europe, extending from Iceland to the Caspian sea, the mountains rise in insulated groups; while in the southern and central parts of this continent, or from Etna in Sicily, to the Blocksberg of the Harz, and from the Strait of Gibraltar, to the Bosphorus, all the mountains belong to one great connected system. In this quarter are the Alps,—the highest, and beyond comparison the most extensive range of mountains in Europe, though scarcely exceeding a half of the average height of the great South American chain under the equator. Perpetual ice commences here at the elevation of 7,000 or 8,000 feet. At the height of 10,800 feet the ice disappears, and the atmospheric vapour, congealed as it descends, covers the ground with eternal snow. The Alps extend over a space of 13,000 square miles. They branch out, in various angular directions, into the Maritime, Cottian, Graian, Feninne, Lepontine, Swiss, Rhetian, Norian, Carnian, Julian, and Dinarian Alps, which again spread out in many secondary chains. The Apennines, stretching in a vast crescent through the whole length of the Italian peninsula, and evidently connected with the mountains of Sicily, may be regarded as a southern branch of the Alpine series. The average height of this chain is about 5,000 feet. A second great chain stretches its branches over the whole peninsula of the Pyrenees. The two outer bulwarks of this peninsula—which consists of a central plain elevated from 2,000 to 4,000 feet—are the mountains commonly called the Pyrenees, stretching between France and Spain on the north, and the Alpujarras or Sierra Nevada of Spain on the south. The mountains of Auvergne, which are connected with those of Vivarais and the Cevennes, are united to the Pyrenees by the Logere. At the other extremity of Europe, three chains of mountains meet together, collectively called Argentario, at a point nearly equidistant from the Danube, the Adriatic, and the Ægean Sea. This central point may be considered as the nucleus of all the mountain in European Turkey. From it proceeds the ancient Hæmus or modern Balkan, eastwards to the Black Sea. A second range runs N. W. till it joins the Carnian Alps; and a third runs southwards through the peninsula, dividing the northern continent of Greece into two parts of nearly equal breadth, and passing into the islands of the Archipelago. As the Hellenic Mountains, with the exception perhaps of Athos and Olympus, have never been accurately measured, it is impossible to determine whether or not they are higher than the Apennines. Mount Orbelus, the northern boundary of the country, has, according to Pouqueville, its summit perpetually covered with snow, and must therefore, according to the laws that fix the lower limit of congelation, exceed 8,500 feet of elevation. None of the other Hellenic Mountains, however, whether they be insulated or disposed in groups and ranges, attain the line of perpetual snow. The Carpathian and Hercynian Mountains are separated from the Alps and the Hellenic Mountains by the Danube. This wild range, the general elevation of which is from 4,000 to 5,000 feet, completely encircles Transylvania, and is connected with the Sudetes or Giant Mountains of Silesia, and the Erzgebirge or Metallic Mountains of Saxony. The mountains of Russia have no visible connexion with the other European mountains. The woody heights of Valdai and Duderhof seem to form their centre, from which a number of secondary branches diverge, like radii, into the surrounding country. The British, Irish, and Icelandic mountains are all of secondary rank. There are only three volcanoes properly so called, in Europe; viz. Etna, Vesuvius, and Hecla. Besides these, however, there are nine jökuls in Iceland, and two mountains upon Stromboli and Milo, which emit flames. Some naturalists assert that there are two great subterranean fires under Europe, one of which cuts the first meridian of the Arctic polar circle, and the other extends under Italy and the Mediterranean, towards the Archipelago.

The greater part of Europe is situated within the northern Temperate zone; about a twelfth part only of its superficies extends within the Arctic polar circle. Although the astronomical climates are greatly modified in this part of the world by physical causes, we may, in taking a general view of the climate of Europe, consider it divided into four different districts, the boundaries of which are defined by parallels of latitude. The Arctic district of Europe extends over a superficies of about 400,000 square m., and the warm district may be estimated at 540,000 square m.; while upwards of 1,500,000 square m. belong to the cold, and 970,000 to the temperate. With the exception perhaps of Australia, Europe in natural fertility of soil, and variety and richness of productions, is much inferior to any other division of the earth. Zimmermann asserts that it has only sixteen species of indigenous animals, and these chiefly mice and bats. Some species of wild animals have entirely disappeared before the increase of population, while others have become extremely rare. The Fallow Deer are found in greatest abundance in England. Yet here they are diminishing.—And according to Aristotle, the lion was once found in Greece, but it no longer exists in Europe. The buffalo, the elk, the stein-buck, and the beaver, are becoming daily more rare in Europe; and the varieties of game—which once seemed to possess, under the protection of merciless tyrants, a fuller right in the soil than man himself—are now confined to juster limits. The rein-deer and dog are the only domestic animals of the Polar zone. The walrus, white bear, and blue fox, appear on the shores of the Frozen Sea. The horse is found to the 66th parallel, but in the high latitudes is reduced to a dwarfish stature; cattle too lose their horns in the northern regions, and shrink in size; even man himself appears here an inferior species, whether physically or morally considered. Some Asiatic animals are found in the neighbourhood of the Caspian and Sea of Azof. The black bear, the urus, and the wolf, are the most formidable wild animals now known in Europe. The jackal is found in all the warm regions; and the lynx and wild-cat attain considerable dimensions in the Italian forests. Europe, though not wholly free of dangerous reptiles, suffers less from their presence than any other region of the globe. The chameleon is one of the most singular European reptiles. The mosquito is troublesome in the highest north; and flights of locusts occasionally arrive in Taurida from the African or Syrian coast. Europe is indebted for its most valuable plants to other climates. Originally it probably possessed little more than forest-trees, a few shrubs, and some species of grass. The cereal and leguminous plants are now universally cultivated, and garden-herbs are here usually of finer quality than elsewhere. The vine is successfully cultivated at Witzenhausen under 51. 21. 30., and at Zullichau under 51. 58.; but, with these exceptions, wine manufactured above the 50th parallel does not deserve the name. The northern countries furnish good materials for the carpenter and ship-builder. The forest-trees of the warmer climate are tamarisks, carubes, sumachs, mastics, the cork-tree, planes, sycamores, and cypresses. Every species of the inferior and superior metals, and even several of the more precious minerals, are found in Europe. Hungary and Transylvania possess the nobler ores; Russia, Sweden, and Norway, abound in iron; England produces copper and tin; and Scotland, lead. There are likewise extensive mines of rock-salt, alum, saltpetre, and coal, in Europe.

It is difficult to estimate the precise amount of the population of Europe, notwithstanding the accuracy with which the census of most countries has been taken: for we do not possess a census of contemporary surveys, and in Turkey the population can only be loosely estimated from the number of hearths paying tax to the Porte. The population-returns of Russia, Hungary, Spain, and Transylvania, are very old. In 1787, Zimmermann estimated the population of Europe at 144,000,000; at present, according to Malte Brun, it is not likely to be overrated at 205,000,000. In 1819, Hassel estimated it at 180,550,000. Perhaps 200,000,000 will be pretty near the truth, which gives an increase of 56,000,000 in 40 years. This population is not equally concentrated throughout Europe. Thus, in the Duchy of Lucca, it is in the ratio of 288 to a square m.; while in Iceland and Faroe it is only 4.2-3; in the Netherlands it is as 212, in Great Britain as 178, and in Sweden and Norway as 10 to the square m. Upon the whole, the south of Europe is more populous than the north in proportion to its extent: and must continue so, as the means of subsistence are procured with so much greater facility in the countries of the former than in those of the latter. The climate of Norway is quite as favourable to longevity as that of Lucca; but the one comprehends a vast tract of rugged, unutilisable surface,—the other is a garden throughout.

In almost every European State, we find the citizens divided into four distinct classes. The first is that of the nobility, which exists in every State, with the exception of Norway and the Turkish empire. Nobility is, in most cases viewed in Europe as an hereditary rank; but it can be acquired by the will of the sovereign, and even, in some instances, purchased by money. The clergy form the second class of the community. The third is that of the citizens, or inhabitants of towns, which in most countries enjoys peculiar rights and privileges. The fourth and lowest class includes the peasants, and forms the mass of the population in every country.

Euroville, a town of France, department of Upper Marne, 5 m. S. E. of St. Dizier.

Euskirchen, a town of the Prussian states, 23 m. S. E. of Jülich.

Eustace, an island which forms, with a long point of land, the entrance to the harbour of St. Augustine, in E. Florida.

Eustatia, St. one of the least of the Leeward Islands, in the West Indies, 10 m. N. W. of St. Christopher. It is a mountain in the form of a sugar loaf, whose top is hollow, yet for its size, it is one of the most valuable of all the Caribbees. Tobacco is cultivated on its sides, to the very summit; and hogs, kids, rabbits, and all kinds of poultry, are in great abundance. It has a town of the same name, with a good fort. It was taken by the English in 1781, who pillaged the inhabitants, and confiscated all private property; it was soon after retaken by the French, and restored to the Dutch, in 1783; again taken by the English, in 1801, and again restored to the Dutch, at the general peace of 1814.

Eutin, a town of Lower Saxony, in Holstein, near the side of a lake, 20 m. N. N. W. of Lubeck.

Euxine, or Black Sea, a large inland sea, dividing Europe from Asia, between the latitudes of 41. and 47. N. extending E. from the long. of 23. to 41. 25., giving an extreme length from W. to E. of 606 geographical, or 702 British statute m. On the W. it washes the coasts of Romania, Bulgaria, and Bessarabia; and on that side receives the waters of the Danube: at the N. W. corner it receives the waters of the Dniester, and the Dniester, which flow through the southern provinces of European Russia; and from the N. between the longitudes of 33. and 37. E. projects the peninsula of the Crimea, or Russian province of Taurida. A narrow strait at the eastern extremity of this peninsula, leads into the sea of Azof, into which flows the river Don: the N. E. part of the Euxine, washes the coast of Circassia, and the territory of the Abkhas; the eastern extremity washes the coast of Mingrelia, which contributes to the waters of the Euxine by several streams, the most important of which is the Rioni or Phasis: the S. part washes the coasts of the Turkish provinces of Armenia, Roum, and Natolia which contribute the waters of the Kisi-Jernak, and numerous other rivers of inferior note. The Euxine communicates with the Mediterranean, first by the narrow strait of Constantinople into the sea of Marmora, and from thence by the Dardanelles, the ancient Hellespont, or Thracian Bosphorus, into the Grecian Archipelago. The navigation of the Euxine appears to have been more general in past than at the present time, the Phœnicians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Venetians, and Genoese, all appearing to have maintained an extensive intercourse with the inhabitants on its shores. In 1476, when the Turks drove the Genoese from the Crimea, they precluded all intercourse through the straits of Constantinople, and claimed an exclusive right of navigation within. In 1774 the Russians, and in 1784 Austria obtained by treaty an equal right of navigation, which at the peace of Amiens was extended to all nations; and since the peace of 1814 a considerable traffic has been carried on from the port of Odessa, between the rivers Dniester and Dniester, with the Mediterranean and with England; but the other parts of its extensive shores are but little frequented, and but little known, though doubtless susceptible of affording a rich field for well-directed enterprise and exertion.

Euzet, a town of France, in the department of the Gard, and the chief place of a canton, in the district of Uzès, 9 m. W. N. W. of Uzès.

Evansville, p.t. Vanderburg Co. Indiana.

Evcaux, a town of France, in the department of Creuse, near which is a mineral spring and baths. It is 25 m. E. of Gueret.

Evansburg, p.v. Crawford Co. Pa.

Everettsville, p.v. Albemarle Co. Va.

Everding. See Efferding.

Everfeld, or Elverfeld, a town of Westphalia, in the duchy of Berg, near the river Wipper, 18 m. E. of Dusseldorf.

Everghem, a populous town of the Netherlands, 7 m. N. of Ghent.

Evesham, a borough in Worcestershire, England. Here are three churches, and it had formerly an abbey, of which some remains are still visible. A remarkable battle was fought here in 1265, between prince Edward, afterward Edward I., and Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester, in which the earl and most of his adherents were slain. Evesham is seated in a fertile vale, and is nearly surrounded by the Avon. The vale is mostly appropriated to gardens, and supplies vast quantities of fruit and vegetables for the Worcester, Bath, Bristol and other markets. It has also some extensive flour mills, worked by the water of the Avon, over which there is here a bridge of 7 arches. It is 14 m. S. E. of Worcester, and 100 N. W. of London. It returns two members to parliament.

Evesham, t. Burlington Co. N. J.

Evora, a fortified city of Portugal, capital of Alemtejo, and a bishop's see, with a university. Some remains of the ancient Roman wall are visible, part of a temple of Diana, of which there are seven entire pillars standing, is now converted into butchers' shambles; and the famous aqueduct built by Sertorius, still conveys a noble stream of water to the city. Evora is seated in a pleasant country, surrounded on all sides by mountains, 65 m. E. by S. of Lisbon. Long. 7. 50. W., lat. 38. 28. N.

Evoramonte, a town of Portugal, in Alemtejo, situate on a rock, 8 m. W. S. W. of Estremoz, and 23 N. N. E. of Evora.

Evreux, a town of France, capital of the department of Eure, and a bishop's see. The cathedral is a handsome structure. The trade consists in corn, linen, and woolen cloth; and it has manufactures of cotton, velvets, and tick. It is seated on the Iton, 25 m. S. of Rouen, and 55 N. W. of Paris. Pop. in 1826, 9,728.

Exell, a town in Surry, Eng. contiguous to Epsom, 6 m. W. of Croydon, and 13 S. S. W. of London.

Ex, a river rising in the forest of Exmoor, in Somersetshire, Eng. and leaving the county below Dulverton, runs through Devonshire, by Tiverton, Exeter, and Topsham, whence it forms an estuary to the English channel, at Exmouth.

Exeter, a city of England, and the capital of Devonshire, on the river Ex. It was formerly the seat of the W. Saxon kings, who resided in the castle, called Rougemont, from the colour of the hill on which it is built. It was encompassed by walls, and four gates, two of which are now pulled down. With its suburbs it contains 19 churches, beside the cathedral, which is a magnificent fabric. It is governed by a mayor, has 13 companies of tradesmen, and formerly carried on an extensive commerce in woolen stuffs to Spain, &c.; but its commerce and manufactures have materially declined since the close of the 18th century, and its present importance is derived from the agreeableness of its locality, occasioning it to be much resorted to by the neighbouring gentry: an elegant new bridge crosses the river. The public buildings consist of a guildhall, county hall, hospital, lunatic asylum, &c. &c. It is situate 9 m. above the entrance of the river into the sea, 43 m. E. of Plymouth, 87 S. W. of Bath, and 168 W. S. W. of London, by way of Salisbury. Pop. in 1821, 23,479.

Exeter, p.t. Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 1,438.

Exeter, p.t. Rockingham Co. N. H. on Exeter river, a branch of the Piscataqua. It has several manufactures, and the saddlery business is carried on to a great extent. Some vessels are built here, the river being capable of floating down those of 500 tons. Here are an academy, and a court-house, 15 m. S. W. of Portsmouth, and 47 N. of Boston. Pop. 2,759. Also a p.t. in Washington

Co. R. I. Pop. 2,389. Also a p.t. in Otsego Co. N. Y. Pop. 1,690. Also a p.t. in Luzerne Co. Pa. Also a township in Berks Co. Pa. and villages in New Hanover Co. N. C. and Harrison Co. Indiana.

Exideuil, or Exsiderfil, a town of France, in the department of Dordogne, 20 m. N. E. of Périgueux, and 32 S. of Limoges.

Exilles, a strong town of Piedmont, with a fortified castle on a mountain, which guards one of the passes into the country. It is seated on the river Doire, 37 m. W. N. W. of Turin.

Exmouth, a village in Devonshire, Eng. on the E. side of the mouth of the river Ex, 10 m. S. S. E. of Exeter. It is much frequented for the benefit of sea-bathing.

Eybenschitz, a town of Moravia, in the circle of Znaim, on the river Ollawa, 12 m. S. W. of Brunn.

Eyder, a river and canal that separates Jutland from Holstein. The river rises in Holstein, and flows W. by Rendsburg, Fredericstadt, and Tonnungen into the German Ocean. The canal passes E. from Rendsburg to a bay of the Baltic, a little N. of Kiel. These jointly afford a safe inland navigation across the country, between the Baltic sea and German Ocean.

Eye, a borough in Suffolk, Eng. Here are the ruins of a castle and a Benedictine abbey. The women are employed in making bonelace. It is a mean place, 20 m. N. of Ipswich, and 89 N. E. of London. It returns two members to parliament. Pop. in 1831, 1,882.

Eyemouth, a town of Scotland, in Berwickshire, with a harbour for vessels of small burden and a trade in corn and meal. It is seated at the mouth of the Eye, 8 m. N. by W. of Berwick.

Eylau, a town in E. Prussia, 20 m S Ko nigsberg; famous for a bloody battle between the Russians and French, Oct. 7, 1807.

Eymoutiers, a town of France, in the department of Upper Vienne, with a considerable trade in skins, leather, and rags; seated on the Vienne, 20 m. N. of Limoges.

Eyndhoven, a town of Dutch Brabant, at the conflux of the Eynds with the Dommel, 13 m S. E. of Bois le Duc.

Eynowowitz, a town of Moravia, in the circle of Olmutz, 27 m. S. S. W. of Olmutz.

Exagen, a rich and ancient town in the kingdom of Fez, 60 m. S. of Tetuan.

Ezel, an island in Russia, in the Baltic sea, of a triangular form, about 8 m. in circumference. Long. 40. E., lat. 58. 20. N.

Ezy, a town of France, in the department of the Eure, 15 m. S. E. of Evreux.

F

FAABORG, a seaport town of Denmark, on the S. coast of the island of Funen, in a flat but fertile country. The principal trade is in provisions. It is 17 m. S. of Odense. Long. 10. 16. E., lat. 55. 12. N.

Fabists, p.t. Onondaga Co. N. Y. Pop. 3,071.

Fabriano, a town of Italy, in the marquise of Ancona, famous for its excellent paper. It is 25 m. N. E. of Foligno.

Factoryville, p.v. Tioga Co. N. Y.

Faenza, a city of Italy, in Romagna, and a bishop's see, with an old fortress. The cathedral stands in the great square, and has a steeple 5 stories high, with balustrades. In 1796 it was taken by the French; and afterwards taken by the troops of the pope. In 1797, the pope's troops were defeated and expelled. Faenza is famous for fine earthen ware. It is seated on the Amona, 20 m. W. S. W. of Ravenna.

Fahlun, a town of Sweden, capital of Dalecar-lla. Near it is a large copper mine, deemed the most ancient in Europe; also a manufacture of green and blue vitriol. It is situated in the midst of the rocks and hills, between the lakes Run and Warpen, 110 m. N. W. of Stockholm. Pop. about 4,000.

Faifo, a town of Cochin China, and a place of great trade; situate on a river that flows into the bay of Turon, 30 m. S. E. of Turon.

Fairbank, p.v. Chataouque, Co. N. Y.

Fairfax, a county of the E. District of Virgin is lying W. of the Potomac river, bounded on the E. by the district of Columbia. Its area is about 400 square m. Pop. 9,206.

Fairfax, p.t. Franklin Co. Vt. Pop. 1,739. Also towns in Fairfax and Culpepper Cos. Va.

Fairfield, a county at the S. W. extremity of Connecticut, bounded in a W. S. W. direction by Long Island Sound, and N. N. E. by the Housatonic river. It is divided into 18 townships. Pop. 46,950. The chief town of the same name is seated on the W. bank of a creek in Long Island Sound, 22 m. W. S. W. of New Haven. It was burnt by a party of Tories and British in 1777. Pop. 4,246.

Fairfield, is also the name of an interior county in the south part of Ohio, in which the Hocking river and a tributary of the Scioto have their sources; it extends about 30 m. from N. to S., and 15 in mean breadth. Pop. 24,788. Lancaster is the chief town.

Fairfield, a district of South Carolina, lying between the Catawba and Broad rivers. Pop. 21,546. Wanesborough is the chief town.

Fairfield, p.t. Herkimer Co. N. Y. Pop. 2,265. Also towns in Cumberland Co. N. J.; Crawford, Westmoreland and Adams Cos. Pa.; Rockbridge and Nelson Cos. Va.; Columbia and Putnam Cos. Geo.; Jefferson, Columbiana, Highland, Tuscarawas, Greene, Butler, and Licking Cos. Ohio. Nelson Co. Ken.; Franklin Co. Indiana, and Wayne Co. Illinois.

Fairford, a town of Gloucestershire, Eng. The church was founded in 1493, by John Tame, a merchant of London, purposely for the reception of some glass, taken by one of his vessels, in a ship going to Rome: it has 28 windows, beautifully painted with subjects chiefly scriptural, designed by the famous Albert Durer. It is seated near the Coln, 26 m. S. E. of Gloucester, and 30 W. by N. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,547.

Fairhaven, p.t. Rutland Co. Vt. Pop. 676. Also a p.t. Bristol Co. Mass. on Buzzard's Bay opposite New Bedford. Pop. 3,034.

Fairhead, the N. E. point of Ireland, rising 631 feet above the level of the sea, in lat. 55. 44. N., and 6. 2. of W. long. It is opposite to Roughlin Island.

Fair Isle, a small island in the Northern ocean, between the Shetland and Orkneys, from both which its high towering rocks are visible. On the E. side the duke of Medina Sidonia, admiral of the Spanish armada, was wrecked in 1598.

Fairlee, p.t. Orange Co. Vt. Pop. 656.

Fairley, a village of Scotland, on the coast of Argyshire, 12 m. N. W. of Irvine. It has a small harbour; and the strait in the frith of Clyde, formed by the coast and the Cumbray isles is called Fairley Road.

Fairport, p.v. Geauga Co. Ohio, on lake Erie. It has a good harbour for small vessels.

Fairtown, a village in Cumberland Co. N. J.

Fairview, a township in York Co. Pa. Also a village in Erie Co. Pa. on the lake. Also a village in Brooke Co. Va.; and a village in Guernsey Co. Ohio.

Faisas, an island in the river Bidasoa, which separates France from Spain. It is also called the Isle of Conference, because Louis XIV. and Philip IV. here swore to observe the peace of the Pyrenees, in 1660, after 24 conferences between their ministers. It is considered as a neutral place, and is situate between Andaye and Fontarabia.

Fakenham, a town in Norfolk, Eng. situate on a hill, by the river Yare, 9 m. from the coast, 20 N. W. of Norwich, and 108 N. N. E. of London. Pop. in 1821, 1,635.

Falaiss, a town of France, in the department of Calvados, with a castle, and one of the finest towers in France. It is the birth-place of William the Conqueror, and has a good trade in serges, linen, and lace. It stands on the river Ante, 20 m. S. E. of Caen, and 115 W. of Paris, it is the seat of a prefect. Pop. in 1825, 9,912.

Fale, a river in Cornwall, which flows by Gram-pound and Tregony to Falmouth, where it forms a fine haven in the English channel.

Falkenau, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Seats, with manufactures of alum, sulphur, and vitriol; seated on the river Egra, 12 m. N. E. of Egra.

Falkenberg, a town of Sweden, in Holland at the mouth of the Athran, on the Categat, opposite to the isle of Anholt, 17 m. N. by W. of Halmstadt.

Falkenberg, a town of Brandenburg, in the New Mark, with a castle, seated on the Drage, 32 m. E. by N. of New Stargard.

Falkenberg, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Oppeln, with a castle, 14 m. S. by E. of Brieg.

Falkenstein, a town in Germany, in a county of the same name. It stands a little to the N. of Winweiler, 24 m. W. by S. of Worms.

Falkenstein, is also the name of a town in the Vogtland, near the N. W. frontier of Bohemia.

Falköping, a town of Sweden, in W. Gothland, 56 m. E. of Uddevalla. It is memorable for a battle fought in 1388, between Margaret, queen of Denmark, and Albert, king of Sweden, when the latter was defeated and taken prisoner with his son.

Falkirk, a populous town of Scotland, in Stirlingshire, famous for its trysts, held thrice a year at which 60,000 head of black-cattle have been sold at one tryst, beside a great number of sheep and horses. It is seated near the Carron and the Great canal, 12 m. S. E. of Stirling. The royal army was defeated near this place in 1746. Pop. about 12,000.

Falkland, a town of Scotland, in Fifeshire, with some linen manufactures. Here are the ruins of the royal palace in which James V. died in 1568; some of its apartments are still inhabited. It is 20 m. N. of Edinburgh.

Falkland Islands, two large islands, surrounded by a great number of smaller, lying in the Atlantic ocean, to the E. of the strait of Magellan. The smaller of the two large islands lies E. of the other, from which it is separated by a channel called Falkland Sound. These islands were probably seen by Magellan, but Davis is deemed the discoverer of the main 1592. They were visited by sir Richard Hawkins, in 1594; and in 1765, commodore Byron made a settlement here; but in 1770, the Spaniards forcibly dispossessed the English. This affair was settled by a convention, and the English regained possession; but in 1774, it was abandoned, and the island ceded to Spain. Since the commencement of the 19th century they have been uninhabited.

Fall Creek, a stream in New York which runs into Cayuga Lake. The falls upon it consist of a violent rapid which after descending for a mile and a half, falls perpendicularly in a cataract of 90 feet. The view is very grand and picturesque.

Falling Spring, a cascade in Virginia upon a small creek which rises about 20 m. from the warm spring and runs into Jackson's River. This stream falls over a precipice 200 feet in perpendicular height, and the sheet of water is thrown so far forward that a person may walk dry between the cataract and the rock.

Ferrette, a town of France, in the department of Upper Rhine, on the river Ill, near its source, 40 m. S. of Colmar.

Fergusson, a township in Centre Co. Pa.

Fermainagh, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded on the N. by the counties of Donegal and Tyrone, E. by Monaghan, S. by Cavan, and W. by Leitrim, the N. W. end jutting upon Donegal Bay; it extends from the S. in a N. W. direction about 36 m. being about 24 in mean breadth, one-fourth of its area is occupied by Lough Erne, which discharges its waters into Donegal bay, dividing the county into nearly two equal parts. In the centre of the county, the water narrows so as to admit of the two parts being united by a bridge, see Enniskillen. The linen manufacture, and the raising of cattle, and hemp, are the chief employ of the inhabitants. The county is navigable throughout, by means of Lough Erne, but its uneven surface, and numerous bogs, render it difficult for travelling. Enniskillen is the capital and only town of importance in the county.

Fermo, a town of Italy, in the marquisate of Ancona, and an archbishop's see, with a good trade in corn, wool, &c. It has a harbour on the gulf of Venice, and is 17 m. S. E. of Macerata. Long. 13. 50. E., lat. 43. 7. N. Pop. about 7,000.

Fremosella, or Formosella, a town in Spain, in the province of Leon, seated on the N. bank of the Tormes, near its entrance into Douro.

Fermoy, a town of Ireland in the county of Cork, seated on the banks of the Blackwater, 106 m. N. W. of Dublin, on the road to Cork, from which it is distant 17 m. This place has risen from an inconsiderable village since the commencement of the war in 1793, to a town of 6,703 inhabitants in 1821.

Fernando Noronha, an island in the S. Atlantic, 100 leagues from Cape St. Roque, the N. E. point of the province of Pernambuco. Long. 32. 33. W., lat. 3. 56. S.

Fernando Po, an island of Africa, on the coast of Benin, 30 m. long and 20 broad. Long. 7. 36. E., lat. 3. 6. N.

Ferney, a village of France, in the department of Ain, a few m. N. W. of Geneva, celebrated as having been the residence of Voltaire.

Fernas, a town of Ireland, in the county of Wexford, and a bishop's see united to Leighlin. It is seated on the Bann, near its conflux with the Slaney, 17 m. N. of Wexford, and 30 S. S. W. of Wicklow.

Feroe Islands, a cluster of 29 small islands in the Northern Ocean, between the Shetland Islands and Iceland, in 5. and 8. W. long., and 61. and 63. N. lat. subject to Denmark. Seventeen are habitable, each of which is a lofty mountain, divided from the others by a deep and rapid current. Some of them are deeply indented with secure harbours all of them steep, and most of them faced with tremendous precipices. They produce agate, jasper, and beautiful zeolites. The surface consists of a shallow soil of remarkable fertility; yielding plenty of barley and fine grass for sheep. No trees above the size of a juniper, or stunted willow will grow here; and the only quadrupeds are sheep. Vast quantities of sea fowls frequent the rocks, and the taking of them furnishes a perious employment for the inhabitants. The exports are salted mutton, tallow, goose-quills, feathers, eiderdown, knit woollen waistcoats, caps, and stockings. To the S. of these islands is a considerable whirlpool. Pop. in 1890, 5,265.

Ferzabad, or Firuzabad, a city of Persia, in Farsistan, formerly of considerable repute, and yet contains a number of fine tombs, gardens, and buildings. It is seated in a fertile country, 60 m. S. by W. of Shiraz, on the route to Ormus. Long. 53. 0. E., lat. 28. 50. N.

Ferrara, a city of Italy capital of a duchy of the same name, and an archbishop's see, with a strong citadel, and a university. Its broad streets, and number of fine buildings, evince that it was formerly a flourishing place, but the present inhabitants are few in proportion to its extent. In the middle of the city is a palace, surrounded by walls flanked with towers and ditches. The cathedral is remarkable for its antiquity. In the Benedictine church, Ariosto the poet is interred. Ferrara was taken by the French in 1796; in 1799 it was retaken by the Austrians, but shortly after surrendered to the French. It is seated near the Po, 25 m. N. E. of Bologna. Long. 12. 36. E., lat. 44. 50. N.

Ferrara, or Ferraresse, a duchy of Italy, bounded on the N. by the Po, which divides it from Polesino di Rovigno, W. by the Mantuan, S. by the Bolognese and Romagna, and E. by the gulf of Venice. It had its own dukes till 1597, when Clement VIII. united it to the apostolic chamber. The air is unwholesome, on account of the marshes which the abject condition of the inhabitants precludes from draining. Ferrara is the capital.

Ferrendina, a town of Naples, in Basilicata, near the river Basiento, 25 m. S. W. of Matera.

Ferrisburg, a township in Addison Co. Vt. Pop. 1,322.

Ferro, or Hierro, the most westward of the Canary Islands, above 18 m. in circumference. It is not fertile, but produces some corn, sugar, fruits, and legumes. The inhabitants make use of water collected in cisterns during the rainy seasons, for there is no spring in the island. Voyagers speak of a fountain tree in the middle of the island, and say that in the night much water distils from its leaves. Some geographers have taken their first meridian from the W. extremity of this island. Long. 17. 52. W., lat. 27. 47. N.

Ferrol, a sea port of Spain, in Galicia, on a bay of the Atlantic. Its harbour is one of the best in Europe, and here the Spanish squadrons frequently rendezvous in time of war. The town is surrounded on three sides by the sea, and strongly fortified on the other. In 1800 the English made an unsuccessful attempt on this place. It is 20 m. N. E. of Corunna, and 305 N. W. of Madrid. Long. 8. 4. W., lat. 43. 28. N.

Ferrybridge, a large village in West Yorkshire, Eng. on the S. side of the Aire, over which is a noble bridge, 21 m. S. by W. of York, and 174 N. by W. of London.

Ferryport, a village of Scotland, in Fifeshire, on the frith of Tay, 4 m. below Dundee, and 9 N. N. W. of St. Andrews. It has a considerable manufacture of brown linens; and a ferry over the Tay, well frequented before the bridge at Perth was built.

Ferte sur Aube, a town of France, in the department of Upper Marne, seated on the Aube, 22 m. W. by S. of Chaumont, and 33 E. S. E. of Troyes.

There are seven or eight other towns in France named Ferte, all prefixed to some other name, as in the case of Aube, to distinguish them from each other.

Festenberg, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Oels, 14 m. N. W. of Wartenburg.

Fethard, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Tipperary, 8 m. S. E. of Cashel, and 86 S. S. W. of Dublin. Pop. in 1820, 2,878.

Fethard, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Wexford, on the W. side of Bannow bay, 14 m. S. by E. of New Ross.

Feverham, a town in Kent, Eng. on a creek falling into the mouth of the Thames, much frequented by small vessels. It is a member of the port of Dover, and governed by a mayor. The church is in the form of a cross, and the interior well worthy of observation; and here is a free grammar-school founded by queen Elizabeth. It has a market on Wednesday and Saturday; is famous for the best oysters for laying in stews; and has several gunpowder mills in its neighbourhood. Here are the remains of a stately abbey, built by king Stephen, who was interred in it with his queen and son. James II. embarked here in disguise, after the success of the prince of Orange; but the vessel was detained by the populace, and the king conveyed back to London. Feverham is 47 m. E. by S. of London. Pop. in 1820, 3,919.

Feurs, a town of France, in the department of Loire, seated on the Loire, 13 m. E. N. E. of Montbrison.

Feystritz, or Windisch Fistriz, a town and castle of Germany, in Lower Stiria, on a river of the same name, 17 m. N. N. E. of Cilley.

Fez, a kingdom of Barbary, at the N. W. extremity of North Africa, bounded on the W. by the Atlantic, N. by the Mediterranean, E. by Algiers, and S. by Morocco and Tafilet. It extends upwards of 400 m. from E. to W. and is about 150 in breadth; is divided into 9 provinces, and forms part of the empire of Morocco. The country is full of mountains, particularly to the W. and S. where Mount Atlas lies; but it is populous and fertile, producing citrons, lemons, oranges, dates, almonds, olives, figs, raisins, honey, wax, cotton, flax, pitch, and corn in abundance. The inhabitants breed camels, bees, sheep, and the finest horses in Barbary. At the extreme N. point is the town and fortress of Ceuta, garrisoned by the Spaniards, (see Ceuta); the principal places on the Atlantic coast are Salee and Larache; Melitta and Tangier, on the coast of the Mediterranean; and in the interior Mequinez, Fez, and Teza.

Fez, the capital of the kingdom of Fez, and one of the largest cities in Africa. It is composed of three towns called Beleyde, Old Fez, and New Fez. Old Fez is the most considerable, and contains about 80,000 inhabitants. New Fez, founded about the 13th century, is principally inhabited by Jews, who trade with the Moors, notwithstanding the contempt with which they are treated by them. Old Fez was founded in 793 by Sidy Edris, a descendent of Mahomet and Ali, whose father fled from Medina to avoid the proscriptions of the caliph Abdallah. The palaces are magnificent; and there are numerous mosques, one of which, called Carubin, is one of the finest edifices in the empire. The houses are built of brick or stone, and adorned with mosaic work: those of brick are ornamented with glazing and colours like Dutch tiles, and the wood-work and ceilings are carved, painted, and gilt. The roofs are flat; and every house has a court, in which is a square marble basin. Here are two colleges for students, finely built of marble, and adorned with paintings. The hospitals and public baths are numerous, many of which are stately structures. All the traders live in a separate part of the city; and the exchange, full of all sorts of rich merchandise, is as large as a small town. The gardens are full of all kinds of fragrant flowers and shrubs. The Moors of Fez are clothed like the Turks; and though more polished than their countrymen, are vain, superstitious, and intolerant. The saints, whom they pretend to have been buried in the city, serve them for a pretext to forbid its entrance to Jews and Christians; and an order from the emperor is necessary to gain admission. Arabic is better spoken here than in other parts of the empire; and the rich Moors send their children to the schools at Fez, where they gain more instruction than they could do elsewhere. Fez is the centre of the trade of this empire; and hence caravans go to Mecca, carrying ready-made garments, leather, indigo, cochineal, and ostriches feathers, for which they bring in return silks, muslins, and drugs. Other caravans go to Tombuctoo, and the river Niger. They travel over such dry barren deserts, that every other camel carries water. Their commodities are salt, cowries, wrought silk, British cloth, and the woolen manufactures of Barbary. Fez is seated in a circular valley, watered by a river, and surrounded by mountains, 160 m. S. S. W. of Gibraltar, and 240 N. E. of Morocco. Long. 4. 45. W., lat. 33. 40. N.

Fezzan, an interior kingdom of North Africa, lying between the great deserts of Zahara and Libya bounded on the N. by Tripoli to the Bashaw of which province Fezzan pays an annual tribute of 4,000 dollars. It is an extensive plain, encompassed by mountains, except to the W.; and to the influence of these heights it may be owing, that here, as well as in Upper Egypt, no rain is ever known. Though the character of the surface (which in general is a light sand) and the want of rain, may seem to announce sterility, yet the springs are so abundant, that few regions in the N. of Africa, exhibit a richer vegetation. The greatest length of the cultivated part is about 300 m. from N. to S., and 200 from E. to W. From wells of 10 or 15 feet deep, with which every garden and field is furnished, the husbandman waters the productions of his land; among these are the date tree, the olive, lime, apricot, pomegranate, fig, maize, barley, wheat, pumpions or calabash, carrots, cucumbers, onions, and garlic. Among the tame animals are the sheep, cow, goat, camel, ass, and a species of the domestic fowl of Europe. The wild animals are the ostrich, and antelopes of various kinds. A multitude of noxious animals infest the country; adders, snakes, scorpions, and toads, swarm in the fields, gardens, and houses; the air is crowded with mosquitos; and persons of every rank are over-run with vermin. The heat of the climate in summer is intense, and the S. wind is scarcely supportable even by the natives; and in winter a penetrating N. wind prevails, which drives to the fire even the natives of a northern country. Tempests of wind are frequent, which whirl up the sand and dust so as to give a yellow tinge to the atmosphere. The towns are chiefly inhabited by husbandmen and shepherds; for though they also contain merchants and artificers, yet agriculture and pasturage are the principal occupations. The houses are built of clay, with a flat roof composed of boughs of trees, on which a quantity of earth is laid. The natives are of a deep swarthy complexion; their hair a short curly black, their lips thick, their noses flat and broad, and their skin emits a fetid effluvia; they are tall, and well shaped, but weakly, indolent, and inactive. Their dress is similar to that of the Moors of Barbary. In their common intercourse, all distinctions of rank seem forgotten; the she-reef (or governor) and the lowest plebeian, the rich and the poor, the master and the servant, converse familiarly, and eat and drink together.

Generous and hospitable, let his fare be scanty or abundant, the Fezzaner is desirous that others should partake of it; and if twenty persons were unexpectedly to visit his dwelling, they must all participate as far as it will go. When they settle their money transactions, they squat upon the ground, and having levelled a spot with their hands, make dots as they reckon: if they are wrong, they smooth the spot again, and repeat the calculation. Gold dust constitutes the chief medium of payment; and value in that medium is always expressed by weight. In religion, they are rigid, but not intolerant Mahometans. The government is monarchical; and its powers are administered with such a temperate hand, that the people are ardently attached to their sovereign. Mourzouk, is the capital.

Fiano, a town of Italy, in the patrimony of St. Peter, on the Tiber, 15 m. N. of Rome.

Fianono, a town of Istria, on the S. W. coast, 17 m. N. of Pola.

Fielesier, an island near the W. coast of Norway, 22 m. long and 4 broad, with a town of the same name, 48 m. W. N. W. of Drontheim. Long. 10. 40. E., lat. 63. 44. N.

Fife, a maritime county on the E. coast of Scotland, forming a peninsula between the frith of Forth and Tay, it extends from the mouth of the river Forth, in a N. N. E. direction, about 40 m., and is about 12 m. in mean breadth. Some linen manufactures are carried on in the S. W. parts of the county, (see Dumfriesshire), but as a whole it is an agricultural rather than a manufacturing district; it produces coal and lime in abundance, and copper, lead, iron, and other minerals are also found in different parts of the county though but partially worked; a beautiful grey marble, cornelian, agates, and jasper, are occasionally met with, and fishing on its coasts and its rivers is assiduously pursued by the inhabitants. For divisions, rental, population, &c. see Scotland. Cupar is the assize town.

Fignuolo, an island in the gulf of Venice, near the coast of Istria. Long. 13. 47. E., lat. 45. 18. N.

Finale, a sea-port of Genoa, with a strong citadel, two forts, and a castle. It was the capital of a marquisate, and annexed to the duchy of Milan in 1602, but sold to the Genoese in 1713. In 1746, it was taken by the king of Sardinia, and restored in 1748. It is 30 m. S. W. of Genoa. Long. 8. 25. E., lat. 44. 14. N. Pop. about 7,000.

Finale, a town of Italy in the Modenese, on an island formed by the river Panaro, 22 m. N. E. of Modena.

Fincastrle, p.v. a village of Bottetourt Co. Va. 190 m. N. W. of Richmond.

Finisterra, Cape, a cape of Spain, forming the extreme N. W. point of that country, projecting into the Atlantic Ocean, from the province of Galicia. It was thought by the ancients, to have no country beyond it, and therefore they gave it this name which signifies the Land's-end. Long. 9. 17. W., lat. 42. 54. N.

Finisterra, a maritime department of France, which includes part of the late province of Bretagne. It is the most westerly part of France, and bounded on three sides by the sea; on the N. it forms the boundary to the entrance of the English channel. It is divided into five arrondissements, of which Quimper, Brest, Morlaix, Chateaulin, and Quimperle, are the seats of the prefects. The other principal towns are Lesneven, Landerneau, and Carhaix. For pop. &c. see France.

Finland, a country of the North of Europe, extending from the lat. of 60. to 66. 30. N., and in its extreme breadth from the long. of 21. to 31. 30. E. It is bounded on the S. by the gulf of Finland, and W. by the gulf of Bothnia; N. by Lapland, and E. by the Russian provinces of Wilburg and Olonetz; it formerly belonged to Sweden and was divided into two great parts, the N. called E. Bothnia, (see Bothnia), and the S. Finland Proper, which contains several considerable towns, of which Abo is the chief and capital of the whole country, (see Abo). The other towns are Nystadt, Raumo, and Biorneborg, on the shore of the gulf of Bothnia, and Helsinki, Borgo and Louisa, on the shore of the gulf of Finland. There are also 4 or 5 considerable towns in the interior. About one-third of the area of Finland Proper is composed of lakes. The contiguity of Finland to the maritime capital of the Russian empire, had long rendered it an object of jealousy to the Russians, and in 1808 they overran it with so formidable a force as to compel the Swedes to consent to a formal cession of the whole country, and it now forms one of the 50 governments of the Russian empire. It is divided into 13 districts, containing together in 1825, a pop. of 980,000, who contributed a revenue of 3,200,000 rubles, equal to about £130,000.

The Finns have been supposed to be nearly related to the Lapps; but though they are equally diminutive in stature, the fair hair, either yellow, flaxen, or almost white, added to the brave and warlike character of the Finn, evidence him to be of a different origin.

Tacitus describes the ancient Finns as a people "whose ferocity was extraordinary, and poverty extreme; having herbs for their food, skins for their covering, and the ground for their couch: regardless of man and of gods" continues he, "they have attained the very difficult condition of not having a single wish to form."

The modern Finn is honest, laborious, and capable of enduring great hardship; but he bears the reproach of being sometimes obstinate and inflexible. The Lutheran form of Christianity was introduced among the Finns by the Swedes; and since the annexation of their country to Russia, no attempt has been made to change their mode of religious worship.

Dr. Clarke describes the costume of the Finnish peasants as very elegant. Among the men it consists of a jacket, with pantaloons, buskins, and a sash, worn as a girdle, round the loins. The sash, though generally yellow, is sometimes red, and sometimes variegated with flowers. The buskins are bound about the ankles with scarlet garters, ending in a black tassel. The jacket and pantaloons are generally white; though blue, black, and grey, are also used. A few of the men appear in long white coats bound with the Don Cossack sash. The women wear a short scarlet or striped vest, made as gaudy as possible, with large and loose sleeves of very white linen, and white hoods or kerchiefs upon their heads. The vests are often of silk or rich damask, embroidered with large brocade flowers.

The Finns, like their neighbours, exhibit a scattered population, and a rude state of society. The cottages consist of dismal huts, with walls made of the round trunks of trees, barely stripped of their bark, and rather resembling a casual pile of timber, than a human dwelling. The interstices are caulked with clay and moss; a few glazed windows are occasionally seen; but their place is more generally supplied by square open cran- nies. "In fact," says Mr. James, from whom this account is derived, "the felling of the timber is the only part of the labour which a peasant thinks it behoves him to calculate upon, when about to erect his habitation."

Of the Finns who inhabit the islands of the Baltic, the last quoted writer thus speaks:—"The cottages of the islanders are rough-hewn log-houses; and they are themselves a people apparently of such simple manners and habits, as their secluded situation and scanty number might lead one to expect; each rustic householder is provided with the tools and implements of a dozen necessary arts or professions; performing for himself, with equal address, the duties of carpenter, shoemaker, tailor, fisherman, miller, baker, &c. Their corn mills are of simple form, and driven by sails constructed of wooden planks; and their mill-stones are shaped like the querne, or old Celtic machine for grinding with the hand. Luxuries, such as ochre paint for their cabins, or coats of woollen cloth, where sheepskins will suffice, are not common. Caps of the most ordinary fur serve as a covering for their heads; and for their feet, the want of shoes is supplied by a misshapen bag of dried seal-skin. The harness of their horses consists of nothing more than a plain collar attached to the shafts of the cart or sledge, through which, when the horse's neck is thrust, he has only to proceed: this contrivance answers all the purposes of draught, for neither here nor in Sweden is the animal trained to resist the weight of a carriage on the descent, however steep it may be."

Flamborough Head, a lofty promontory on the coast of Yorkshire, Eng. whose snow-white cliffs, rising from 300 to 450 feet above the level of the sea, are seen at a great distance from shore, and afford shelter to innumerable multitudes of sea-fowls. The lower parts contain vast caverns, and on the summit is a light-house, 5 m. E. N. E. of Burlington. Long. 0. 2. W., lat. 54. 8. N. There is a village of the same name, contiguous to the cliffs. Pop. in 1821, 917. Off this headland the celebrated John Paul Jones in the American Frigate Bonne Homme Richard, captured the British Frigate Serapis after one of the most desperate battles ever fought.

Flamstead, a village in Hertfordshire, Eng. Pop. in 1821, 1,392. It was a place of some importance at the time the Romans were in possession of England. The house in Greenwich Park, in which is the Royal Observatory, and from whence the English meridional line of longitude is drawn, is commonly called Flamstead House after the name of its first astronomer. See Greenwich.

Flanders, a country of Europe, bounded on the N. by the mouth of the Scheldt, and N. W. by the North Sea or German Ocean, lying between the lat. of 50. 40. and 51. 20. N. and 2. 15. to 4. 15. of E. longitude. The early history of this country is involved in considerable obscurity; it has, however, for several centuries ranked among the most fertile, populous, and civilized parts of Europe, it was formerly known under three divisions, of French, Austria, and Dutch Flanders; the French, or S. part, was comprised in the late province of Artois, now the department du Nord, or N. The Austrian comprised the centre from

E. to W.; and the Dutch the coast off the mouth of the Scheldt; the whole country was overrun by the French in the early part of the war which commenced in 1793, and confirmed to them by the treaty of Campo Formio in 1797. After the treaty of Luneville in 1801, Austrian and Dutch Flanders were divided into two departments; Lys on the W. and Scheldt on the E. and incorporated with the French Empire. At the general partitioning of this part of Europe, which followed the peace of 1814, those two departments were ceded to the new kingdom of the Netherlands, and were called the East and West Flanders. For their subsequent history, see Netherlands. The area of the E. part comprises about 1,080 square m., and contains about 600,000 inhabitants. It is divided into four circles, of which Ghent, Dendermonde, Oudenarde and Eecloo, are the chief towns; the other places of note are Sluys, Ardenberg, Phillipina, and Sas Van Ghent on the shore of the mouth of the Scheldt; and Deynse, Renaix, Grammont, Sotteghem, Alost, and Watteren in the S. The river Scheldt which rises in the French department, of Aisne enters the S. W. corner running N. by E. to Ghent in the centre of the province, and then nearly due E. till it changes its course to the N. forming the boundary of the province on the side of Brabant; towards the S. the surface is slightly undulated, but northward it is an entire level intersected by canals, communicating both with the North Sea and the mouth of the Scheldt.

West Flanders is bounded on the S. and S. W. by the French department; on the N. and N. W. by the North Sea; the area of this province is about 1,500 square m., containing 530,000 inhabitants. It is also divided into four circles, of which Bruges, Furnes, Ypres, and Courtray are the chief towns, the other places of note are the sea-ports of Nieuport and Ostend; the latter is regarded as the maritime portal of this part of Europe. This like E. Flanders is a level country; in the S. E. part, fine thread, lace, and linen cambrics are manufactured to a great extent for exportation; over all the other parts of the two provinces, fishing, agriculture and manufactures are assiduously pursued, and tend to render the inhabitants among the most social and best conditioned in Europe. The language of the common people is peculiar, a mixture of Dutch and French; but in the towns the French is most generally spoken. The Catholic religion prevails through both provinces; the clergy are a tolerant and respectable body.

Flie, or Vlieland, an island on the coast of Holland, N. of the Texel, at the middle of the entrance of the Zuider Zee.

Flint, a county at the N. E. extremity of Wales, bounded in a N. W. direction by the estuary of the river Dee, and N. by W. by the Irish sea. It is the smallest county in Wales, its superficies being only 243 sq. m. It is, however, rich in coal, copper and lead, and since the commencement of the present century, the cotton manufacture has been introduced, and the pop. during the 20 years, 1801—1821 has increased 36 per cent. The principal towns are Mold, Holywell, Hawarden, and St. Asaph (each of which see), there is also a town called Flint, formerly the chief town of the county, though now a small place. It has the county-goal, but the assizes are held at Mold. Here are the remains of a royal castle, in which Richard II. took shelter on arriving from Ireland; but on leaving it he was delivered into the hands of his rival, afterward Henry IV.: it stands on a rock close to the sea, and is governed by a constable, who is also mayor of the town. Flint has no market, but is well frequented as a bathing-place. It is seated on the estuary of the Dee, 12 m. W. N. W. of Chester, and 195 N. N. W. from London. Pop. in 1821, 1,612.

Flint, a river of the state of Georgia, which rises in the country formerly occupied by the Creek Indians, runs S. W. and joining the Chatahoochee, at its entrance into E. Florida, forms the Apalachicola.

Florac, a town of France, in the department of Lozere, 13 m. S. of Mende, and 65 N. of Montpellier. It is the seat of a prefect. Pop. in 1825, 2,082.

Florence, a celebrated city of Italy, capital of Tuscany, and an archbishop's see, with a citadel, and a university. It was first founded by the soldiers of Sylla, embellished and enlarged by the triumvirs; destroyed by Totila, and rebuilt by Charlemagne. The circumference is about 6 m. and the fortifications consist of only a wall and a ditch, with two or three forts which command a part of the town. It is divided into two unequal parts, by the river Arno, over which are four handsome bridges. The quays, the buildings on each side, and the bridges, render the part through which the river runs by far the finest; but every part is full of wonders in the arts of painting, statuary and architecture. The environs are beautiful, rich, and populous. Some of the Florentine merchants, formerly, were men of great wealth; and one of them, in the middle of the fifteenth century, built that noble fabric, which, from the name of its founder, is still called the Palazzo Pitti. It was afterwards purchased by the Medici family, who made some enlargements; and it thence became the residence of the grand dukes of Tuscany. The Palazzo Vecchio, or old palace, contains a room 172 feet long, and 70 wide, for public entertainments. The beauties and riches of these palaces, in all that is masterly in architecture, literature, and the arts, especially those of painting and sculpture have been often described. The celebrated Venus of Medici, the standard of taste in female beauty and proportion, stood in a room called the Tribune; this, with other masterpieces of sculpture, was carried away to Paris, but restored with most of the other works of art at the general peace in 1815. There are other rooms, whose contents are indicated by the names they bear; as the cabinet of arts, of astronomy, natural history, medals, portraits, porcelain, antiquities, &c. Beside the Medicean library begun by Julius de Medici, and greatly augmented by duke Cosmo I., there are several other copious libraries, especially those in the two Benedictine and Carmelite convents. The Florentine Academy and the Academia della Crusca were instituted to enrich the literature and improve the language of Tuscany; the latter is so named because it rejects like brax all words not purely Tuscan. The cathedral, the churches, and other public buildings, contain paintings and sculpture by the first masters in Italy; and the chapel of Lorenzo is perhaps, the most expensive habitation that ever was reared for the dead, being incrustured with precious stones, and adorned with the workmanship of the best modern sculptors. The manufactures of Florence are chiefly silks, satins, gold and silver stuffs, and damask table cloths. It has a considerable trade in fruits, oil, and excellent wines. Florence is 45 m. E. N. E. of Leghorn, which is its out-port, and 125 N. W. of Rome. Long. 11. 3. E., lat. 43. 46. N. Pop. in 1825, 75,207.

Florence, p.t. Oneida Co. N. Y. Pop. 964. Also a village in Alabama, the capital of Landerdale Co. on the Muscle Shoals of Tennessee River. Also a village in Huron Co. Ohio.

Florent, St. a town of France, in the department of Mayenne and Loire, with a Benedictine abbey; seated on the Loire, 20 m. W. S. W. of Angers.

Florentino, or Florentino, a province of Tuscany; bounded on the N. W. by the republic of Lucca and the Modenese; N. E. by the Apennines, and S. by the Siennese. Pop. about 580,000: besides Florence the capital, the other principal towns are Leghorn, Pisa, and Pistoia.

Flores, or Mangayle, an island of the East Indies, one of the chain that forms the S. boundary of the Java and Banda seas, 108 m. long and 45 broad, lying to the E. of that of Sumbawa. On the S. side, near the E. end, is a town named Larantuca. Long. 121. 56. E., lat. 8. 50. S.

Flores, a fertile island, one of the Azores, so called from the abundance of flowers found upon it. Lagens is the most populous town, but St. Cruz is the capital. Long. 31. 0. W., lat. 39. 34. N.

Florida, a Territory of the United States, and the most southern portion of the country. Its southern point is in 25. N. lat., and it extends N. to 31. It lies between 80. 25. and 87. 20. W. long. and contains, about 45,000 sq. m. It is shaped somewhat like an L, the southeastern part being a peninsula washed by the ocean on the E., and the Gulf of Mexico on the W. Its boundaries on the N. are Georgia, and Alabama. It has been usual to consider this territory as consisting of two divisions, East and West, but there is at present no political distinction.

The land is low and generally either sandy or swampy. On the coast it is mostly barren. There are many savannas covered with a thick growth of grass and flowers. In the swampy tracts the cane brakes are of an enormous height and thickness. The reed canes are sometimes 30 and 40 feet high. The ponds and bayous are in summer covered with aquatic plants, and abound with alligators. The uplands of the interior are the most fertile and bear the name of hammoc lands from the tufts or swells which they exhibit. The greater part of the surface is a pine barren; this is a land with a grey and reddish soil producing coarse grass and a scanty growth of pine trees. Almost every part of the county affords abundance of timber, as pitch pine, live oak, cypress, &c. Two thirds of the country are covered with pine forests.

The magnolia is a very common and beautiful tree, and grows to the height of 100 feet with a straight trunk surmounted by a conical mass of dark green foliage covered over with large milk-white flowers. Orange trees also flourish here, and about St. Augustine and on the borders of many of the lakes and savannas are many beautiful groves of them. Limes, grapes, and figs, grow wild. The long moss or Spanish beard which hangs in festoons upon the branches of the live oak and pine, affords a good material for stuffing.

This country is very thinly inhabited, and hardly any thing is known from experience as to its capabilities for agriculture; but it is thought to be excellently adapted to the culture of tobacco, cotton, indigo, rice, and sugar. At present the chief objects of attention among the planters, are maize, rice, potatoes, beans, melons, &c. The olive and coffee have been tried here and the former will undoubtedly succeed.

The climate is very hot, although in the northern parts water sometimes freezes. In the peninsula the most delicate orange trees bear fruit in full perfection. In the lower parts the air is moist, and in the neighbourhood of the rice fields it is unhealthy. From October to June the weather is most delightful. The southern extremity is subject to the hurricanes of the West Indies.

The largest river is the St. Johns, which rises in the centre of the peninsula and flows north-easterly to the sea; it passes through several lakes and its current is gentle. The Apalachicola passes through West Florida into the Gulf of Mexico. Many small streams rise in the pine forests and fall into the inlets of the Gulf. The springs which give rise to these rivers are very remarkable for their size and depth. See Wakulla Fountain.

The only towns of consequence are St. Augustine on the eastern coast, and Pensacola on the western. There is a chain of low islands or sand banks skirting the whole coast, but they afford few good harbours. Off Cape Sable, which is the southernmost point of the peninsula, are a cluster of islands at some distance from the land, on one of which, called Key West, was lately established a naval station of the United States.

Florida is divided into 15 counties. The Governor is appointed by the United States, and there is a legislative council of 16 members. Tallahassee is the seat of government. It has one delegate in Congress. The Pop. is 34,723, of whom 15,510 are slaves. The commerce of the territory is inconsiderable. The shipping in 1828 amounted to 2,781 tons. The imports for 1829 were 153,642 dollars. The exports of domestic produce, 38,163 dollars. Total exports 56,086 dollars.

This territory was discovered in 1497. It was first settled by the Spaniards in 1524. Some settlements were made by the French about 30 years afterwards, and they established themselves in the neighbourhood of the spot where St. Augustine now stands in 1564. The Spaniards however, expelled the French. In 1763 Florida was ceded to Great Britain, and retained by that power till 1781 when it was reconquered by the Spaniards. In 1821 Spain ceded it by treaty to the United States as an indemnity for spoliation upon our commerce; and the following year it was made a territorial government.

Florida Cape, is on the E. coast of East Florida, in the gulf of the same name, in the lat. of 26. 41. N., and 80. 5. of W. long.; 90. m. N. E. of Cape Sable, and about 30 W. of the N. W. end of the Great Bahama Bank.

Florida, Gulf of, is the passage out of the gulf of Mexico into the Atlantic Ocean, between the N. W. coast of the island of Cuba, and the Bahama Bank and islands on the E., and the promontory of East Florida on the W. Through this passage the great body of waters flowing into the gulf of Mexico from the Mississippi, Colorado, and Rio del Norte, set, in a continual stream, running at the rate of 4 to 5 m. per hour: the stream continues to run along the eastern coast of North America, to the lat. of 42., when the current is dispersed by the great bank of Newfoundland. The gulf passage is from 30 to 130 m. wide, the narrowest part being between Cape Florida, and the Great Bahama Bank before mentioned.

Florida Keys, or Martyrs Islands and Reefs, are the shoals and sand-banks flanking the southern extremity and E. coast of the promontory of East Florida, as previously described.

Fo-kien a maritime province in the S. of China, bounded on the N. by Tche-kiang, W. by Kiang-si, S. by Quang-tong, and E. by the China Sea. The climate is warm; and yet the air is so pure, that no contagious diseases ever prevail. It produces musk in abundance, precious stones, quick-silver, iron, and tin; also gold and silver, but it is forbidden to dig for these. It has fine plains; and industry fertilizes even the mountains, the greater part of which are cut into terraces, rising above each other. Its valleys are watered by springs and rivers from the mountains, which the husbandman distributes with great skill, to refresh his rice: he has even the art to raise his water to the tops of the mountains, and to convey it from one side to the other, by pipes made of bamboo. The people speak a different language in most of the cities, each of which has its particular dialects. The language of the mandarins is that which is spoken every where; but few understand it in this province: however, it produces a great number of literati. It contains 9 cities of the first and 60 of the third class. Fou-tcheo is the capital.

Folashill, a parish in the county of the city of Coventry, Eng. lying on the N. side of the city, and intersected by the Coventry canal. Pop. in 1820, 4,937, almost exclusively employed in the riband manufacture.

Foligno, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Umbria, famous for its sweetmeats, paper mills, and silk manufactures. It is seated on the W. side of the Apennines, near a fertile plain, 69 m. N. of Rome.

Formentera, an island in the Mediterranean, belonging to the crown of Spain. It is situated to the south of Ivica, from which it is separated by a channel 4 m. wide.

Formosa, an island in the China Sea, lying between 120. and 122. E. long., and 22. and 25. N. lat., and separated from the province of Fo-kien, in China, by a channel about 80 m. where narrowest. It is 280 m. from N. to S., and 70 in its broadest part, but is greatly contracted at the S. extremity. It is subject to the Chinese, who, however, did not know of its existence till the year 1430. A chain of mountains, running its whole length, divides it into two parts, the E. and W. The Dutch built the fort of Zealand, on the W. part, in 1643. They were driven thence, in 1661, by a Chinese pirate, who made himself master of all the W. part. In 1683 the whole island submitted to the emperor of China. It contains extensive and fertile plains, watered by a great number of rivulets from the mountains. It produces abundance of corn and rice, most of the Indian fruits, many of those of Europe, tobacco, sugar, pepper, camphire, and cinnamon. Wholesome water is the only thing wanting in Formosa. The inhabitants rear a great number of oxen, which they use for riding, from a want of horses. This island was almost totally destroyed by a furious hurricane and dreadful inundation of the sea. Taiouang, at the S. W. end of the island, is the capital.

Formosa, Cape, the point of land between the bights of Benin and Biafra, in the gulf of Guinea. Lat. 4. 15. N., and 5. 10. of E. long. One of the Bissagos Isles on the W. coast of North Africa, is also called Formosa. Lat. 11. 30. N., long. 16. 10. W.

Its chief product is the barilla plant, it also produces some wheat, barley, beavers, and goats. The S. W. point is in long. 14. 31. W., lat. 28. 4. N.

Forth, a river of Scotland, which rises in the mountain Ben Lomond, in Dumbartonshire, flows E. in a sinuous course by Stirling and Alloa, and meets the German Ocean a little below Alloa, where it forms a noble estuary, called the Frith of Forth. The Forth is navigable for vessels of 80 tons, as far as Stirling bridge, and for merchant vessels of any burden, as far as Grangemouth, where there is a communication between this river and the Clyde, by a canal.

Forth, Frith of, the estuary above mentioned, is about 10 m. in mean breadth, that is, reckoning the entrance from North Berwick on the S., to Elie Ness on the N., the distance from which two points is about 8 m.; from this line to the Queensferry, where it narrows to a m. and a half, the distance is about 28 m. and from Queensferry to Grangemouth the distance is about 12 m. the water spreading again to the extent of 3 to 4 m. Between Queensferry and the line of Elie Ness are a number of islands, the most celebrated of which, are Inch Garvie, Inch Colm, and Inch Keith; on the latter, and on the Isle of May, without the line of Elie Ness, are light-houses, and these, as well as most of the other islands, contain ruins of castles or religious houses. St. Abb's head on the S., and Fife Ness on the N., distant from each other 35 m. are by some considered as forming the points of entrance to the Frith of Forth.

Fortrose, a borough of Scotland, in Rosshire, situate on the Murray Frith nearly opposite Fort George, to which there is a regular ferry. It is composed of two towns, Rosemarkie, and Chanonry; the former a very ancient borough, and the latter one, a bishop's see. Two small parts of the ancient cathedral remain, one used as a burial-place, the other as a court-house and prison. It is 9 m. S. S. W. of Cromarty.

Foster, p.t. Providence Co. R. I. 15. m. W. Providence. Pop. 2,672.

Fotheringay, a village in Northamptonshire, Eng. 3 m. N. of Oundle, near the Nen. Here are the ruins of a castle in which Richard III. was born, and Mary Queen of Scots tried and beheaded. In the church are interred two dukes of York; Edward, killed at Agincourt in France, and Richard, slain at Wakefield.

Foue, or Faoua, a town of Lower Egypt, seated on the W. branch of the Nile, 25 m. S. by E. of Rosetta.

Fougeres, a town of France, in the department of Hle and Vilaine, with an ancient castle. In 1802, it was taken by John, king of England. It is seated on the Coesnon, 25 m. N. E. of Rennes, and 150 W. by S. of Paris. It is the seat of a prefect.

Foula, or Foula. See Fula.

Fouli, Pholey, or Foulah, a country of Africa, extending on both sides of the river Senegal about 500 m. from E. to W.; the boundaries from N. to S. are unknown. It is populous and fertile. The Foulahs are, in general, of a tawny complexion, though many of them are entirely black. Some lead a wandering life, and roam about the country with large droves of cows, sheep, goats, and horses: others are dexterous at hunting wild beasts; the teeth of elephants, and the skins of lions, leopards, and tigers, being articles of trade. Their arms are bows and arrows, lances, swords, daggers, and occasionally a kind of small fusée. They are praised by travellers for their hospitality: nor is their humanity in other respects less commendable; for if one of their countrymen have the misfortune to fall into slavery, the rest join stock to redeem him. The king of this country is called the Siratick; and though he seldom appears with the badges of majesty, he has great authority, and is as much respected as any one on the coast.

Foulness, a small island on the S. E. coast of Essex, Eng. formed by the river Crouch, at its entrance into the mouth of the Thames. It has a village, with a church, 8 m. E. by N. of Rochford. Pop. in 1821, 565.

Fozcroft, a township in Penobscot Co. Me. Pop. 677.

Fox Islands, a group of islands in the Northern Archipelago. They are 16 in number, between the coast of Kamtschatka and the W. coast of America, between 52. and 55. N. lat. Each island has a peculiar name; but this general name is given to the whole group, on account of the great number of black, gray, and red foxes, with which they abound. The dress of the inhabitants consists of a cap, and a fur coat which reaches down to their knees: some wear a cap of party coloured bird-skin, upon which is left part of the wings and tail. On the forepart of their hunting and fishing caps, they place a small board, like a screen, adorned with the jawbones of sea-bears, and ornamented with glass beads, which they receive in barter from the Russians. They feed upon the flesh of all sorts of sea animals, and generally eat it raw. The provision intended for keeping, is dried without salt, in the air. Their weapons are bows, arrows and darts; and for defence, they use wooden shields. The most perfect equality reigns among them: they have neither chiefs nor superiors, neither laws nor punishments. They live together in families, and societies of several families united, which form what they call a race, who, in case of attack or defence, mutually aid each other. They have a good share of plain natural understanding; and seem cold and indifferent in most of their actions; yet if an injury, or mere suspicion, rouse them from this phlegmatic state they become furious and revengeful. The Russians call these islands the Lyssie Ostrova.

* * There is a cluster of small but beautiful, fertile and romantic islands, called Fox islands, in Penobscot Bay, Maine.

Foxford, a town of Ireland, in the county of Mayo, on the river Moy, 8 m. E. N. E. of Castlebar. Pop. in 1821, 1,024.

It passes by St. Johnstown and Londonderry, and 4 m. below expands into a bay, called Lough Foyle, of an oval form, 14 m. long and 8 broad, which communicates with the ocean by a short and narrow strait.

Fraga, a town of Spain, in Arragon, strong by situation, having the river Cinca before it, whose high banks are difficult of access, and at its back a hill, which cannot easily be approached with cannon. Alphonso VII., king of Arragon was killed here by the Moors, in 1134, when he besieged this town. It is 63 m. E. S. E. of Saragossa.

Fragas, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, 7 m. S. W. of Santarem.

Framingham, p.t. Middlesex Co. Mass. 20 m. S. W. Boston. Pop. 2,213.

Framlingham, a town of Suffolk, Eng. It has the remains of a castle. To this place the princess Mary retired, when lady Jane Grey was proclaimed queen; and here she found that powerful support, which soon seated her on the throne. It is 30 m. E. of Bury, and 87 N. E. of London.

Francavilla, a town of Naples, in Terra di Otranto, with a trade in oil, cotton stockings, and snuff, 15 m. E. N. E. of Taranto.

Francavilla, a town of Naples, in Basilicata, on the river Sino, 20 m. W. S. W. of Trusi.

France, a country of Europe, extending in its extreme limits from the village of Peats de Mello, at the foot of the Eastern Pyrenees, in the lat. of 43. 25., in nearly a perpendicular line to Dunkirk, in the lat. of 51. 2. N.; this line gives a distance of 517 geographical, 593 British statute m.; the most important extreme point on the W. is Brest, in the long. of 4. 29. W., and 48. 23. of N. lat., and on the E. Strasburg in the long. of 7. 45. E. and lat. of 48. 35.; the distance between those two points is 12. 14. of W. long., which in the mean lat. of 48. 29. is equal to 490 geographical, or 576 British statute m., but a line exceeding this by about 40 m. might be drawn in this direction within the French territory, from Point Ras, 28 m. S. of Brest, to the extreme eastern limit, 45 m. S. by E. of Strasburg; the mean line, however, from N. to S. does not exceed 470, and from W. to E. 420 British statute m. This limit gives a superficies of 197,400 sq. m., equal to 126,336,000 British statute acres; a report made to the French government in 1817 computed the superficies to be equal to 128 millions of acres, of which about 92 millions were in a state of cultivation, and about 36 millions of acres reported as unproductive, and unfit for cultivation.

This fine territory is bounded from Dunkirk to the Rhine, in the lat. of 59. N. a distance of 290 m. in a direction E. S. E. of Netherlands and the Prussian provinces of the Rhine; about 100 m. of this frontier nearest to Dunkirk is an open plain without any natural barrier; further S. the inroad is more or less impeded by forests. From the lat. of 49. the Rhine in a direction S. by W. for about 110 m. divides France from the territory of the grand duke of Baden; from the lat. of 47. 40. to 43. 42. it is divided from Switzerland, Savoy, and Piedmont, by collateral ridges of the Alpine mountains; the S. E. extremity is bounded by the little river Var which divides France from the county of Nice. The meridional distance from this point to the eastern extremity of the Pyrenees is 220 statute m., but the indentations of the Mediterranean sea, give an extent of sea-coast on that side of France, near to, if not exceeding 300 m. The Pyrenean mountains in a direction W. by N. for 250 m. next form the southern boundary of France, dividing it from the Iberian peninsula of Spain and Portugal; the little river Bidassoa forms the boundary at the S. W. extremity, and W. from the mouth of this river in the lat. of 43. 22. and 1. 47. of W. long. to the isle of Ushant, in the lat. of 48. 28. and 5. 3. of W. long. France is bounded by the Atlantic Ocean; and N. W. from the Isle of Ushant to Dunkirk by the English channel. The meridional distance from the Bidassoa to Ushant is 390 m., and from Ushant to Dunkirk 390 m., but the indentations of the sea will give about 500 m. of coast on each side of the isle of Ushant, and with the S. E. boundary on the Mediterranean an aggregate extent of sea-coast of about 1,300 m., and a circumference of about 2,200 m. The sea-ports are Dunkirk, Calais, Boulogne, Dieppe, Fecamp, Havre, Caen, Cherbourg, St. Malo and Morlaix, on the coast of the English channel; Brest, Quimper, L' Orient, Nantes, Rochelle, Rochefort, Bordeaux, and Bayonne, on the coast of the Bay of Biscay or Atlantic Ocean, and Marseilles and Toulon in the Mediterranean; Cherbourg, Brest, Rochefort, and Toulon are the chief stations of the French national marine.

Every part of France is intersected by rivers flowing in all directions. Taking them in geographical order from the N. the first entitled to notice are the Moselle and the Meuse, both of which rise in the N. E. part of France, and take circuitous courses northerly into the Netherlands, the former falling into the Rhine, and the latter into the N. Sea. The Somme is an inconsiderable river running W. N. W. into the English channel. The next in order and importance is the Seine which also runs in a W. N. W. direction into the English channel, being joined in its course by the Marne, Aube, and the Oise, on the N., and by the Yonne and the Eure on the S. The Orne, and two or three other rivers of inferior note also fall into the English channel. The noblest river in all France is the Loire, which rises in the S. and flows in a direction N. by W. for about 250 m., when it takes a direction nearly due W. for about 250 m. more, falling into the Atlantic Ocean. It receives in its course numerous tributary streams, the most considerable of which, are the Allier, running parallel with it from the S. for about 180 m., and the Cher, Indre, Creuse, Vienne, and Sevre, all from the S., and from the N. it receives the Lower Loire, Sarthe, Mayenne, and a few others of a smaller size. In the S. the united streams of the Lot, the Tarn, and Garonne, with several others of inferior note, form the Gironde which falls into the Bay of Biscay, being joined from the E. below Bordeaux by the Dordogne and Ille. Between the Loire and the Gironde the Charente, and between the Gironde and the Pyrenees the Adour, each with numerous tributary streams also fall into the Bay of Biscay. The Rhone rising near Mount St. Gothard in Switzerland, after forming the lake of Geneva it enters France on the S. E., and after a course of about 80 m. to Lyons, first S. and then W. it takes a course nearly due S. from Lyons, for about 150 m. falling into the Mediterranean; being joined at Lyons by the Saone from the N., and below Lyons from the E. by the Isere, the Drome, and the Durance. The Seine is united with the Loire by a canal as is the Garonne with the Mediterranean sea.

Since the revolution which commenced in 1789, France has been divided into 86 departments, each department into 3 to 6 arrondissements, the total being 368, the arrondissements into 2,669 cantons, and the cantons into 38,990 communes. According to censuses of the population taken in 1789, the numbers were 26,300,000, and in 1820, 30,451, 187; this number, taken in reference to the extent of surface over which it is spread, renders France, relatively, more than one-third less populous than England and Wales.

With the exception of the S. E. departments bordering on the Alpine territories of Switzerland, Savoy, and Piedmont which are elevated, France may be regarded as a level, rather than a mountainous country, and in many respects, alike in a geographical, political, and social sense, as bearing a similar relation to Europe that the fine and fertile plains and people of China do to Asia. Over all the S. E. part of the country the vine, almond, olive, and mulberry, luxuriate and bring forth fruit in the highest degree of perfection, and the vine and a variety of delicious fruits flourish over the greater part of the country, to the 49th degree of lat.

Wild animals are not numerous in France, from the want of large forests and extensive mountains. The black and brown bears are found among the Pyrenees and the lynx among the Alps. The badger digs its den in the remotest woods, and the mole is abundant in the most fruitful fields. The forests of the Vosges and the woods upon the Moselle afford a shelter to several species of squirrels. And the Siberian flying squirrel, which issues from its retreat in the night and springs from branch to branch is not uncommon among the Alps. The hamster rat is one of the most pernicious of the tribes in existence. He makes extraordinary ravages among the crops and will sometimes amass in his den an hundred pounds of grain. All the large forests are inhabited by the wolf, the most destructive of the carnivorous animals in France.

Almost every species of bird common to Europe is found here. The flamingoes from Africa appear in flocks on the shores of the Mediterranean. The becafcocs or fig-peckers, so much esteemed by the epicure are abundant in the south. That fine songster, the nightingale, is by no means rare. Larks are so abundant that the markets are often stocked with them for food, and the business of taking them with bird-lime affords employment to great numbers of people. The red partridge is common in the central and western departments, and the grey in the southern. Woodcocks and snipes frequent the woods and marshes. The ring ouzel is a bird of passage and feeds upon insects and berries, but is particularly fond of the grapes of this country. The goldfinch, the linnet and the bulfinch may be added to the list of singing birds. Of hawks there is a variety, and among them may be mentioned the goshawk who is of a slender and elegant figure and very destructive to small game. This bird is also found in Germany and occasionally in Great Britain.

The N. and N. W. departments are productive in every kind of grain, pulse and legumes; manufactures of silk, wool, linens, leather, and metals, are carried on over all parts of the country, and since the termination of the war in 1814, the cotton manufacture has been progressively increasing, and is now carried on to a great extent. In addition to these internal resources, France exclusively enjoys the abundant produce of the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe in the West Indies; she also holds in colonial possession Cayenne in South America; Goree and Senegal on the coast of Africa; and the isle of Bourbon in the Indian Ocean; and draws considerable supplies of produce from Brazil, the United States of America, parts beyond the Cape of Good Hope, the Levant, and other parts of the world, in exchange for her surplus produce of wines, brandy, silks, and various manufactures. Exempt from all those extremes of climate which in several parts of the world militate against physical exertion, as well as vegetation, France may be considered as possessing within itself all the means of commanding a higher degree of human enjoyment than can be obtained in any other part of Europe, and equal to what can be obtained in any other part of the globe.

For centuries prior to the Christian era, this part of Europe appears to have been inhabited by a numerous and hardy race of people, those occupying the interior being denominated Celts. The first important notice which history furnishes of them is in 225 B. C. when the Gauls who inhabited part of Piedmont and the north of Italy, invited the people then occupying the banks of the Rhone to aid them in repelling the aggressions of the Romans; and from thus being brought in contact with that powerful and enlightened people, they acquired the name of Transalpine Gauls, in reference to their territory lying W. of the Alps, and in contradistinction to the ancient Gauls, who were designated the Cisalpinæ. In 106 B. C. the Cimbri and Teutones from the north of Germany marched through Transalpine Gaul into Spain, ravaging the country on their way, but being driven back by the Celtiberians, they divided their forces with the view of penetrating into Italy in two directions: the Teutones directed their course to the S. E. when they were opposed by Marius, between the mouths of the Rhone and the Durance, and experienced a complete defeat, losing 200,000 men on the field of battle, and 80,000 more taken prisoners. From this period the Romans extended their arms and their arts over the greater part of the country, and in 59 B. C. the Roman senate conferred on Julius Cæsar the government of all Transalpine Gaul for five years; two years after this, the whole western coast from the Seine to the Loire became effectually subdued to Roman control, and in five years more, by awarding honorary distinctions to the principal cities, and distributing bribes to the leading chiefs, the whole country became reconciled to the Roman government. It was afterwards divided into 17 military divisions.

As the power of the Romans declined, Transalpine Gaul again became exposed to the inroad of the different tribes on the N. E. In the year 406, a tribe of Burgundians from the banks of the Vistula crossed the Rhine and took possession of that part of the country, afterwards named Burgundy, and in 420 another tribe from Franconia, under the command of Pharamond entered from the N. E. From 450 to 452 it was ravaged by the Huns under Attila, who on laying siege to Orleans was brought to battle by Meroveus, who defeated Attila with a loss of 200,000 men. In 452 Clovis, a Franconian and descendant of Meroveus, possessed himself of all the places in Transalpine Gaul, previously held by the Romans, and in 492 marrying Clotilda, daughter of Chilperic, king of the Burgundians, became king of the whole country now called France. Clotilda at the time of her marriage had embraced Christianity, and in 496 Clovis initiated himself in its mysteries through the means of St. Remi, and was baptized at Rheims on Christmas eve of that year: hence the custom of the coronation at Rheims of the kings of France through a period of more than 1,300 years. Clovis was the first of a race of 17 kings who reigned over France in regular succession, denominated the Merovingians, in reference to their descent from Meroveus. In 732 France was ravaged by the Saracens under the command of Abdalrahman, when Eudes, duke of Aquitaine, implored the assistance of Charles Martel, duke of Austrasia who brought Abdalrahman to battle between Tours and Poitiers, and defeated him, as history informs us, with the loss of 375,000 men, Abdalrahman himself being slain on the field of battle. In 737 the crown of France devolved to Charles Martel, whose manly spirit, however, disdained regal parade. He ruled France for four years under the title of duke; he died in 741, and was succeeded by an imbecile named Childeric, whose authority in 752 was superseded by Pepin, and this person became the first of a race of 13 kings denominated Carlovingians. Pepin died in 768, and was succeeded by Charlemagne the renowned, crowned emperor of the Romans, or of the West, at Rome, in 800. On the death of Louis V. in 986, after a reign of one year, the crown of France descended to Charles, an uncle of Louis, but in consequence of his having vassalated himself to the emperor Otho III. he was precluded from its accession, and the crown was conferred by election on Hugh Capet, who became the first of another race of 14 kings termed the Capetians. Charles IV. the last of the Capets in regular succession dying in 1334, without male issue, the crown devolved on Philip of Valois, who was the first of 7 kings of that race. In 1498 it devolved on the duke of Orleans, who became Louis XII. and was the first of another race of 6 kings. On the death of Henry III. in 1589, the succession was again broken, when the crown devolved on Henry of Bourbon, in whose line it continued until the decapitation of Louis XVI. on the 21st of January, 1793.

For some centuries antecedent to this period, France had been divided into 32 provinces of very unequal extent, each with a distinct local administration. The period of their formation does not appear. At the time the Romans first entered France, it was divided into four great parts, viz. Narbonensis, comprising the S. E., Aquitain the S. W., Celtica the interior, and Gallia Belgica the N. The division into 17 provinces took place under Augustus, the first emperor of Rome, and some of the Roman names continued as late as the 13th century, John, king of England, in the preamble to Magna Charta, being styled duke of Normandy and Aquitain. Austrasia, over which Charles Martel presided in the 8th century, appears to have comprised part of the N. E. of France, and what now forms part of the Prussian Provinces of the Rhine. Subsequent to the period of the accession of Clovis in 481, the country appears to have been exposed to a continuity of internal dissensions; and when these had subsided, the vain glory which France acquired under Charlemagne, increased the jealousy of the neighbouring powers, and excited external broils. In 912 the N. W. coast was invaded by a northern tribe called Normans who retained possession of that part of the country afterwards called Normandy; and in 1060, William the duke of this province, invaded, conquered, and became king of England. This event subsequently led to violent contests between England and France. Louis VII., in 1137, embarked in the crusading mania of that period, and in 1334 on Charles IV., the last of the Capets, dying without male issue, Edward III. of England, set up his claim to the French crown. The battles of Cressy and Poitiers in 1346 and 1355 resulted from this pretension. At the battle of Poitiers, John, king of France was taken prisoner, but afterwards ransomed for 3,000,000 crowns of gold, equal to £1,500,000. A respite from external war followed this negotiation, but internal broils again ensued, and in 1415 Henry V. king of England, availed himself of prevailing dissensions to renew the claim of Edward to the French crown, and on the 25th of October of that year, the French forces experienced a decisive defeat at Agincourt. Henry followed up his victory by the capture of several of the most important towns in Normandy, and in 1420 the succession to the crown was ceded to him by treaty. In 1422 he assumed the regency of France; but he dying at Vienne on the 30th of August of that year, his brother succeeded him in the regency during the minority of his son Henry VI. who was crowned king of France at Paris, on the 7th of December 1431. The English influence had, however, previously experienced a considerable check, by the singular and daring exploits of Jeanne of Arc, celebrated as the maid of Orleans, and by 1451, Calais was the only place in France held by the English. Her kings, however, retained the title of king of France until the peace of Amiens, in 1801-2. After having succeeded in driving the English from the French territory, France embroiled herself in the contentions of her northern and eastern neighbours; but a general peace pervaded all Europe during the latter part of the 16th century, by the treaty of Cambray in 1559. The restless spirit of the French government during the reigns of Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III., the three last kings of the Orleans race, directed their wantonness and cruelty against their own protestant subjects. This persecution was allayed for a time by Henry IV. the first of the Bourbons, who ascended the throne in 1589, under whose conciliatory policy, the interests of France became more consolidated than at any former period. Henry, however, was assassinated by a fanatic in 1610, when fresh disorder ensued, and France again was seen involved in all the contentions of the European states, and of England with her American colonies, which took place in the interval of that period.

It was immediately after the general peace of Europe in 1763, when the English American colonies obtained an honorable independence, that the triple oppression of the crown, the nobles, and the clergy became intolerable to the French people.

The finances became inextricably embarrassed, and the States General or assembly of the representatives of the people according to an ancient but disused custom, were called together in 1789. From the consideration of fiscal affairs they were led to the discussion of political rights and theories of government. The revolution followed, and its events form the most tragic and bloody page in all modern history. This occurrence involved France in a war with almost all Europe, and her efforts single handed against this tremendous odds excited the astonishment of the world. Among those who contributed more especially to the eclat of the French armies, was a young officer, Napoleon Bonaparte, who, on his return to Paris, after his successful campaign in Italy, was intrusted with the command of a vast armament to the shores of Egypt, and when he returned in 1799 was mainly instrumental in forming a new constitution under a Triune consulate, senate and legislative body, in which he himself was appointed one of the consuls. In October, 1801, a peace was signed with England, which proved, however, of short duration. War was renewed in 1803, when Bonaparte was appointed Consul for life, with power to nominate his successor; this, however, fell short of his ambition, and in May of the following year he was proclaimed Emperor of France. On the 1st of October, 1805, he again headed a powerful army against the German States; detached the minor powers from the Germanic confederacy, and united them to his own interest, under the new title of the Confederation of the Rhine. In 1808, he marched an army of 80,000 men into Spain, and placed one of his brothers on the throne of that country; another brother he had caused to be crowned king of Holland; another king of Westphalia, and a brother-in-law king of Naples. The whole of the Netherlands he had annexed to France, in 16 departments; and on the king of Holland resigning his crown in 1809, the whole of that country, with the coast of Germany, as far as the Elbe; the states of the papal church, and the greater part of the north of Italy, were also decreed integral parts of the French empire, in 28 additional departments.

The emperor of Austria, imagining that the division of the French forces into Spain afforded him an opportunity of avenging the repeated defeats he had sustained, provoked a new contest in 1809, when Napoleon again took the field against the Austrians, and on the 5th of July completely defeated them. A treaty of peace followed, in which the daughter of the emperor of Austria was ceded in marriage to the conqueror of her father's capital. The birth of a son in 1811 seemed for a time to render permanent the fortunes of Napoleon and his family; but an ill-fated ambition led him, in 1812, to march an army of 300,000 men into Russia. After repeated and severe conflicts he reached Moscow, the ancient capital of that empire, on the 14th of September. By the order of the governor, this city was secretly set on fire, and the desolation by which Napoleon found himself surrounded induced him to withdraw his forces. They were overtaken with snow storms before they could reach the frontiers, whilst the Russians on their rear subjected them to continued disasters; and in the end destroyed the finest army which ever assembled in Europe. In the mean time the French troops in the peninsula were exposed to frequent defeats; and, by 1814, Napoleon and his troops had not only been driven within their own frontier, but a united Russian, Prussian, and Austrian army entered France from the N. E., the British, Spanish, and Portuguese armies entered it from the S. W., and Napoleon, seeing the tide of fortune completely set against him, immediately abdicated the sceptre. The island of Elba was assigned to him as a residence in full sovereignty for life, with an income of about £200,000 per annum. On the 3rd of May, 1814, Louis XVIII., who had been exiled in England during the consular and imperial dynasty, arrived in Paris to resume the throne of his ancestors. On the 5th of March, 1815, Napoleon secretly landed at Frejus, and marched without interruption to Paris, from which Louis fled at midnight on the 20th. Napoleon arrived the same evening; on the 27th the national council annulled his abdication, and called upon him to resume his imperial functions. On the 29th he abolished the African slave trade; on the 12th of June he left Paris, to take the command of an army on the N. E. frontier, but, after a whole day's severe fighting, on the 18th his line was broken, his troops thrown into confusion, and the palm of victory left with the allies, who marched again upon Paris, which they reached on the 6th of July. Napoleon again abdicated the imperial sceptre, and on the 29th of June quitted Paris never to return. Louis again resumed the sovereignty on the 18th of July; on the 25th of the same month Napoleon surrendered to the commander of a British ship of war, and was afterwards carried to the island of St. Helena, in the Atlantic Ocean, where he died on the 5th of May, 1821.

Louis XVIII. died in September 1824, and was succeeded by his brother Charles Philip (Count d'Artois) under the title of Charles X., whose increasing infringement of the rights of the people at length aroused universal indignation, and expelled him from the throne he had so unworthily filled, and the country he had laboured to enslave. The form of government since 1814 resembled that of Britain—the power being vested in the king, the chamber of peers, and the deputies. To strengthen himself in the chamber of peers, Charles X. increased it by creations: to weaken the people he invaded the elective franchise and shackled the press. In August 1829 he dismissed M. Martignac's administration because it would not go all lengths against the people, and appointed another of ultra royalists, under his natural son Prince Polignac. The first act of the deputies, on the meeting of the chambers in March 1830, was an address praying for the dismissal of the ministers. The king answered it haughtily and dismissed the chambers. Finding that the new chamber was likely to thwart his views still more than the former, he determined to strike a decisive blow, and on Sunday, July 25, he signed three ordinances—the first abolishing the freedom of the press—the second dissolving the chamber of deputies, which had never assembled—and the third abrogating the most important rights of the elective franchise.—This, however, was the last act of his misrule. A revolution ensued. The people were victorious. The government of Charles was overturned, and himself left to drag out the remains of his days in ignominious and unpitied banishment; while the sceptre was placed in the hands of a constitutional monarch, Louis Philippe I.—formerly the duke of Orleans. This revolution has already had a powerful influence on other states, and promises to open the way to the most important changes on the continent of Europe. A distinguishing feature of the present order of government is its perfect toleration in religious matters. The religion of the sovereign and the court is the Roman Catholic, but the teachers of all other sects of Christians are now supported by government. A considerable number of priests have recently separated themselves from the Romish pale, and the number of Protestants is increasing daily.

France exhibits an imposing picture of physical, moral, and social power, which the philosopher and philanthropist will view with mingled feelings of hope and fear; with hope, that she will henceforward be as assiduous to acquire glory in pursuing the arts of peace, and the attainments of social order, as she has heretofore been in the pursuit of conquest and political aggrandisement; and with fear, lest intrigue, priestcraft, and selfish ambition should again obtain an ascendancy, and predominate over the rights and interests of the people.

It is not easy for American readers to acquire any just knowledge of the character of the French. English travellers have written much upon this nation, but they are not to be trusted. The French people in many respects occupy the first rank among the European nations. The influence of this country may be compared to that of ancient Greece over the civilized world. The French language is the language of courts and ambassadors, and almost a common medium of intercourse among the different members of the great European family. This universality of their language with the affability and agreeable manners of the people their courtesy to strangers, the concentration of men of science and literature from all quarters at their capital, no less than geographical position of the country, all combine to render France more immediately central in point of influence and example than any other nation in the world. It was a true saying of Napoleon, that a revolution in France is a revolution in Europe.

The French are slender, active, well-proportioned, and rather shorter than their neighbours. Their eyes and hair are black, and their complexion brown or sallow, which it has been thought, gave rise to the custom of painting the face among the ladies. The women in France are celebrated more for their vivacity and wit, than for personal beauty. The superior people are very attentive to the exercises of dancing, fencing, and riding, in all which they generally excel in point of gracefulness.

Nothing appears to the French more odious than uniformity, on which account the changes among them are so frequent, that it is impossible to describe any particular dress as that which is adopted as a standard. Notwithstanding the fickleness of fashion at Paris, and other large cities of the empire, the great mass of the people in distant provinces, always faithful to ancient manners, smile, under the enormously large hat, at the new modes which rise and fall almost every day among their more polished compatriots.

Paris sets the fashions of all Europe, and an immense trade in articles of dress and new patterns is carried on by tailors, mantua-makers, and milliners. Every week has its new female fashions, and every month its new male fashions; all say they, for the good of trade.

Brutal battles, quarrels, and noisy drunken fellows, are nuisances seldom met with. The lower class of people behave to each other with a surprising degree of civility. The unhappy females who roam the streets at nights, are neither obtrusive, rude, nor riotous. At the theatres, the tranquillity of the audience is seldom interrupted: people go for the wise purpose of being pleased, and with the good-humoured disposition to be satisfied. These places of amusement are, doubtless, much indebted for their tranquillity to the national sobriety of the French.

Politeness and good manners may be traced, though in different portions, through every rank. This however, does not form a more remarkable and distinguishing feature in the French national character, than the vivacity, impetuosity, and fickleness, for which the ancient, as well as the modern inhabitants of Paris, have been noted.

Sunday is but slightly observed in France, at any season; and very slightly indeed in harvest. Some go to church for about an hour; but, before and after no great marks of Sabbath are perceptible. This is to be regretted: a day of rest is at least an excellent political regulation; good for man and beast; but in France all the theatres and places of amusement are open, and more frequented than on any other day in the week.

The scrupulous honesty of the lower and middling classes in restoring any lost property to its owner, is worthy of particular remark. The postillions, coachmen, servants, &c. may generally be trusted with confidence. The tradesmen also, though they ask more than they mean to take for their goods, would cheerfully and unasked, restore to you your purse, umbrella, cane, or any thing you might have left in their shop by accident, and this, if not reclaimed for a considerable time.

The temperate mode of life pursued by the French, their geographical position and agricultural pursuits, exempt them from any great variety and severity of disease. The fact is exem plified not less in the happy constitution of the people, than in the advanced age at which the majority of those persons die in France, whom it is an object to record, from the abilities of the individual, or the rank which he may have held in society. "He was only 56 or 60," is a common formula of French biography. The Cardinal de Fleuri died at 90; the President d'Henault at 96; Crebillon, the son, at 70; Condamine at 74; Voltaire at 84; the Marquis du Deffand at 84. Men of 70 and 80 have usually as much life and playfulness in France, as their grand-children.

France, Isle of, a late province of France, so called, because it was bounded by the rivers Seine, Marne, Oise, Aisne, and Ourque. It now forms the four departments of Oise; Seine; and Oise; Seine and Marne; Seine, and Paris.

France, Isle of, or Mauritius, an island in the Indian ocean, 400 m. E. of Madagascar. It was discovered by the Portuguese; but the first who settled here were the Dutch, in 1598. They called it Mauritius, in honor of the prince Maurice, their stadtholder; but, on their acquisition of the Cape of Good Hope, they deserted it; and it continued unsettled till the French landed here in 1720, and gave it the name of one of the finest provinces in France. It is 150 m. in circumference. The climate is healthy; but the soil not very fertile. There are many mountains, some of which are so high, that their tops are covered with snow; they produce the best ebony in the world. The valleys are well watered with rivers, and are made very productive by cultivation, of which sugar is the principal object. The town and harbour, called Port Louis, are strongly fortified; but in the hurricane months the harbour cannot afford shelter for more than eight vessels. Here are large store-houses, and every thing necessary for the equipment of fleets. This island was taken by the British in 1801, and confirmed to them by the treaty of Paris, in 1814. In 1819 the pestilential cholera was introduced into this island from India and carried off 7,000 of the inhabitants. According to an account presented by the colonial department to the British parliament, in the session of 1825, the island was divided into 8 districts, containing a pop. of 87,503, in the proportion of 65,769 slaves, 13,475 free blacks, and 10,359 whites, exclusive of 1,310 troops. Port Louis on the N. W. coast of the island, is in lat. 20. 10. N. and 57. 29 of E. long. See Bourbon.
